BASCH v. BANK OF AMERICA NAT. TRUST & SAVINGS ASS'N.

S. F. 16867.

Supreme Court of California.

June 16, 1943.

Rehearing Denied July 15, 1943.

1. Banks and banking 🔑119, 148(1)

A bank, in receiving ordinary deposits, becomes depositor's debtor, impliedly contracts with him to discharge indebtedness by honoring checks drawn by him, and in so doing is charged with knowledge of his signature.

2. Banks and banking 🔑148(1)

A bank pays forged check at its peril and such payment will be considered to have been made from bank's own funds, so that it has no right to charge depositor's account with amount disbursed and is liable to him for so doing.

3. Banks and banking 🔑148(3)

While no degree of care by bank will excuse it from liability to depositor for amount paid on forged check against his account, bank may justify such payment on principles of "estoppel" or on basis of depositor's negligent or misleading conduct directly or proximately causing payment but bank must show due diligence before it can assert such defenses.

See Words and Phrases, Permanent Edition, for all other definitions of "Estoppel".

4. Banks and banking 🔑148(3)

When bank depositor's passbook has been written up and returned to him with canceled check charged to his account, it is his duty to examine checks within reasonable time and report to bank forgeries or alterations disclosed by them, failing in which he cannot dispute correctness of payments thereafter made by bank on similar checks, if such failure results in detriment to bank.

5. Banks and banking 🔑148(3)

A bank which could have discovered alteration or forgery of checks, drawn on depositor's account, by exercising proper care, must bear loss resulting from its payment thereof, though depositor failed to examine his passbook and canceled checks returned to him by bank.

6. Banks and banking 🔑148(1), 151

A bank is under obligation to depositor to use care in scrutinizing checks drawn on depositor's account in order to detect forgeries and to render accounts to depositor in order to prevent perpetration of frauds on him.

7. Banks and banking 🔑154(9)

Whether bank was negligent in paying forged or fraudulently altered check drawn on depositor's account is generally question for jury.

8. Banks and banking 🔑148(3)

While provisions at bottoms of monthly statements, sent by bank to depositor with his canceled checks, that his account would be considered correct, if no error therein was reported within ten days, could not be given dignity and effect of contract, either to constitute statements accounts stated or to relieve bank from liability for payment of forged checks, where such provision was never called to depositor's attention nor noticed by him before discovery of forgeries, depositor had legal duty to examine statements within reasonable time and report without delay any discrepancies revealed on comparison thereof with his own records.

Principal and agent 🔑178(2)

A depositor, delegating duty of examining bank's monthly statements of his account and canceled checks thereon to dishonest employee, who forges checks on such account, is chargeable as principal with such information as an honest employee, unaware of wrongdoing, would acquire from such examination, though not imputed with knowledge of such dishonest employee's fraud.

10. Banks and banking 🔑148(3)

A depositor, delegating to trusted employee duty to examine bank's monthly statements of depositor's account and canceled checks returned therewith, had duty of properly supervising such employee's conduct, and in absence of reasonable supervision thereof, depositor's mere designation of employee as agent to discharge such duty cannot be deemed equivalent of depositor's performance thereof.

11. Banks and banking 🔑148(3)

A bank depositor, learning that funds on deposit are disappearing, as on receipt from bank of notice of overdraft resulting from its payment of checks forged by depositor's employee, is guilty of "negligence" in failing to take steps which careful and prudent business man would take in such situation to stop issuance of such checks.

See Words and Phrases, Permanent Edition, for all other definitions of "Negligence".

12. Banks and banking 🔑148(3)

A bank depositor, making no personal examination of his records after receiving notice from bank of overdraft against his account as result of bank's payments of checks forged by depositor's employee, but contenting himself with superficial inquiry of such employee and making no challenge of his explanation of overdraft, was not charged with knowledge of employee's fraud or precluded from recovering amount of such payments from bank on ground that he adopted forged checks as genuine, "ratified" payment thereof, or "estopped" himself from asserting forgeries by depositing funds sufficient to cover overdraft, in absence of showing of bank's freedom from negligence in failing to detect forgeries without depositor's aid.

See Words and Phrases, Permanent Edition, for all other definitions of "Estop" and "Ratify".

13. Banks and banking 🔑154(8)

In depositor's action against bank for amount paid on forged checks drawn against plaintiff's account by his employee, evidence held to show that bank's employees, by exercising proper care and skill, could and should have discovered some of forgeries, so as to establish bank's "negligence" rendering it liable to plaintiff, notwithstanding his negligence in failing to examine canceled checks and bank's monthly statements of plaintiff's account.

14. Appeal and error 🔑930(1)

On appeal, conflicts in evidence before trial court must be resolved against appellant.

15. Banks and banking 🔑154(9)

In depositor's action against bank for amounts paid on forged checks drawn against plaintiff's account by his employee, quality of forgeries was fact question for jury to determine from conflicting evidence on question of bank employee's negligence in passing forged instruments.

16. Banks and banking 🔑154(8)

In depositor's action against bank for amount paid on forged checks drawn against plaintiff's account by his employee, evidence of bank's uniform treatment of all such checks and its employees' failure to exercise reasonable diligence in handling plaintiff's account during ten months' period involved held sufficient to support jury's implied finding that bank was negligent in passing forged checks which were destroyed by such employee and hence unavailable for production at trial, as well as in cashing checks introduced in evidence.

In depositor's action against bank for amount paid on forged checks drawn against plaintiff's account by his employee, where evidence supported jury's implied finding that bank was negligent in cashing forged checks which were destroyed by such employee and hence unavailable for production at trial, as well as in cashing checks introduced in evidence, there was no basis for invocation of doctrine of "equitable estoppel" in bar of plaintiff's claim for amount represented by missing checks.

See Words and Phrases, Permanent Edition, for all other definitions of "Equitable Estoppel".

18. Banks and banking 🔑148(3)

A bank depositor's negligence in failing to examine bank's monthly statements of his account and canceled checks returned therewith after his employee's forgery of checks paid by bank, as well as his prior carelessness in hiring such dishonest employee, is available to relieve bank from absolute liability on forged instruments only in event of its own freedom from negligence in failing to discover forgeries.

In depositor's action against bank for amounts paid on forged checks drawn against plaintiff's account, where plaintiff makes out prima facie case by showing that bank made such payments and refused on demand to pay sum represented by such checks, burden is not on plaintiff to show that bank was negligent in cashing checks and that he was free from negligence, but burden is on bank to show by way of defense that plaintiff was negligent and bank free from negligence.

A bank must establish its freedom from negligence in cashing forged checks on depositor's account as prerequisite condition to asserting depositor's "estoppel" by conduct to claim amount paid.

21. Banks and banking 🔑148(3)

Due diligence being necessary to enable one to assert "estoppel" of another in equity, a bank must show due diligence to discover forgeries of checks on depositor's account before it can assert depositor's negligence as defense to his action for amount paid on such checks.

22. Banks and banking 🔑154(9)

In depositor's action against bank for amount paid on forged checks drawn against plaintiff's account by his employee, the import of various factors bearing on respective parties' negligence in failing to discover forgeries was for jury to determine.

23. Appeal and error 🔑1001(1)

In depositor's action against bank for amount paid on forged checks drawn against plaintiff's account by his employee, jury's conclusion, based on reasonable inferences from evidence, as to bank's negligence in cashing forged checks, which were subsequently destroyed by such employee and hence not available for production at trial, is binding on bank's appeal from judgment on verdict for plaintiff.

24. Trial 🔑191(6)

In depositor's action against bank for amount paid on forged checks drawn against plaintiff's account by his employee, instruction that if bank was negligent in failing to detect first forgeries, jury might consider whether such negligence was proximate cause of forger continuing his wrongdoing, was not erroneous as assuming that evidence showing that forger predicated pursuit of his fraudulent scheme on his initial success in passing forged instruments was introduced.

25. Banks and banking 🔑154(9)

In depositor's action against bank for amount paid on forged checks drawn against plaintiff's account by his employee, instruction that if bank was negligent in failing to detect forgeries first committed, it was responsible for all loss to plaintiff proximately caused by such negligence, was proper.

26. Trial 🔑253(3)

In depositor's action against bank for amount paid on forged checks drawn against plaintiff's account by his employee, instruction that if bank was negligent in failing to detect forgeries first committed, it was responsible for all loss to plaintiff proximately caused by such negligence, and that jury might consider whether such negligence was proximate cause of forger being able to continue his wrongdoing, was not erroneous as failing to recognize legal effect of plaintiff's imputed knowledge of forgeries, in view of proper treatment of such subject in connection with same instruction and in several other instructions given at bank's instance.

27. Banks and banking 🔑154(9)

In depositor's action against bank for amount paid on forged checks drawn against plaintiff's account by his employee, instruction that if bank was negligent in failing to detect forgeries, plaintiff's subsequent negligence in failing to examine his monthly statements and canceled checks with reasonable care or to report to bank any errors in his account within reasonable time would constitute no defense to bank, was proper.

28. Banks and banking 🔑154(9)

In depositor's action against bank for amount paid on forged checks drawn against plaintiff's account by his employee, bank's proposed instruction not to consider forged checks charged in statement of account, delivered to plaintiff by defendant on certain date, in determining whether bank failed to exercise ordinary care and prudence in paying checks, was properly refused as containing erroneous statement of law.

29. Trial ⚷253(8)

In depositor's action against bank for amount paid on forged checks drawn against plaintiff's account by his employee, bank's proposed instructions, failing to make proper allowance for jury's consideration of evidence as to bank's liability in conformity with legal proviso that bank must show its freedom from negligence in order to invoke defense of depositor's negligence in failing to examine his monthly bank statements and canceled checks, were properly refused.

In Bank.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Franklin A. Griffin, Judge.

Action by Carlo Basch against the Bank of America National Trust and Savings Association to recover the amount paid by defendant on forged checks drawn against plaintiff's account with defendant. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals.

Affirmed.

For prior opinion, see Cal.App., 129 P.2d 742.

Louis Ferrari, G. D. Schilling, James S. De Martini, and D. Bianco, all of San Francisco, and Hugh L. Preston, of Ukiah, for appellant.

Belli & Leahy and Marshall E. Leahy, all of San Francisco, for respondent.

CURTIS, Justice.

For many years the plaintiff, Carlo Basch, owned and operated a retail drugstore—Basch's Pharmacy—in San Francisco, and since the establishment of such business he had maintained a commercial account in its name with the defendant bank at the main office at No. 1 Powell Street in said city. In May, 1938, he employed as a part-time bookkeeper one Herbert C. Lahr, who thereupon took charge of the office routine matters in connection with his employer's bank account and faithfully performed his work for the ensuing five months. About the first of November of said year Lahr conceived the scheme of fraudulently diverting from this bank account sums of money for his own use, and between November 3, 1938, and September 9, 1939, he forged plaintiff's signature to a series of one hundred and twenty-seven checks payable to himself, all but four of which called for the payment of $37.50 each. These checks cashed in various places by Lahr and in due course presented to the defendant's main office, were paid by the bank and, together with the genuine checks drawn during the same period, were charged to plaintiff's account. Plaintiff did not examine the bank's monthly statements or inspect the accompanying canceled checks as they were forwarded to him at regular intervals, but he delegated that duty to his bookkeeper Lahr. Consequently the forgeries were not discovered by plaintiff until the early part of September, 1939, after Lahr had absconded under circumstances which will be reviewed later. Prior thereto plaintiff had realized that his profits were decreasing, but inasmuch as no monthly profit and loss statements were made and a physical inventory was taken only once a year, he had simply assigned the decline to poor business. Immediately upon learning of the forgeries plaintiff notified the bank and demanded that it restore to him the total amount paid on the forged checks. After investigating the matter, the bank refused to make such reimbursement of plaintiff's account, and plaintiff thereupon commenced this action against the bank to recover such sum. The bank pleaded several special defenses, charging, in particular, negligence on the part of plaintiff (1) in failing to examine his monthly bank statements with the corresponding returned checks for the respective periods in question, thus permitting the continuance of the forgeries, which otherwise would have been detected; and (2) in entrusting the management of his banking affairs to Lahr without having made any inquiry at the time of the latter's employment as to his reputation for honesty and integrity. The cause was tried before a jury and a verdict was rendered against the bank for $4,740, the aggregate sum of the forgeries. From the judgment entered accordingly in favor of the plaintiff, the defendant bank prosecutes this appeal. Insufficiency of the evidence to support the verdict and error in the giving and refusal of certain instructions are urged as the grounds for reversal.

A preliminary statement of the general principles governing the question of liability as between a bank and its depositor when forged checks are involved will facilitate the discussion of the controversial points raised for consideration on this appeal.

[1-5] It is settled law that a bank in receiving ordinary deposits becomes the debtor of the depositor, that its implied contract with him is to discharge this indebtedness by honoring such checks as he may draw upon it, and that in so doing it is charged with knowledge of its depositor's signature. Otis Elevator Co. v. First Nat. Bank, 163 Cal. 31, 124 P. 704, 41 L.R.A.,N.S., 529; National Dredging Co. v. President, etc. of Farmers' Bank, 6 Pennewill, Del., 580, 69 A. 607, 16 L.R.A.,N.S., 593, 130 Am.St.Rep. 158; 4 Cal.Jur. 211, § 100; 9 C.J.S., Banks and Banking, p. 730, § 356, subsec. a. Consequently, a bank pays a forged check at its peril; and in such event, payment in legal contemplation will be considered to have been made from the bank's own funds so that it has no right to charge the depositor's account with the amount disbursed contrary to his genuine order, and it will be liable to him for so doing. Its responsibility in such case is, and should be, rigid. Glassell Dev. Co. v. Citizens' Nat. Bank, 191 Cal. 375, 216 P. 1012, 28 A.L.R. 1427; Union Tool Co. v. Farmers', etc., Nat. Bank, 192 Cal. 40, 218 P. 424, 28 A.L.R. 1417; Frankini v. Bank of America, etc., Ass'n, 12 Cal.App.2d 298, 55 P.2d 232; Deer Island Fish & Oyster Co. v. First Nat. Bank, 166 Miss. 162, 146 So. 116; 4 Cal.Jur. 215, 216, §§ 103, 104; Michie on Banks and Banking, vol. 5, p. 498, § 274. While no degree of care on the part of the bank will excuse it from liability, it may justify the payment of a forged check on principles of estoppel, or on the basis of negligent or misleading conduct of the depositor which directly or proximately caused the bank to pay. However, the bank must show due diligence before it can assert such defenses. Glassell Dev. Co. v. Citizens' Nat. Bank, supra; Union Tool Co. v. Farmers', etc., Nat. Bank, supra; Sommer v. Bank of Italy, etc., Ass'n, 109 Cal.App. 370, 293 P. 98; Wussow v. Badger State Bank of Milwaukee, 204 Wis. 467, 234 N.W. 720, 236 N.W. 687; 9 C.J.S., Banks and Banking, pp. 730–732, § 356, subsec. a. Expository of the law in this regard is the statement in Glassell Dev. Co. v. Citizens' Nat. Bank, 191 Cal. 375, 380, 216 P. 1012, 1014, 28 A.L.R. 1427:

"The weight of authority, and perhaps of reason, supports the view that when a depositor's passbook has been written up and returned to him with canceled checks which have been charged to his account, it is his duty to examine such checks within a reasonable time, and if they disclose forgeries or alterations to report them to the bank, failing in which he cannot, if his failure results in detriment to the bank, dispute the correctness of payments thereafter made by it on similar checks. 7 C.J. 687; California Vegetable Union v. Crocker Nat. Bank, 37 Cal.App. 743, 174 P. 920; Morgan v. United States Mortgage & Trust Co., 208 N.Y. 218, 101 N.E. 871, L.R.A. 1915D, 741, Ann.Cas.1914D, 462.

"This rule, however, assumes that the bank itself has not been guilty of negligence in making the payment, for when by the exercise of proper care it could have discovered the alteration or forgery, it must bear the loss notwithstanding that the depositor failed in his duty to examine the accounts. [Citing numerous authorities from other jurisdictions.]"

"A bank is under an obligation to its depositor to use care in scrutinizing checks paid in order to detect forgeries, and to render its accounts to prevent the perpetration of frauds upon its depositor. Therefore, if a bank, in the exercise of proper care, could have discovered the alteration or forgery of a customer's checks, it cannot throw the loss caused by paying them upon the depositor merely because he failed to examine his account. Or, stating the rule in terms of negligence, a bank which is guilty of negligence in failing to discover an alteration or forgery cannot avoid liability on the ground that the depositor was negligent in failing to examine his balanced passbook, statement of account, or returned checks. Consequently, in every case where suit is brought by a depositor to recover from a bank money deposited by him, which the bank has paid out otherwise than in conformity with his orders, and the bank sets up the defense that it is nevertheless entitled to charge the depositor with such payments because of conduct of the depositor subsequent to such payment, the preliminary question to be determined is whether the bank was or was not guilty of negligence in making the payments. If it was negligent, if its officers are found to have failed to exercise due and reasonable care in detecting the forgery or fraud, then the subsequent negligence of the depositor, his failure to perform his duty in examining his passbook and vouchers with reasonable care and to report to the bank in a reasonable time any errors or mistakes, will constitute no defense." (Italics added.) The question of whether a bank was negligent in paying a forged or fraudulently altered check is generally one for the jury. Sommer v. Bank of Italy, etc., Ass'n, supra; Frankini v. Bank of America, etc., Ass'n, supra; National Dredging Co. v. President, etc., Farmers' Bank, supra; Leather Manufacturers' Nat. Bank v. Morgan, 117 U.S. 96, 6 S.Ct. 657, 29 L.Ed. 811.

Measured in the light of the foregoing legal principles, the undisputed facts in this case establish beyond doubt that plaintiff was guilty of negligence not only in failing to exercise ordinary care and prudence in entrusting his employee Lahr with his banking affairs, but in disregarding the duty imposed upon him by law to examine and verify the bank's monthly statements and corresponding returned checks in relation to his own books of account. In this connection the record discloses the following points of consideration: Lahr, a stranger to plaintiff at the time he employed him in May, 1938, as a part-time bookkeeper at a salary of $25 per month, was so hired on the recommendation of plaintiff's nephew, for whom Lahr had been competently performing similar services for a short time. Plaintiff made no further inquiry of his new employee as to his antecedents or prior work. However, immediately following the discovery of the forgeries plaintiff learned that Lahr had a previous criminal record as a forger and embezzler; that he had served several jail sentences therefor, and that at the precise time plaintiff employed him he was posted in police headquarters as wanted by the State Division of Criminal Identification as a parole violator on a forgery conviction in El Dorado County, California. Moreover, upon slight investigation it was revealed that prior to his employment by plaintiff, Lahr had been discharged from other clerical positions in San Francisco on grounds showing want of confidence in him. In fact, a few weeks after Lahr entered plaintiff's service, he cashed with plaintiff a fictitious check drawn on an out-of-state bank, and plaintiff compelled him to make it good; yet plaintiff continued to employ him in a responsible position.

Lahr's principal duties under the terms of his employment with plaintiff consisted in preparing bank checks against vouchers for plaintiff's signature, in keeping certain accounting records in connection with the banking transactions, in examining the monthly bank statements and accompanying canceled checks, and in reconciling such items with plaintiff's books of account. The checkbooks used by plaintiff were of a uniform type—each page containing three checks attached to correspondingly numbered stubs and identifying, by appropriate printing in the lower right-hand corner above the line for plaintiff's signature, the chargeable account as "Basch's Pharmacy." One of the accounting records plaintiff required Lahr to keep was a "combination cash journal and bank account." Each page thereof was divided into columns; and in one of the double columns labeled "Bank" Lahr was supposed to enter the dates and amounts of the bank deposits, and the dates, amounts and numbers of the checks drawn against the deposits; and to enter the total amounts of the deposits and withdrawals at the bottom of the respective columns.

Being thus entrusted by plaintiff with the office management of the pharmacy's banking affairs, Lahr was in a position to pursue his criminal enterprise in the following manner: He would detach from the checkbook a complete sheet of blank checks and destroy the stubs; he would then place a piece of carbon paper and a canceled check bearing plaintiff's genuine signature over a blank check and trace the true signature with a hard lead pencil; then he would remove the blank check and trace thereon with pen and ink the thin carbon impression of plaintiff's signature, and afterwards erase the carbon stains from the spurious checks and any pencil marks appearing on the canceled check employed in the tracing operation. Thereupon Lahr filled in the face of the check, making it payable to himself. He made no entry of the forged checks in the "combination cash journal and bank account." During the period of the forgeries, Lahr, upon receipt of the respective envelopes containing the bank's monthly statements and the corresponding canceled checks, would immediately withdraw therefrom all the forged checks, some of which he destroyed. Then after reconciling the genuine checks with the stubs and entries in plaintiff's "combination cash journal and bank account," wherein he had itemized only the genuine checks, Lahr would falsify the totals at the bottom of the accounting book column and in the checkbook to coincide with the balance shown on the pertinent bank statement, return the genuine checks to the appropriate envelope, and mark it "O. K."

Lahr's forgeries were finally discovered by plaintiff in this way: In September, 1939, Lahr gave to an airline company in payment of his fare to Los Angeles one of the forged checks for $37.50, which he stated to be his salary remittance. After the plane had left the airfield, a representative of the company telephoned to Basch's Pharmacy to verify the authenticity of the check, and was informed by plaintiff that the check was a forgery and would not be honored. Upon the arrival of the plane in Los Angeles Lahr, when told that he had passed a bad check in the airline's San Francisco office, made good the amount to the company, and he was permitted to depart. Immediately upon receiving the telephone message from the airline company plaintiff, with the assistance of the police and an accountant, investigated his bank statements, canceled checks and books of account, and such examination at once disclosed the prior forgeries. In the meantime plaintiff notified the bank of these defalcations. Lahr was subsequently apprehended, convicted of the forgery here involved, and sentenced to imprisonment in the penitentiary. He gave his testimony at the present trial by way of deposition.

Lahr negotiated a total of one hundred and twenty-seven forged checks over a period of ten months. In November, 1938, the first month of his fraudulent undertaking, he cashed four of the spurious checks; the first for $40.00, the second for $35.00, the third for $37.50, and the fourth for $27.50. He then devised the scheme of drawing each check for a uniform amount—$37.50—so that the series would appear to be salary payments, and his only variance from this plan occurred in January, 1939, in the case of a check for $25.00. Accordingly, for this fixed amount he cashed four checks in December, 1938, five in January, 1939, nine in February, ten in March, eight in April, fifteen in May, eighteen in June, twenty-two in July, twenty-three in August, and eight in September. The forged checks were listed on the bank's respective monthly statements sent to plaintiff and were included in the corresponding envelopes of canceled checks returned to him with these periodical itemizations. At the bottom of each statement was printed the following language: "Please examine this statement at once. If no error is reported in ten days the account will be considered correct. All items are credited subject to final payment." But, as previously mentioned, plaintiff did not examine or verify any of the bank's monthly statements or canceled checks, nor did he undertake to reconcile the same with his books of account or the check stubs. He left these matters of bookkeeping reconcilement entirely to Lahr. Not even in May, 1939, when required to cover with a sizable deposit an overdraft standing against his account—the first time such charge had been made against plaintiff during the many years he had been a depositor with the defendant bank—did plaintiff undertake to investigate his banking records, but he accepted without question Lahr's explanation that the latter's bookkeeping mistake in combination with the payment of several large bills a few days previously had caused the unexpected deficiency in the account.

[8] While the undisputed testimony of plaintiff that the above-quoted ten-day time limitation—a reiteration of a provision appearing on the authorization card for the mailing of statements as it was signed by plaintiff on the occasion of opening his bank account—was never called to his attention nor noticed by him prior to the discovery of the forgeries precludes giving to such provision the dignity and effect of a contract, either to constitute the statements accounts stated or to relieve the bank from its liability for the payment of forged checks (Los Angeles Inv. Co. v. Home Savings Bank, 180 Cal. 601, 182 P. 293, 5 A.L.R. 1193; Frankini v. Bank of America, 31 Cal.App.2d 666, 88 P.2d 790; Wussow v. Badger State Bank of Milwaukee, 204 Wis. 467, 234 N.W. 720, 236 N.W. 687), plaintiff nevertheless as a depositor had a legal duty, according to the authorities cited in the forepart of this opinion, to examine within a reasonable time the documentary evidence forwarded to him by the bank as indicative of the status of his account and to report without delay any discrepancies revealed upon comparison with his own records. Obviously, if plaintiff had performed that duty of verification in regard to the conduct of his banking business, he would have easily detected the forgeries, and the exposure of the first or any of the succeeding ones would have avoided a repetition. As a matter of fact, when the suspicions of plaintiff were aroused and the ensuing investigation undertaken, the discrepancies were discovered in a few minutes. On this subject the court in the case of California Vegetable

Union v. Crocker Nat. Bank, 37 Cal.App. 743, 174 P. 920, after stating that the numerous authorities recognizing the duty of a depositor to examine his balanced bankbook apply with equal force to the analogous modern situation where statements are periodically furnished by a bank to its depositors on balancing their accounts and returning the canceled checks to them, pertinently added the following observation at page 751 of the opinion in 37 Cal.App., 174 P. at page 923: "If depositors may regularly at frequent intervals receive their vouchers and be notified, as was the [depositor] here, of reduced balances of their accounts in banks consequent upon the unfaithfulness of trusted employés during a period of nearly a year, and by neglecting to exercise reasonable supervision over their own business fail to discover fraud which has been perpetrated upon them and the bank, and may thus leave the bank in ignorance of the frauds thus committed, and charge the bank with the losses thus occasioned, then banks and their paying tellers face hard conditions indeed. We do not feel justified in establishing any such rule in this state."

[9, 10] Nor does the fact that plaintiff delegated the duty thus imposed upon him by law to a faithless employee serve as a legal excuse for not discharging this duty himself. According to the generally adopted rule, when the agent to whom the duty of examination is intrusted is a dishonest employee who by forgery has obtained funds of his employer from the bank, and whose consequent adverse interest causes him to conceal from his employer the circumstances which would naturally have been disclosed in the course of a proper verification, the employer though not imputed with knowledge of the fraud of his faithless agent, is, as principal, chargeable with such information as an honest employee, unaware of the wrongdoing, would have acquired from the examination of the canceled checks and bank statements. 9 C.J.S., Banks and Banking, p. 745, § 356, subsec. d(2); Dana v. National Bank of Republic, 132 Mass. 156; First Nat. Bank v. Allen, 100 Ala. 476, 14 So. 335, 27 L.R.A. 426, 46 Am.St.Rep. 80; Critten v. Chemical National Bank, 171 N.Y. 219, 63 N.E. 969, 57 L.R.A. 529; National Dredging Co. v. President, etc., Farmers' Bank, 6 Pennewill, Del., 580, 69 A. 607, 16 L.R.A.,N.S., 593, 130 Am.St.Rep. 158; Deer Island Fish & Oyster Co. v. First Nat. Bank, 166 Miss. 162, 146 So. 116; Leather Manufacturers' Nat. Bank v. Morgan, 117 U.S. 96, 6 S.Ct. 657, 29 L. Ed. 811; see, also, annotations: 15 A.L.R. 162, 67 A.L.R. 1124, 103 A.L.R. 1148. Consistent with the settled principles upon which the relation of bank and depositor is founded, this rule reasonably imposes upon the depositor the further duty of properly supervising the conduct of his trusted employee, for "aside from its own diligence, a bank's only protection against forgeries by a confidential agent to whom settlement of the bank account has been delegated is verification of statements by the depositor himself, who in such case is clearly responsible for the acts and omissions of his agent in the course of duties with which he had entrusted him. Myers v. Southwestern National Bank, 193 Pa. 1, 44 A. 280, 74 Am.St.Rep. 672. In such instances the cases hold that knowledge of a dishonest agent of fraudulent entries and incorrect balance is equally the knowledge of his principal, with the qualification, however, that the principal is chargeable, not with the knowledge of wrongdoing the agent possessed from the fact that he himself was dishonest, but with knowledge of such facts as an honest agent, unaware of the wrongdoing, would acquire when examining the statements within the scope of his employment. The dishonesty of the agent does not change his relationship to his principal, and accordingly does not change the rule charging his principal with knowledge of such facts. (Citing authorities.)" First National Bank v. Farrell, 3 Cir., 272 F. 371, 376, 16 A.L.R. 651. Thus, in the absence of such reasonable supervision, the mere designation of an agent to discharge a duty resting primarily upon the principal—the depositor—cannot be deemed the equivalent of performance by the latter. Leather Manufacturers' Nat. Bank v. Morgan, supra; Michie on Banks and Banking, vol. 5, p. 554, § 285.

[11, 12] In connection with the consideration of the duty plaintiff owed the bank by way of examination of his canceled checks and monthly statements, his failure to heed the import of the singular notice of overdraft in his account in May, 1939, as above-mentioned, merits some passing comment. A depositor may not sit idly by after knowledge has come to him that his funds seem to be disappearing or that there may be a leak in his business, and refrain from taking the steps that a careful and prudent business man would take in such situation, and which, if taken, would result in stopping the issuance of the forged checks. The failure to take such steps would support a charge of negligence against the depositor. Detroit Piston Ring Co. v. Wayne County & Home Savings Bank, 252 Mich. 163, 233 N.W. 185, 75 A.L.R. 1273. The isolated occurrence of this overdraft in the many years of plaintiff's maintenance of his account with the defendant bank was a fact of impressionable force and should have apprised him that something was amiss with the management of his banking affairs. Instead of making some personal examination of his pertinent records, a course of action which the dictates of ordinary prudence ought to have suggested as a proper precautionary measure incident to covering the amount of the overdraft charged against his account, plaintiff contented himself with a superficial inquiry of Lahr, the bookkeeper whom he mistakenly trusted, and made no challenge of that employee's easily discreditable explanation that the default was attributable in part to a bookkeeping error and in part to large withdrawals to meet unusual business expenses a few days prior to receipt of the bank's notice of the deficiency. However, these circumstances of plaintiff's remissness furnish no ground for holding that he, by depositing a sum sufficient to cover the overdraft, either adopted the forged checks as genuine and ratified the payment or estopped himself from asserting the forgeries. It would strain the doctrine of ratification to hold that a person had ratified or adopted as his own the unauthorized act of another, of which he had no information, or which was promptly repudiated as soon as brought to his knowledge. First National Bank v. Allen, 100 Ala. 476, 14 So. 335, 27 L.R.A. 426, 46 Am.St.Rep. 80; Critten v. Chemical National Bank, 171 N.Y. 219, 63 N.E. 969, 57 L.R.A. 529. No more in this than in any other instance of failure to exercise reasonable supervision over his banking affairs is plaintiff to be imputed with knowledge of his dishonest agent's fraud or his recovery precluded on the basis of ratification of his faithless employee's wrongdoing. All such situations simply involve considerations of lack of due diligence on the part of the depositor and require the application of like legal principles in the measure of the effect of his negligence with reference to the bank's payment of the forged checks.

Under the authorities above cited, as well as others, the remiss conduct of the depositor in such cases as this is available as a defense to the bank only where it appears that the bank itself is free from negligence in the first instance in the payment of the forged checks. If in the exercise of due care the bank would have detected the forgeries without the aid of the depositor, the bank cannot then escape its contractual liability merely because the depositor was also at fault. In such circumstances the bank does not pay because previous forgeries were not reported to it, but it pays because on its own negligent inspection it supposed the checks were genuine. Moreover, in line with the rigor of the rule that a bank pays out the money of its depositors on forged instruments at its peril, it was held in Sommer v. Bank of Italy, etc., Ass'n, 109 Cal.App. 370, 376, 293 P. 98; that a bank seeking to escape liability for cashing unauthorized checks drawn against its depositor's account has the burden of proving as a preliminary point its own freedom from negligence in the matter.

[13-15] It is plaintiff's contention that the record establishes that the bank was negligent in the following respects: (1) that its "system was wrong" in that it gave no instructions to its employees "relative to detecting forgeries, or in handwriting"; (2) that it assigned duties to employees who were not competent to "discharge the system set up" by the bank; and (3) that the employees were negligent in the performance of their duties. There is no merit to plaintiff's first two charges. Without detailing the evidence bearing on these initial points, it will suffice to state that the undisputed testimony of qualified witnesses on the subject shows that the bank's system of examining checks for irregularities and training its employees to that end is essentially the same as that followed in all San Francisco banks, and is regarded as the accepted modern practice. However, as to the third proposition here advanced by plaintiff, there is substantial evidence indicating that by the exercise of proper care and skill the bank's employees could and should have discovered some of the forgeries. In this connection the record shows that eighty-three of the series of forged checks were produced by plaintiff at the trial and were received in evidence; that some twenty of those so produced were shown to the teller who had been in charge of the division handling plaintiff's banking account during the period of the forgeries, and some three or four years prior thereto; that after inspecting these twenty checks, he admitted that several of them bore evidence of forgery and should not have been passed. Three of those so specified by him were of the group of four forged and cashed during the first month of Lahr's criminal undertaking—November, 1938—and two of them he himself had previously honored as genuine. Furthermore, three or four of the others which he said showed evidence of irregularities and palpable line tremor in the signature were originally passed by him. It is true that certain other witnesses gave testimony to the effect that they would have passed these same checks, but on appeal such conflicts in the record must be resolved against the appellant. The evidence also discloses that it was the standard practice of the bank that tellers should not honor checks which were postdated or without date, or which showed trace of erasures; that all such checks were to be referred to an officer of the bank for verification and disposition; that despite these established rules of procedure, of the forged checks on exhibit at the trial as passed by tellers handling plaintiff's bank account, one was postdated, another was undated, and many of them showed erasure marks. It further appears that as to a large group of the forged checks in evidence, certain witnesses called by the bank testified that the signatures attached thereto were "excellent facsimiles" of the genuine signature. However, in the final analysis the quality of the forgeries was a question of fact peculiarly appropriate for the jury to determine from these several opposing considerations, and apparently it was convinced that the bank's employees were negligent in passing the forged instruments.

[16] Nor can it be said under this state of the record that the unavailability of forty-four of the forged checks for production at the trial precluded a finding by the jury that the bank was responsible to plaintiff for their payment. It appears from the evidence that the missing group consisted of all the forged checks cashed during the months of December, 1938, and January, February, March and May, 1939; that Lahr, when confronted with plaintiff's banking records was able to identify beyond dispute these items as to time of execution and amount (each for $37.50 except one in January for $25.00, or a total of $1,637.50); that all of these missing checks had been theretofore delivered to plaintiff by the bank with his respective monthly statements and had been subsequently destroyed by Lahr as part of his scheme of concealing his wrongdoing from plaintiff. The fact that Lahr employed the precise same modus operandi with respect to all of the forgeries—that is, he traced plaintiff's genuine signature from a legitimate check onto the forged one under the conditions heretofore outlined—gives rise to a reasonable inference that the checks destroyed were substantially similar in appearance to the eighty-three introduced as exhibits in the course of the trial. Moreover, as previously noted, the four checks forged in the first month were in evidence and the bank's teller particularly concerned with plaintiff's account conceded that three of them were obvious forgeries and should not have been passed. Had these been exposed by the bank, the subsequent forgeries would not have occurred. Critten v. Chemical National Bank, 171 N.Y. 219, 63 N.E. 969, 973, 57 L.R.A. 529. In addition all of the checks were made to the order of the same payee, and all but four of the one hundred and twenty-seven were for the same amount—$37.50—a suspicious circumstance that should have put the bank on notice. Frankini v. Bank of America, etc., Ass'n, 12 Cal.App.2d 298, 55 P.2d 232. These several observations relating to the bank's uniform treatment of the entire series of forged checks and its employees' failure to exercise reasonable diligence in the handling of plaintiff's banking account over the ten-month period here involved constitute ample support for the jury's implied finding that the bank was as negligent in cashing the missing checks as it was in cashing the ones in evidence—that the same considerations governed in measuring the liability for the total resulting loss.

[17-21] In such situation there is no basis for invocation of the doctrine of equitable estoppel in bar of plaintiff's claim for the amount represented by the missing checks. The bank argues that the unavailability of these forged instruments at the trial, because of their previous destruction by Lahr, placed it at a disadvantage on the issue of the quality of such forgeries, and that as the absence of such evidentiary matter was attributable to plaintiff's own negligence in connection with his failure to exercise reasonable supervision over his banking affairs, he cannot recover the amount of such unauthorized payments from his bank account. But the depositor's negligence subsequent to the commission of the forgeries—remiss conduct predicate of the defense of estoppel—like his prior carelessness in hiring a dishonest employee—is available to relieve a bank from its absolute liability on forged instruments only in the event it has itself been free from negligence. Union Tool Co. v. Farmers', etc., Nat. Bank, 192 Cal. 40, 218 P. 424, 28 A.L.R. 1417. The general proposition distinguishing the present situation from the ordinary negligence case is aptly stated in Sommer v. Bank of Italy, etc., Ass'n, 109 Cal.App. 370, 376, 293 P. 98, 101, as follows: "When the depositor makes out a prima facie case by showing that the bank has made payment from his account on forged checks and has refused upon demand to pay the sum represented by the forged checks, the burden is not upon the depositor to show that the bank was negligent in cashing the checks and that he was free from negligence. The burden is then upon the bank to show by way of defense that the depositor was negligent and that the bank was free from negligence." Nor, in line with the principle of this strict rule of liability, is it unreasonable to require of the bank the establishment of its own freedom from negligence as a prerequisite condition to asserting an estoppel by conduct in defeat of the depositor's claim. As was said in this regard in Wussow v. Badger State Bank of Milwaukee, 204 Wis. 467, 474, 234 N.W. 720, 722, 236 N.W. 687: "The right to assert an estoppel in equity does not arise unless the one asserting it has acted with due diligence. Due diligence being necessary to enable one to assert an estoppel, the bank must show due diligence before it can assert the negligence of the depositor. The whole doctrine of estoppel is a creation of equity and is governed by equitable principles. [2] Pomeroy Eq.Jur. (4th Ed.) § 813." To like effect, see Coleman Drilling Co. v. First Nat. Bank, Tex.Civ.App., 252 S.W. 215, and Graham v. Southington Bank & Trust Co., 99 Conn. 494, 121 A. 812. The basic principle of application of this fundamental rule in the law of estoppel would not fluctuate in pertinency according to the nature of the subsequent negligence chargeable against the depositor, but it would be equally operative whether his objectionable conduct following his dishonest employee's commission of the forgeries concerned the failure to examine the monthly bank statements or the loss of the checks on which recovery is sought.

[22, 23] The import of the various factors bearing upon the negligence of the respective parties to this action was for the jury to determine (Frankini v. Bank of America, etc., Ass'n, 12 Cal.App.2d 298, 55 P.2d 232; National Dredging Co. v. President, etc., Farmers' Bank, 6 Pennewill, Del., 580, 69 A. 607, 16 L.R.A.,N.S., 593, 130 Am. St.Rep. 158; Deer Island Fish & Oyster Co. v. First Nat. Bank, 166 Miss. 162, 146 So. 116; Leather Manufacturers' Nat. Bank v. Morgan, 117 U.S. 96, 6 S.Ct. 657, 29 L.Ed. 811), and the rule that the defense of estoppel is not available to the bank in the face of its own negligence must prevail in this case in view of the implied finding of the jury that the bank's failure to exercise due care to discover the forgeries before cashing the forty-four missing checks was the proximate cause of that resulting loss. The unavailability of this group of checks did not change the burden of proof placed upon the bank in order to escape liability for such unauthorized payments, and the jury's conclusion as to the question of its negligence in this regard, based upon reasonable inferences from the evidence as above detailed, is binding on this appeal. Sommer v. Bank of Italy, etc., Ass'n, supra; Frankini v. Bank of America, etc., Ass'n, supra. Moreover, in other jurisdictions in cases wherein the failure to produce the checks at the trial, because of their previous destruction by the forger, presented the question of the effect of their negligent loss upon the depositor's right to recover thereon, judgment in favor of the depositor for the full amount of the forgeries has been sustained in view of the jury's finding on competent evidence that the bank was negligent in the first instance in passing the forged instruments. First Nat. Bank of Weslaco v. Patty, Tex.Civ.App., 62 S.W.2d 629; New York Produce Exchange Bank v. Houston, 2 Cir., 169 F. 785, 95 C.C.A. 251.

[24-26] Passing to a consideration of the matter of the instructions, there is nothing in the points advanced by the bank which calls for a reversal of the judgment. The first objection is directed against the latter portion of an instruction wherein the jury was charged that if it found that the bank was negligent in failing to detect the forgeries committed in November, 1938, then the bank would be responsible for all loss to the plaintiff proximately caused by that negligence, and that it "may consider under such a finding of negligence" the question of whether "that negligence was the proximate cause of the forger being enabled to continue his wrongdoing on any or all future checks and as well in determining whether or not the bank was negligent in the examination and payment of subsequent forged checks received * * * and charged to plaintiff's account." The term "proximate cause" was fully and correctly defined in the next instruction given to the jury. The bank argues that even though it was negligent in the payment of the forged checks during this first month, such circumstance in no event could be legally considered the proximate cause of the forger's continuance of his wrongdoing; and further, that the instruction was misleading in that it erroneously assumed that evidence was introduced showing that the forger predicated the pursuit of his fraudulent scheme upon his initial success in passing the forged instruments. However, an examination of the entire instruction reveals that it does not embody such assumption. It states merely that if the jury should find as a fact that the bank was negligent in cashing the November checks, the jury "may consider" such fact in determining whether it was the proximate cause of the forger continuing in his wrongdoing. Moreover, a complete answer to the bank's position relative to the effect of evidence of its negligence for the first month's unauthorized payments is furnished by one of the authorities cited and emphasized by the bank on another point, the well-considered case of Critten v. Chemical National Bank, 171 N.Y. 219, 63 N.E. 969, 57 L.R.A. 529, wherein the New York Court of Appeals stated in substance that it might well be found that had the bank not been negligent in failing to detect the first forgeries, the forger would not have been able to have continued with the subsequent series until the time of his arrest. Likewise pertinent is the analysis in Deer Island Fish & Oyster Co. v. First Nat. Bank, 166 Miss. 162, 146 So. 116, as to the possible consequence of the bank's original negligence in relation to the forger's continuance of his wrongdoing. Nor on this basis is there merit to the bank's final objection to this same instruction—that it erroneously failed to give recognition to the legal effect of the plaintiff's imputed knowledge as to the existence of the forgeries. This subject not only was properly treated in connection with this particular charge referable to the determinative correlation of duties of the respective parties, but also in several of the instructions which the trial court gave at the instance of the bank this matter was amply and carefully covered.

[27] The second instruction here under attack directed the jury that if it "should find from the evidence * * * that the * * * bank was negligent in failing to detect the forgery of Basch's checks, then the subsequent negligence of Basch, if any, or any failure to perform his duty to the bank in examining his monthly statements and cancelled checks with reasonable care * * * or any failure to report to the bank within a reasonable * * * time any errors * * * in his account will constitute no defense to the Bank." This charge, predicated upon the bank's obligation to establish its own freedom from negligence as a condition precedent to its exemption from liability, is in strict accord with the rules of law hereinabove discussed as applicable in the disposition of this case, and the bank's objection thereto is therefore untenable. As was said in Deer Island Fish & Oyster Co. v. First Nat. Bank, 166 Miss. 162, 178, 146 So. 116, 121: "It has been thought that a bank engaging in the business of depositing and paying out money on checks and other exchange is equipped to discover forgeries and to safely preserve its depositors' money. The bank holds out to the public that its officers and agents are skilled in all matters connected with, and relating to, its ability to detect and prevent forgery."

[28, 29] The court's refusal to give certain proposed instructions of the bank as quoted in its opening brief was required under the established authorities. The first of these contained the following erroneous statement of law with regard to the forgeries committed in the first month, November 1938: "In determining whether or not the bank failed to exercise ordinary care and prudence in the payment of the forgeries in this case, you are instructed not to take into consideration the forged checks charged to the statement of account delivered to plaintiff by defendant on or about December 1, 1938." The other two of these rejected instructions misstate the applicable doctrine of negligence in such situation as is here involved, for in connection with the respective references to the plaintiff's duty to examine his monthly bank statements and canceled checks, each instruction erroneously neglects to make proper allowance for the jury's consideration of evidence relating to the bank's liability in conformity with the legal proviso that in order to invoke the defense of the depositor's negligence—whether prior or subsequent to the dishonest employee's commission of the forgeries—the bank must show that it was free from negligence.

From the foregoing consideration of the points presented for review on this appeal, it is clear that the record presents no ground of reversible error, and the judgment is therefore affirmed.

SCHAUER, Justice (concurring).

I concur in the judgment on the ground that the defendant bank failed to establish its own freedom from negligence in any of the instances in which it honored forged checks against plaintiff's account and, hence, that negligence of the plaintiff is immaterial. Regardless of all other discussion, that one proposition is determinative of this appeal. (See Sommer v. Bank of Italy, etc., Ass'n (1930), 109 Cal.App. 370, 376, 293 P. 98; Union Tool Co. v. A plea of another action pending is merely dilatory.

Defense of res judicata constitutes bar to action if such defense is properly pleaded and proved, but does not oust court of jurisdiction.

3. Husband and wife 🔑295

In action by wife for separate maintenance, fact that wife was then receiving support from husband, pursuant to order of Virginia court in divorce suit filed therein by husband, was material evidence on hearing on order to show cause why temporary support should not be allowed wife.

4. Husband and wife 🔑289

Where husband against whom wife filed action in superior court for separate maintenance appeared in response to order to show cause with reference to temporary support, and filed affidavit in opposition to wife's application, superior court had jurisdiction of the parties.

5. Mandamus 🔑31

Where superior court, in action by wife for separate maintenance, issued order directing husband to show cause why husband should not be required to make payments for wife's temporary support and conducted hearing thereon, receiving husband's evidence as to divorce suit instituted by husband in Virginia, as well as wife's affidavit and complaint, and dismissed the proceeding, court thereby exercised "jurisdiction", and hence could not be compelled by writ of mandate to hear order to show cause on the merits thereof, notwithstanding superior court in dismissing suit may have believed that Virginia court had exclusive jurisdiction.

An order denying an application for temporary support and suit money is regarded as a "final judgment", and is directly appealable.

8. Appeal and error 🔑77(1)

Order dismissing order to show cause proceeding in action by wife for separate maintenance is equivalent of an order denying the application, and as such must be regarded as a "final judgment" in the order to show cause proceeding for purposes of appeal.

9. Appeal and error 🔑71(3)

Dismissal of order to show cause proceeding in action by wife for separate maintenance, which proceeding included application for injunction, constituted a denial of the application and hence was appealable. Code Civ.Proc. § 963.

Where, in proceeding by wife for writ of mandate to compel superior court to set order to show cause in wife's separate maintenance action for immediate hearing and determine the matter on its merits, it did not appear that writ of mandate would be more efficacious than appeal in mitigating the hardship or averting the prejudice which petitioner averred would result if writ were not allowed, the averment failed to state ground for issuance of the writ on ground that appeal would not furnish an "adequate remedy".

Mandamus may not be resorted to as a substitute for an adequate legal remedy, by appeal or otherwise.

12. Mandamus 🔑42

Fact that order of superior court dismissing order to show cause proceeding, in separate maintenance action by wife to compel payment of temporary support, may have constituted an abuse of discretion, did not by itself make mandamus proper remedy to correct the claimed error.

13. Mandamus 🔑3(3)

Judgment and discretion of trial court, both as to facts and as to law applicable thereto, in a matter within court's jurisdiction, cannot be controlled by writ of mandate where aggrieved party has a plain, speedy and adequate remedy in the ordinary course of law.

14. Mandamus 🔑31

A hearing conducted by trial court on order to show cause with reference to temporary support in wife's separate maintenance action, at which hearing court received proofs of both parties, considered such proofs, gave to the proofs what court thought was proper legal effect and dismissed the proceedings, was, jurisdictionally, a complete "trial" of the proceeding, precluding resort to mandamus proceeding to compel trial court to rehear the cause and to reverse its ruling.

In Bank.

Proceeding in mandamus by Dorothy C. Lincoln to compel the Superior Court of Los Angeles County to grant a hearing on an order to show cause with reference to alimony and attorney's fees.

Petition for peremptory writ of mandate denied.

Prior opinion, 132 P.2d 262.

Roger Marchetti, of Los Angeles, for petitioner.

Jerry Giesler, Meyer M. Willner, and Thornwell Rogers, all of Los Angeles, for respondent.

SCHAUER, Justice.

This is an application for a writ of mandate to compel a superior court to "set [an order to show cause in a separate maintenance suit] * * * for immediate hearing and to determine said matter on its merits." The application is before us on the petition for the writ and on the answer of the real party in interest and has been submitted upon the record of the proceedings in the trial court as reflected in such documents.

There are two controverted issues of fact which are to be determined upon the sufficiency of the evidence (the record of the proceedings in the trial court) to establish the allegations of the petition. The dispute is not as to the substance, but only as to the effect, of such evidence. Such issues are: (1) The petition alleges (and the answer in proper form denies all the averments) "That said Superior Court refused to hear or consider, and has not heard or considered said motion for temporary alimony, costs and attorney's fees or said order to show cause, and has held that it has no jurisdiction to hear or determine said motion or determine whether said plaintiff is entitled to relief thereby sought and will not do so unless required by order and mandate of this Court"; (2) The petition alleges (and the answer in proper form denies the averments) "That petitioner has no plain, speedy or adequate remedy at law; that the remedy by appeal is neither speedy nor adequate for the reason that the action of the court of which complaint is made can only be reviewed on appeal by appeal from the judgment to be rendered in said action,[1] and that even if a direct and immediate appeal was allowed by law the delay would result in great and unusual hardship to petitioner and prejudice her substantial rights in the determination of her case in said Superior Court." We find the record insufficient to sustain petitioner in either of the controverted issues.

An examination of the record discloses that petitioner filed an action for separate maintenance in the Superior Court of Los Angeles County and caused an order to show cause in re temporary support, etc., to be issued and served on her husband. He appeared on the date set by the order and by way of opposition to the wife's application filed his affidavit and presented exemplified records from the Circuit Court of Smyth County in the State of Virginia showing that the petitioner, previous to filing her complaint in the Superior Court in Los Angeles, had submitted herself to the jurisdiction of the Virginia court by filing a cross-complaint therein in a suit for divorce which had been instituted there by the husband, and that an order for petitioner's support had been made in that court and was being complied with by the husband.

[1-3] As an avowed premise for making the showing of the facts above epitomized, the defendant husband filed a written motion "to vacate, set aside and quash the order to show cause and affidavit" and declared that he "objects to the hearing of said order to show cause." The defendant's written motion specified two grounds: (1) that the superior court was "without jurisdiction to proceed with the hearing on said order to show cause by reason of the fact that there is another action [the Virginia suit] pending between the above named plaintiff and defendant covering the identical subject matter"; and (2) that "the matters to which the defendant Charles C. Lincoln is directed to appear and show cause are res *ad*judicata" by virtue of the Virginia proceedings. Neither of such grounds raises a jurisdictional point. A plea of another action pending is merely dilatory (1 Cal.Jur. 24, § 4; Conner v. Bank of Bakersfield (1917), 174 Cal. 400, 402, 163 P. 353) and the defense of res judicata, while it constitutes a bar to the later action if properly pleaded and proved, does not oust the court of jurisdiction (Rideaux v. Torgrimson (1939), 12 Cal.2d 633, 638, 86 P.2d 826; Brown v. Superior Court (1936), 13 Cal.App.2d 693, 695, 57 P.2d 965). The fact that the plaintiff was then receiving support from the defendant pursuant to a court order was, however, material evidence upon the hearing. See Smith v. Smith (1905), 147 Cal. 143, 81 P. 411. The order to show cause came on for hearing upon the complaint and plaintiff's affidavit upon which the order had been issued, and upon defendant's showing in opposition as heretofore set forth.

After receiving the evidence of the parties, as above related, the superior court made an order which is reflected in its minutes as follows: "Order to Show Cause re Alimony Pendente Lite, Costs, Attorney's Fees and Restraining Order comes on for hearing: plaintiff is present with her attorney, Roger Marchetti, and defendant is also present with his attorney, Jerry Giesler, who appears specially on the Motion to Quash. Defendant's Motion to Quash and Dismiss is granted." Petitioner now contends that the trial court, by the action above related, refused to exercise its jurisdiction to hear and determine the order to show cause, and seeks the mandate of this court to compel the superior court "at a specified time and place, to set said order to show cause * * * for immediate hearing and to determine said matter on its merits." The answer to petitioner's demand is that the superior court has exercised its jurisdiction and has conducted a hearing on the merits. Whether its order was erroneous is not now before us.

[1] Emphasis within quotations is added.

[4, 5] It is patent in the record that the superior court had jurisdiction of the cause and of the parties. It is likewise patent that the court exercised that jurisdiction by issuing its order directing the defendant to appear and show cause why he should not be required to make the payments and do the things recited in the order, by conducting the hearing on the order, by receiving and considering evidence, and by entertaining and granting a motion to dismiss. The defendant complied with the order to show cause by appearing and making the showing above narrated in opposition to petitioner's application. If the superior court had made an order in language to the effect that "plaintiff's application for alimony pendente lite, etc., is denied" or that "the order to show cause is discharged," this proceeding in mandamus probably would never have been instituted as it would have been unmistakably apparent that the court had entertained and passed on the plaintiff's application. However, by reason both of the form of defendant's motion to quash and the language of the court's order, the action actually taken by the court is confusingly portrayed. But the fact remains that the court did exercise jurisdiction in the premises when it (1) issued the order to show cause, (2) conducted the hearing thereon, receiving and considering defendant's evidence as to the Virginia court suit, as well as plaintiff's affidavit and her complaint, and (3) entertained the motion for and made its order dismissing the proceeding.

[6] The petition herein discloses that in addition to the written motion to quash the order to show cause the defendant, through his counsel, made an oral motion to dismiss the proceeding and that such motion to dismiss was granted. If the defendant in the trial court had confined himself to an objection to the proceeding therein, on the ground of want of jurisdiction, and if that court had merely sustained such objection and left the proceeding still pending, we should have an essentially different case: there would then appear a failure to exercise jurisdiction. But on the showing made the superior court did not stop there. Upon defendant's application it dismissed the proceeding. The effect is the same, so far as this mandamus application is concerned, as though the suit had been dismissed. An application for temporary alimony, while not a separate suit, is a collateral proceeding within the basic suit (1 Cal.Jur. p. 960, § 16) and is a proceeding for a separate judgment, independent of the final judgment in the action (Robbins v. Mulcrevy (1929), 101 Cal.App. 300, 301, 281 P. 668; Biltmore Drug Store v. Superior Court (1929), 101 Cal.App. 363, 365, 281 P. 710). That the trial judge in the case here involved may have believed that the Virginia court had exclusive jurisdiction is inconsequential. A mere belief in an erroneous proposition of law cannot oust a court of jurisdiction and does not establish a refusal to act. If the trial court here had acted in accordance with such a belief and merely sustained an objection to proceeding with the hearing, we should have a proper factual base, jurisdictionally, for the intervention of mandate. But we are concluded on this phase of the case by the fact that the court, regardless of what its theory may have been, in the action it took exercised its jurisdiction. Obviously, petitioner's allegation that the trial court refused to and did not hear, consider or determine her application for temporary alimony, etc., is not supported by the record.

[7-9] As to the second controverted issue of fact, that petitioner (plaintiff in the suit) has no plain, speedy or adequate remedy at law, the record likewise fails to sustain the averments of the petition. In fact, the petition itself is defective in this averment. The general allegation is qualified by the limited and specific one "that the remedy by appeal is neither speedy nor adequate for the reason that the action of the court of which complaint is made can only be reviewed on appeal by appeal from the judgment to be rendered in said action, and that even if a direct and immediate appeal was allowed by law the delay would result in great and unusual hardship to petitioner and prejudice her substantial rights in the determination of her case."

The first proposition declared in the above-quoted excerpt from the petition falls as a matter of law. Contrary to the allegation, an order denying an application for temporary support and suit money, etc., is directly appealable. 1 Cal.Jur., p. 966, sec. 20, and p. 993, § 47; White v. White (1890), 86 Cal. 212, 213, 24 P. 1030. It is regarded as a final judgment. Robbins v. Mulcrevy (1929), supra, 101 Cal.App. 300, 301, 281 P. 668; Biltmore Drug Store v. Superior Court (1929), supra, 101 Cal.App.

363, 365, 281 P. 710. The order dismissing the order to show cause proceeding is the equivalent of an order denying the application and as such must be regarded as a final judgment in that proceeding for purposes of appeal (see 9 Cal.Jur. 524, § 16; Dowling v. Polack (1861), 18 Cal. 625, 628; Associated Oil Co. v. Mullin (1930), 110 Cal. App. 385, 391, 294 P. 421). Furthermore, the proceeding in the instant case included an application for an injunction. The dismissal constituted a denial of that application and was appealable under the terms of section 963 of the Code of Civil Procedure specifically applicable to injunction proceedings. See Associated Oil Co. v. Mullin, supra.

[10, 11] The second or alternative proposition, averred in the above-quoted excerpt from the petition, "that even if a direct and immediate appeal was allowed by law the delay would result in great and unusual hardship to petitioner and prejudice her substantial rights in the determination of her case," appears to be no more pertinent to the delay ensuing from an appeal than it is to the delay which is ordinarily entailed in a proceeding for a writ of mandate. It does not appear that mandamus would be any more efficacious than appeal in mitigating the hardship or averting the prejudice. No sound basis has been shown for concluding that petitioner's remedy by appeal is not plain, speedy and adequate. If we hold that she is entitled to a writ of mandate upon the showing here, we shall be laying the foundation for the contention that, regardless of the availability of a remedy by appeal, a party is entitled to the writ to correct errors at law in the trial of a case where the court in the exercise of its jurisdiction erroneously grants a nonsuit or excludes pertinent evidence or misconstrues a statute. We reaffirm that "Mandamus may not be resorted to as a substitute for an adequate legal remedy by appeal or otherwise." Andrews v. Police Court (1943), 21 Cal.2d 479, 480, 133 P.2d 398.

Notwithstanding the fact that the averments of her petition are not supported in the material elements noted above, petitioner contends in effect that the trial court egregiously erred in its rulings of law on the hearing, that it abused its discretion in granting the motion to dismiss, and that such errors may properly be corrected by mandamus. As support for this proposition she relies principally on the case of MacPherson v. Superior Court (1937), 22 Cal. App.2d 425, 71 P.2d 91, 94. In that case the proceeding in the trial court was an order to show cause in re contempt for failure to deliver custody of children to the plaintiff in obedience to a prior order. The defendant there attempted to appear specially by his attorneys to object to the jurisdiction of the court, but filed two motions, one for the purpose of striking out certain portions of the "Petition for Order to Show Cause and the Affidavit in Support" thereof on the ground that such portions were "irrelevant, immaterial, surplusage, sham and conclusions of law," and the other "for the purpose of moving to quash and/or dismiss and/or strike Order to Show Cause and Petition and Affidavit * * * and to quash service of Order to Show Cause." Obviously, each of the two motions asked the court for some relief which could be granted only by the exercise of general jurisdiction over both the cause and the parties, and it was correctly held that the defendant by asking such relief submitted himself to the jurisdiction of the court. That court, however, held that it had no jurisdiction over the person of the defendant and apparently granted the motion to quash the service of the order to show cause. It does not appear that any other relief was granted by the trial court. Therefore, while in that case the defendant subjected himself to the court's jurisdiction by the relief he asked, the court by limiting the relief it granted to the jurisdictional point, created a situation where mandamus was an available remedy, viz., to compel it to exercise the jurisdiction which it possessed but refused to exercise. It may be noted that the question as to whether an appeal was the appropriate remedy is not discussed in that case and apparently no contention was (or properly could have been) made that the criticized order was appealable.

Another case relied upon by petitioner is Smith v. Superior Court (1937), 21 Cal. App.2d 160, 69 P.2d 176. That case also was an application for a writ of mandamus and an issue of fact seems to have been raised and disposed of in the District Court of Appeal. That court at page 163 of 21 Cal.App.2d at page 177, of 69 P.2d, says that at the hearing in question "it was urged that the superior court had no jurisdiction to make the order * * * and the said order was beyond the jurisdiction of the court. Thereupon the superior court sustained said objections and held that the order was beyond the jurisdiction of the court, and refused to enforce the order * * *." Furthermore, depicting what it found to be the factual basis for its conclusion, it said: "It is the contention of respondent in regard to the foregoing that the court did not hold that the order of July 14, 1936, was beyond the jurisdiction of the court, but alleged that the court did hear the matter and found that defendant was not guilty of contempt and dismissed said proceeding. With this contention we do not agree." The opinion then quotes from a memorandum of the trial judge, which apparently was included in the record, and construes such memorandum as a holding by the court that it was without jurisdiction. The District Court of Appeal also construed the order of the trial court "that the pending contempt proceedings be dismissed," coupled with the memorandum opinion of such trial court, as evidence that it "did not hear and determine the contempt proceedings, but expressly refused to hear the same * * *." Thus, in the light of the factual inferences it drew, its decision on the law is not in conflict with our views. It will be noted, also, that the matter involved was a contempt proceeding, and that there was no contention that the attacked order was appealable.

[12] On behalf of petitioner it is also argued, in effect, that even if the trial court did exercise (and act within) its jurisdiction in the premises, nevertheless its action in dismissing the proceeding upon the showing made was error, and that such error properly can be corrected by mandate because the order was an abuse of discretion and mandamus is a proper remedy for controlling a lower court in the exercise of its discretion. Assuming, as contended for by petitioner, that the order did constitute an abuse of discretion, such circumstance does not by itself make mandamus a proper remedy. It is only when an abuse of discretion is manifest that a trial judge's order respecting temporary alimony, suit money, etc., will be disturbed on appeal. See 1 Cal.Jur. p. 966, § 20, and p. 994, § 47; Rose v. Rose (1895), 109 Cal. 544, 546, 42 P. 452; Smith v. Smith (1905), supra, 147 Cal. 143, 145, 81 P. 411; Stewart v. Stewart (1909), 156 Cal. 651, 656, 105 P. 955.

[13] As to mandamus as a means of controlling a lower court in the exercise of its discretion, it was declared in Hilmer v. Superior Court (1934), 220 Cal. 71, 73, 29 P.2d 175, 176, that "It is well settled that mandamus will not lie to control the discretion of a court or judicial officer or to compel its exercise in a particular manner, except in those rare instances when under the facts it can be legally exercised in but one way." Such statement approaches being paradoxical in its implication that any area of discretion remains when "it can be legally exercised in but one way." The quoted statement is followed by the court's interpretation of its own language, "Stated differently, a court can be compelled to act, but, having acted, its act cannot be reviewed on mandamus." It thus appears that the crux of the holding is that by mandamus a lower court may be compelled to act jurisdictionally but cannot by that means be compelled to act correctly. At least where there is a remedy by appeal, as long as it acts within, and does exercise, its jurisdiction, an erroneous act equally with one which is legally correct gives it immunity from control by mandamus. The doctrine from the Hilmer case above quoted was reiterated by this court in O'Bryan v. Superior Court (1941), 18 Cal. 2d 490, 496, 116 P.2d 49, 136 A.L.R. 595. Enunciating the same principle, in an earlier case (Stearns v. Superior Court (1919), 44 Cal.App. 285, 288, 186 P. 390, 391) the District Court of Appeal in discussing the refusal of a trial court to include a certain provision in a judgment said, "Whether the trial court be right or wrong in so deciding is not involved in this proceeding, since if the court erroneously denies plaintiff a judgment warranted by the findings, her remedy, as in other cases, is by an appeal. No principle is better settled than that the judgment and discretion of the trial court, both as to the facts and as to the law applicable thereto, in a matter within its jurisdiction, cannot, where the aggrieved party has a plain, speedy, and adequate remedy in the ordinary course of law, be controlled by writ of mandate."

In the case out of which this proceeding arose, the defendant's motion to dismiss and the evidence which he presented to the trial court did not constitute a mere objection to the jurisdiction of such court. On the contrary, such procedure was a challenge on the merits to the plaintiff's application and called for an affirmative exercise of jurisdiction by the court. This was not a situation where the court's discretion could "be legally exercised in but one way" and where there was no remedy by appeal for an error in, or abuse of, such discretion.

[14] As shown by the record, the trial court conducted a hearing on the mooted order to show cause. It had before it and received the proofs both of plaintiff and of defendant. It considered such proofs, gave to them what it thought was their proper legal effect, and made its order dismissing the proceeding. This was, jurisdictionally, a complete trial of such proceeding. Hence, the only objects that would be attained by granting the writ applied for would be to require the trial judge (1) to reverse his ruling in granting the motion to quash and the motion to dismiss, and (2) to resume the hearing of the order to show cause and dispose of it either differently as to result or on a different ground. In other words, the legal objective sought to be attained by the writ is not to compel the trial court to hear and determine a cause, but rather to compel it to rehear and redetermine and reverse its ruling on a question of law in a cause it has heard and determined. That it might on such rehearing receive additional evidence, or give different legal effect to the evidence it had received, is beside the point. If we issue the writ for such purposes the effect will be to make the mandamus proceeding the mere alternative or substantially the counterpart of an appeal in its overlapping functions. We are not willing to give it such scope of application, being of the opinion that the orderly and expeditious dispatch of judicial proceedings in the several tribunals of the State will best be served by preserving disparate in their respective functions, as in their origins, bases and historical objects, the ordinary legal remedy of appeal and the extraordinary equitable remedy of mandamus.

[15] In all legal aspects petitioner's case is precisely the same as was before the District Court of Appeal in Brock v. Superior Court (1931), 119 Cal.App. 5, 5 P.2d 659. There the trial court in refusing to grant an application for temporary support, etc., entered in its minutes the statement that its action was taken "on account of this Court not having jurisdiction to award temporary attorney fees, costs, or support on two grounds; that the child is not within the jurisdiction of this Court, also that provisions in section 137, Civ. Code, in re Attorney's fees, costs and support money do not apply in this case." The District Court of Appeal in denying a petition for a writ of mandamus in that case said, "It thus appears that the court did not deny its jurisdiction to pass upon the application. It did pass upon and determine said application, but refused the requested allowance, because the court was of the opinion that it did not have authority to make such allowance" under the circumstances there depicted. Exactly the same statement is appropriate to the case before us. It is a general rule that the reasons which motivate a trial court in reaching its decision are immaterial on review. As stated in 2 California Judisprudence 810, § 476, "it is judicial action, and not judicial reasoning or argument, which is the subject of review." See Davey v. Southern Pacific Co. (1897), 116 Cal. 325, 329, 330, 48 P. 117; International, etc., Workers v. Landowitz (1942), 20 Cal.2d 418, 423, 126 P.2d 609; Stearns v. Superior Court (1919), supra, 44 Cal.App. 285, 287, 186 P. 390. It cannot be successfully urged here that the court denied its jurisdiction when the record shows that by the action it took it exercised that jurisdiction.

Petitioner's medium for presenting the points complained of lies in an appeal. The alternative writ of mandate heretofore issued in this cause by the District Court of Appeal is discharged and the petition for a peremptory writ is denied.

GIBSON, Chief Justice.

This is an appeal from a judgment entered upon the granting of defendants' motion for nonsuit made at the close of the plaintiff's opening statement in an action for malicious prosecution. At the beginning of the trial, plaintiff stated he would prove the following facts: On May 14, 1938, plaintiff was arrested on a complaint filed by defendant Southern California Edison Company Ltd. which charged him with violating section 499a of the Penal Code by making or causing a connection to be made with an electric wire operated by the company, and using or causing such connection to be used in such manner as to consume electric current which did not pass through a meter for measuring and registering the same. Plaintiff was tried on this charge before a jury in the justice's court and found guilty. On appeal the judgment of conviction was reversed and the cause remanded for new trial. Thereafter the complaint was dismissed at the request of the district attorney and an amended complaint was filed which, in addition to repeating the averments contained in the original complaint, charged plaintiff with further violating section 499a by altering and procuring to be injured and altered an electric meter and using or causing the same to be used. Plaintiff was rearrested and again tried before a jury in the justice's court and upon plaintiff's motion a dismissal was entered because of "insufficiency of evidence to establish the charge." Plaintiff was thereupon discharged and no further criminal proceedings were taken against him.

[1] The motion for nonsuit was made on the grounds "1. that there was no final and legal termination of the * * * criminal cause upon the amended complaint in favor of the plaintiff * * * 2. that * * * conviction on the original complaint * * * conclusively shows probable cause for the criminal prosecution under both the original and the amended complaints." The motion was granted on the first ground, but we find it unnecessary to determine the issue presented thereby because if we were to assume a favorable termination, the judgment of nonsuit would nevertheless have to be affirmed on the second ground. See Paul v. Layne & Bowler Corp., 9 Cal.2d 561, 71 P.2d 817. An appellate court is concerned with the correctness of a trial court's action and not with the reasons assigned therefor. 2 Cal.Jur. 808, § 476, and authorities there collected.

[2, 3] In an action to recover damages for malicious prosecution the plaintiff must prove that the proceedings complained of were prosecuted without probable cause. McAfee v. Los Angeles Gas, etc., Corp., 215 Cal. 219, 9 P.2d 212; Holliday v. Holliday, 123 Cal. 26, 55 P. 703; see cases cited in 16 Cal.Jur. 737, § 9. Conviction of a defendant is conclusive evidence, in the absence of fraud, of the existence of probable cause for the prosecution (Roos v. Harris, 203 Cal. 201, 263 P. 225; see Jaffe v. Stone, 18 Cal.2d 146, 114 P.2d 335, 135 A.L.R. 775; Prosser, Torts, 878), even though the conviction is reversed on appeal. Holliday v. Holliday, supra; Carpenter v. Sibley, 153 Cal. 215, 94 P. 879, 15 L.R.A.,N.S., 1143, 126 Am.St.Rep. 77, 15 Ann.Cas. 484; Eustace v. Dechter, 53 Cal.App.2d 726, 128 P.2d 367; Norton v. John M. C. Marble Co., 30 Cal.App.2d 451, 86 P.2d 892; Bullock v. Morrison, 118 Cal. App. 112, 4 P.2d 812; see Dowdell v. Carpy, 129 Cal. 168, 61 P. 948; Black v. Knight, 44 Cal.App. 756, 187 P. 89; Rest. of the Law of Torts, 667.

Plaintiff was convicted of violating section 499a and it is not claimed such conviction was procured by fraud. Plaintiff contends, however, that his conviction upon the original complaint does not constitute conclusive evidence that there was probable cause for the proceedings upon the amended complaint. He argues that section 499a creates four different crimes, and that although both the original and amended complaints charged a violation of the section, the former merely accused him of making or causing a connection to be made with an electric wire and using or causing the same to be used, while the latter also accused him of altering or procuring the alteration and injury of an electric meter and using or causing the same to be used.

[4] Section 499a provides as follows: "Every person who shall willfully, and knowingly with intent to injure or defraud, make or cause to be made any connection * * * with any electric wire or * * * appliance * * * operated by any * * * corporation authorized to generate, transmit and sell electric current, or who shall so willfully and knowingly with intent to injure or defraud, use or cause to be used any such connection in such manner as to supply any electric current * * * to any * * * apparatus * * * by or at which electric current * * * is consumed or otherwise used or wasted, without passing through a meter for the measuring and registering of the quantity passing through such electric wire * * *, or who shall, knowingly and with like intent injure, alter or procure to be injured or altered any electric meter, or obstruct its working, or procure the same to be tampered with or injured, or use or cause to be used any electric meter * * * so tampered with or injured, shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor." Contrary to plaintiff's contention, the statute does not define four or any other number of separate offenses. It defines a single offense and "enumerates a series of acts, either of which separately, or all together, may constitute the offense." People v. Clemett, 208 Cal. 142, 280 P. 681, 682; People v. Twedt, 1 Cal.2d 392, 35 P.2d 324; People v. McClennegen, 195 Cal. 445, 234 P. 91; People v. Gusti, 113 Cal. 177, 45 P. 263; People v. Thompson, 111 Cal. 242, 43 P. 748; People v. Leyshon, 108 Cal. 440, 41 P. 480; People v. Shotwell, 27 Cal. 394; People v. Kinsley, 118 Cal.App. 593, 5 P.2d 938; People v. Kuder, 93 Cal.App. 42, 269 P. 198, 630.

[5-7] In the Clemett case, supra, the defendant was convicted under separate counts charging possession and operation of a still. This court reversed the conviction on the possession count, declaring (page 144 of 208 Cal., page 681 of 280 P.) that "As early as People v. Shotwell, 27 Cal. 394, and People v. Frank, 28 Cal. 507, it was held that co-operative acts constituting but one offense, when committed by the same person at the same time, when combined, charge but one crime, and but one punishment can be inflicted as one offense. 'Where a statute makes two or more distinct acts connected with the same transaction indictable, each one of which may be considered as representing a stage in the same offense, it has in many cases been ruled they may be coupled in one count. Thus, setting up a gaming table, it has been said, may be an entire offense; keeping a gaming table, and inducing others to bet upon it, may also constitute a distinct offense; for either, unconnected with the other, an indictment will lie. Yet, when both are perpetrated by the same person, at the same time, they constitute but one offense, for which one count is sufficient, and for which but one penalty can be inflicted.' Wharton, Criminal Law, approved in People v. Shotwell, 27 Cal. 394. Again, in People v. Frank, 28 Cal. 507, it was said: 'The indictment is good, whether it be regarded as containing two counts or but one. Where, in defining an offense, a statute enumerates a series of acts, either of which separately, or all together, may constitute the offense, all such acts may be charged in a single count, for the reason that notwithstanding each act may by itself constitute the offense, all of them together do no more, and likewise constitute but one and the same offense.'"

The same rule is announced in the Twedt case, supra, page 398 of 1 Cal.2d, 35 P.2d 324, where it was separately charged that defendant offered for sale, negotiated for the sale of and sold securities in violation of the Corporate Securities Act.

Under this rule the Criminal Syndicalism Act was held to embrace but one offense although the inhibited acts were in no way included in one another and the commission of each act required proof of facts additional to those involved in the others. People v. McClennegen, 195 Cal. 445, 452, 234 P. 91.

In People v. Thompson, supra, a statute penalizing such acts as throwing a switch, removing a rail, or placing any obstruction on any railroad with the intention of derailing any train, boarding a train with the intention of robbing the same, placing dynamite or other explosive material on any track with the intention of blowing up or derailing any train, and setting fire to any bridge or trestle with the intent of wrecking a train was in like manner construed to define but a single offense. The court stated that the whole tenor and purpose of the act is directed toward the suppression of train wrecking.

[8] It is apparent from the terms of section 499a that it was intended to prevent the theft of electricity by the methods specified therein. In commenting on section 498 of the Penal Code which has to do with the theft of illuminating gas by a series of acts similar to those specified in section 499a involving the theft of electricity, this court remarked that "The essence of the offense is the use of gas by any contrivance and under the circumstances denounced by the statute in such manner as to supply such gas 'without passing through any meter provided for the measuring and registering the quantity of gas' so used." McAfee v. Los Angeles Gas, etc., Corp., 215 Cal. 219, 9 P.2d 212, 214. The fact that a technical name is not given to the offense is immaterial. People v. Thompson, supra. The four prohibited acts embraced in the single sentence composing section 499a are all means by which the theft of electricity is accomplished or made possible. They are, in that sense, "cooperative acts." See People v. Shotwell, supra; People v. Frank, 28 Cal. 507; People v. Twedt, supra; People v. Clemett, supra. To be punishable, each act must be committed willfully and knowingly with the "intent to injure or defraud."

[9-11] Various tests are applied in determining whether statutes are intended to create one or more offenses. The identity of intent fixed by the statute in the doing of all the prohibited acts is said to indicate a single offense. People v. Thompson, supra. Whether the indictable acts may be considered as representing a stage in the commission of the same offense is also a guide to construction. Wharton on Criminal Law, cited with approval in People v. Shotwell, supra; People v. Frank, supra; People v. Clemett, supra; People v. Twedt, supra. The considerations suggested by both tests to support the conclusion that a statute defines a single offense are found in section 499a. The charges preferred against plaintiff were based upon the same transaction, and clearly it was not the legislative intention to impose multiple penalties under the section where, as part of a single transaction, a person with intent to defraud commits any one or more of the several inhibited acts.

Our conclusion that the section enunciates a series of acts constituting but a single offense is not in conflict with the decision in Matter of Roberts, 157 Cal. 472, 108 P. 315, and People v. Plath, 166 Cal. 227, 135 P. 954, relied on by appellant. Those cases involved a construction of section 337a of the Penal Code, relating to gambling by pool-selling, book-making, bets, and wagers. After it was pointed out that section 337a covered such different acts as the making of a lease by the owner of property and the making of a bet between two individuals, it was properly held that several distinct offenses were described therein. The cited cases declare that the enumerated acts "are apparently as distinct and independent of each other as if they had been enacted in separate sections" Matter of Roberts, supra, 157 Cal. 474, 108 P. 315, and "there is no necessary connection between them" People v. Plath, supra, 166 Cal. 231, 135 P. 956. Thus, the very marked difference in the essential qualities of the prohibited acts required the conclusion that the Legislature intended to define separate and distinct offenses. The conclusion was fortified in the Plath case by the fact that the Legislature had placed the inhibited acts in separate and distinct enumerated subdivisions. There is nothing in the nature of the acts specified in section 499a nor in the structure of the section, however, which necessitates such a conclusion here.

[12] As stated above, the whole tenor and purpose of section 499a is directed against the theft of electricity and, in our opinion, the section states but one offense. It follows that the conviction of plaintiff on the original complaint charging a violation thereof conclusively established that there was probable cause for the prosecution and that the proceeding on the amended complaint was merely a retrial necessitated by the reversal of the conviction.

The judgment is affirmed.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Thomas C. Gould, Judge.

In the matter of the estate of Diane Axcelrod, also known as Daine Axcelrod and Diane Wilence. On a petition by Ben Wilence to determine heirship. From an order establishing the heirship of Etta Pocker, also known as Hattie Parker, and others, petitioner appeals.

Affirmed.

Louise Mason, of Los Angeles, for respondents.

A. Joseph Shapiro and Irving Friedman, both of Los Angeles, for Etta Pocker, contestant and respondent.

McCOMB, Justice.

From an order establishing heirship, petitioner appeals. The appeal is on the judgment roll alone.

The essential facts are:

Diane Wilence executed a will December 9, 1935, which contained, among others, the following provisions:

"Sixth. I have intentionally omitted all of my heirs who are not specifically mentioned herein, intending thereby to disinherit them, and if any such persons, or heirs, or any devisees or legatees under this Will, or their successors in interest, shall either directly or indirectly seek to establish or assert any claims to my estate or any part thereof, excepting under this Will, or attack, oppose or seek to set aside the probate of this Will, or to impair, invalidate or set aside its provisions, or any of them, or to have the same or any part thereof, or any legacy herein contained eliminated, declared void or diminished, or to defeat or change any part of the testamentary plan of this Will, directly or indirectly, either in Court or out of Court, or shall endeavor to secure or take any part of my estate in any manner other than through or under this Will, then in any or all of the above mentioned cases and events, I hereby give and bequeath to such person or persons the sum of One ($1.00) Dollar and no more, in lieu of any other share or interest in my said estate * * *."

On April 17, 1936, the testatrix married Ben Wilence, petitioner herein. Diane Wilence died November 3, 1941. Thereafter her will was duly admitted to probate, and after the time for presenting claims had elapsed petitioner filed a Petition to Determine Heirship in which he alleged that respondents were the heirs named by decedent in her will executed December 9, 1935; that said will was revoked by his marriage to decedent after the will had been executed, and that as a result he was entitled to one-half of decedent's estate. The petition then prayed that the probate court determine who were entitled to the estate of the decedent.

The court made findings against petitioner's claim and found that the persons named in the will of the testatrix were the heirs of decedent and that as a result petitioner was not entitled to one-half of decedent's estate.

Respondents did not file any pleading in response to the petition.

It is necessary for us to determine two questions which will be stated and answered hereunder seriatim.

[1] First: Was an issue created in the trial court in view of the fact that respondents did not file any pleading in response to petitioner's Petition to Determine Heirship?

This question must be answered in the affirmative. Allegations in a petition to determine heirship are deemed to be denied. (Section 1080 of the Probate Code.) Under the foregoing rule it is evident that, since the allegations of the Petition to Determine Heirship filed by petitioner were deemed denied, issues of fact were created for the determination of the trial court.

[2] Second: Was there substantial evidence to sustain the trial court's findings of fact?

This question must likewise be answered in the affirmative. The law is established in California that where the appeal is on the judgment roll alone the findings of fact will be conclusively presumed to be supported by the evidence. (Estate of Mautner, 38 Cal.App.2d 521, 522, 101 P.2d 520; Estate of Woods, 23 Cal.App.2d 187, 191, 72 P.2d 258.)

Therefore applying the foregoing rule to the facts of the instant case, since the appeal is on the judgment roll alone, the findings of fact are conclusively presumed to be supported by evidence, and as no error appears on the face of the judgment roll the order must be affirmed.

The order appealed from is affirmed.

MOORE, P. J., concurs.

WOOD, Justice (dissenting).

I dissent. In his brief appellant makes the positive statement that no evidence was offered or received at the hearing in the trial court. Respondents do not deny this statement but impliedly admit that no evidence was presented. There was no issue of fact to be decided and there was no occasion for the making of findings by the trial court. Waller v. Weston, 125 Cal. 201, 57 P. 892. Although the document which the court filed under the heading, Findings of Fact, contains the direct statement that appellant was married to the executrix subsequent to the execution of the will, it also contains statements which under the circumstances are erroneous conclusions of law, especially the statement that appellant "was one of the class of persons included within the meaning of the word 'heirs' as used in Section Six of said will".

The intent of the testatrix must be determined as of the date of the execution of the will. Estate of Carter, 49 Cal.App.2d 251, 254, 121 P.2d 540. On that date appellant was not the husband of the testatrix and did not become her husband until more than four months later. Section 70 of the Probate Code provides: "If a person marries after making a will, and the spouse survives the maker, the will is revoked as to the spouse, unless provision has been made for the spouse by marriage contract, or unless the spouse is provided for in the will, or in such way mentioned therein as to show an intention not to make such provision; and no other evidence to rebut the presumption of revocation can be received." In my opinion the testatrix by inserting the sixth provision in her will was merely adopting the means in common use of preventing a contest of the will or of its provisions. She was not providing for her future husband in the will or mentioning him in such way as to show an intention not to make such a provision. See Estate of Rozen-Goldberg, 1 Cal.App.2d 631, 37 P.2d 132. No claim is made that there was a marriage contract. In my opinion the will was revoked as to appellant by the marriage of the executrix to him after the making of the will.

It is matter of common experience that children of tender years are guided in their actions by childish instincts and lacking in discretion ordinarily sufficient to enable persons of more mature years to appreciate and avoid danger.

It is "negligence" to leave unguarded and exposed to little children's observation dangerous and attractive machinery, which they would naturally be tempted to go about or upon and against danger of which action their immature judgment interposes no warning or defense.

See Words and Phrases, Permanent Edition, for all other definitions of "Negligence".

A person inviting children on his premises is subject to standard of care required to be exercised by landowners toward infant trespassers in turn-table or "attractive nuisance" cases.

See Words and Phrases, Permanent Edition, for all other definitions of "Attractive Nuisance".

The rule of turn-table or "attractive nuisance" cases as to care required of landowners for safety of infant trespassers applies to department store owner as respects danger of small child catching fingers in store escalator, though such apparatus cannot be constructed without sufficient space between its moving parts to receive such a child's fingers and such rule does not apply unless danger can be easily guarded against without impairing usefulness of instrumentality, as protection against such danger may be effected by stationing guards at places of danger.

9. Negligence 🔑136(16, 19, 24)

In action against department store owner for injuries to four year old boy catching his hand in store escalator, whether escalator was object naturally attractive to children, whether defendant, in exercise of ordinary care, should have known such fact and anticipated such an accident, and whether ordinary care required placing of guard at escalator, were fact questions for jury under evidence.

The floor manager of store department, wherein customer's four year old boy was injured as result of catching his hand in escalator, regarding which such manager had no responsibility except to stop and start it in case of accident, was not liable to boy for damages under "attractive nuisance" doctrine.

11. Negligence 🔑8

A store department manager, reversing escalator in order to release customer's infant child's hand from comb plate, instead of calling mechanics to remove plate, which would have required 15 or 20 minutes, was not guilty of "negligence" rendering him liable to child for loss of parts of his fingers, even if such reversal aggravated child's injuries.

In action against department store owner and department manager for injuries to customer's child catching his hand in store escalator, "res ipsa loquitur" doctrine was inapplicable as against either defendant.

See Words and Phrases, Permanent Edition, for all other definitions of "Res Ipsa Loquitur Doctrine".

A fundamental element of "res ipsa loquitur" doctrine is that thing causing injury sued for be under defendant's management and control.

14. Negligence 🔑121(2)

The reason for "res ipsa loquitur" rule is that injured person is ordinarily in no position to know more than that he was injured by some unusual movement of instrumentality, whereas one operating it should know and be able to explain precise cause of accident.

Where evidence affirmatively shows that operator or manager of instrumentality, by means of which injuries are inflicted on another, has no superior knowledge of, or is unable by exercise of reasonable care to secure information regarding, cause of accident, or establishes fact that injured person has all such knowledge or information reasonably accessible to operator, "res ipsa loquitur" doctrine is inapplicable.

When cause of injury sued for is established by either party to action, "res ipsa loquitur" doctrine is inapplicable.

A wife's negligence in caring for spouses' children is imputable to husband and a defense to his action in behalf of community to recover damages for children's injuries to which such negligence contributed.

18. Negligence 🔑136(30)

In action against department store owner for injuries to minor child catching his hand in store escalator, whether plaintiff's mother, who took plaintiff to store, was guilty of contributory negligence in failing to keep proper watch over plaintiff and prevent accident held for jury under evidence.

An action by husband to recover amount paid by him from his separate property for medical, hospital and nursing treatment of his minor son for injuries sustained as result of defendant's negligence should not be regarded as brought in behalf of community of plaintiff and his wife, so that her contributory negligence in failing to keep proper watch over child is no defense to such action.

One who is not a party to record in action may not appeal from judgment rendered, but person against whom judgment is entered, though not a party to action, becomes sufficiently a party to record to entitle him to appeal.

21. Judgment 🔑243

A judgment against one who is not party to action in which it is rendered is erroneous.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Ruben S. Schmidt, Judge.

Action by Takashi Kataoka, by his guardian ad litem, and Tsutomu Kataoka against the May Department Stores Company and Jerry Goddard for personal injuries to first named plaintiff and medical, hospital and nursing expenses incurred by last named plaintiff. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiffs and Toki Kataoka appeal.

Affirmed as to defendant Goddard against plaintiffs, reversed and remanded for a new trial as to defendant company, and reversed as to appellant Toki Kataoka.

Albert E. Coger, of Los Angeles, for appellants.

Schell & Delamer, of Los Angeles, for respondents.

SHAW, Justice pro tem.

This action is brought to recover damages for personal injuries suffered by plaintiff, Takashi Kataoka, who was, when he was injured, a boy four years of age. The first three counts of the complaint set forth, in varying forms, his cause of action to recover damages for his own injuries. In a fourth count, plaintiff Tsutomu Kataoka, who is the father of the other plaintiff, seeks recovery of liabilities he has incurred for medical, hospital and nursing treatment for his son. In the following opinion the word "plaintiff" will be used to designate the plaintiff Takashi Kataoka, unless otherwise indicated. Both plaintiffs appeal from a judgment against them entered after a directed verdict in favor of defendants.

The defendant corporation conducts a large department store in the city of Los Angeles. At the time plaintiff was injured this store had, upon its third floor, a department selling infants' and children's wear, for babies and for children between the ages of two and six. Plaintiff's mother went to this department to exchange a suit bought for another of her children, taking plaintiff with her. While she waited for and talked to the manager of this department (defendant Goddard) the plaintiff was walking around at a distance of about 15 feet from her. In the store were a series of escalators for carrying the public from floor to floor, and the place where plaintiff was walking around on the third floor was quite near to the lower end of the escalator coming down from the fourth floor to the third floor. When plaintiff's mother started to talk to defendant Goddard she called plaintiff to come to her. He was then two or three feet from the escalator and she saw him come two or three feet toward her. After that she talked to Goddard two or three minutes without observing plaintiff. At the end of that time she heard plaintiff cry and she and Goddard rushed to him and found his right hand caught in the escalator.

This escalator had at its lower end, fastened to the floor where the moving steps disappeared under the floor, a device designated as a "comb plate," the purpose of which was, if some passenger did not lift his feet up, to slide them gradually up on the plate. This comb plate had forty or fifty teeth 3½ inches long and 9/16 inch apart, which were sloped up slightly and so were somewhat thicker where they joined the comb plate than at their tips. Between the comb plate and the steps as they passed under it there was a space about 1/4 inch deep. There was no guard or attendant stationed at this or any of the escalators at the time of the accident, although on busy days it was the custom to have such an attendant.

Plaintiff's hand was caught in the space between the comb plate and the steps passing under it. Goddard stopped the escalator, took hold of plaintiff's wrist and tried to pull his hand out, but was unable to do so. Then he got a key which was kept nearby and reversed the escalator. When it started going in the opposite direction plaintiff's hand at once came out. Two fingers were mangled, crushed and cut off, so that now only short stumps are left and the back of his hand was "torn and blistered like," as his mother put it.

No witness saw plaintiff just before his hand was caught and hence there is no direct testimony disclosing how it happened. The theory of plaintiff's counsel is that plaintiff was attracted to the escalator by its bright appearance and moving steps, went to it and in childish curiosity reached out his hand to investigate the steps and thus got caught. Confirmatory of this theory, there is testimony by plaintiff's mother that "he was very active and he was very much interested in everything, like a boy. He was always breaking it up and trying to look into the inside, and things like that * * * he was very anxious to know everything that was around him." There is also testimony that the sidewalls of the escalator were of steel or chrome and the steps of steel. It had been installed only ten months to a year before the accident, so each of these metals was probably bright at that time. A moving device like an escalator would attract the attention of most children of plaintiff's age, but especially that of one with such an active curiosity as that shown by his mother's description of plaintiff. Defendants suggest other possible causes for the plaintiff's mishap, but we think the jury would have been warranted by the evidence in accepting that advanced in plaintiff's behalf.

[1, 2] The question here for decision is whether, on the foregoing facts, and a few others which we shall mention as they become pertinent to our discussion, the court should have directed a verdict for defendants. The power of the court in passing upon such a motion is strictly limited. It has no power to weigh the evidence, but must view it in the light most favorable to the party against whom the direction is asked and accept every inference and presumption in his favor that may legitimately be drawn therefrom, and the motion can be granted only when, on such a consideration of the evidence, the result is a determination that there is no evidence of sufficient substantiality to support a verdict in favor of that party if one were given. Gish v. Los Angeles Ry. Corp., 1939, 13 Cal.2d 570, 573, 90 P.2d 792; Newson v. Hawley, 1928, 205 Cal. 188, 190, 270 P. 364; Wiswell v. Shinners, 1941, 47 Cal.App.2d 156, 159, 163, 117 P.2d 677; Barty v. Collins, 1930, 109 Cal.App. 94, 96, 292 P. 979.

[3-6] In answering the question above put as to the propriety of the directed verdict, we deal with the defendants separately, reaching different answers for each of them. We take up first the case of the defendant corporation. Plaintiff contends that it was required to exercise the highest degree of care toward him, likening the escalator to an elevator and citing cases where operators of elevators and escalators were held to the exercise of such care toward their passengers. But while the rule of care which plaintiff invokes may bind carriers of passengers, in proper cases, both before and after the actual carriage, it does not extend to cases where the relation of carrier and passenger does not exist. Plaintiff here was not using the escalator as a means of transportation when he was injured, he had not previously done so and there is nothing to indicate that he or his mother intended to use it thereafter. The business which his mother was then transacting, and the activities of plaintiff himself, bore no relation to the matter of transportation. Plaintiff cannot be regarded as a passenger. He was, at the time in question, simply a business invitee of defendant corporation, and to him it owed the duty which exists in all such cases, that is, to use ordinary care to keep the premises reasonably safe for those so invited to go upon them. Koppelman v. Ambassador Hotel Co., 1939, 35 Cal.App.2d 537, 540, 96 P.2d 196; Tuttle v. Crawford, 1936, 8 Cal.2d 126, 130, 63 P.2d 1128. The place where the accident happened was the infants' and children's wear department of a large store, and while there is no evidence of the number of children visiting that department, it is clear that they were among those invited to go there and that the defendant storekeeper should have expected their presence and acted accordingly. The children so invited were of such an age, not over six, that ordinarily they could not appreciate the danger of putting their fingers in or around moving machinery, but would be attracted by such machinery, especially if it were bright, and would be likely to investigate with their fingers anything to which they were attracted. As the court said in Barrett v. Southern Pacific Co., 1891, 91 Cal. 296, 302, 27 P. 666, 667, 25 Am.St.Rep. 186: "In the forum of law, as well as of common sense, a child of immature years is expected to exercise only such care and self-restraint as belongs to childhood, and a reasonable man must be presumed to know this, and the law requires him to govern his actions accordingly. It is a matter of common experience that children of tender years are guided in their actions by childish instincts, and are lacking in that discretion which, in those of more mature years, is ordinarily sufficient to enable them to appreciate and avoid danger; and, in proportion to this lack of judgment on their part, the care which must be observed towards them by others is increased; and it has been held in numerous cases to be an act of negligence to leave unguarded and exposed to the observation of little children dangerous and attractive machinery, which they would naturally be tempted to go about or upon, and against the danger of which action their immature judgment interposes no warning or defense." This case was approved in Cahill v. E. B. & A. L. Stone & Co., 1908, 153 Cal. 571, 574, 96 P. 84, 19 L.R.A.,N.S., 1094, and Pierce v. United Gas & Elec. Co., 1911, 161 Cal. 176, 181, 118 P. 700.

[7] The Barrett case, just cited, was one of the "turn-table" or "attractive nuisance" cases and the other two were similar in nature. The doctrine of those cases was declared, in the first place, as an exception to the rule that a landowner has no duty towards trespassers except to abstain from wilful or wanton injury. There has been much discussion in the briefs herein, whether the instant case is to be classified with them. Literally, it differs from them because plaintiff here was not a trespasser, but an invitee. But they set up a standard of care which is even more applicable in case of an invitee than in case of a trespasser, and we think a person who invites children upon his premises is subject to it.

This matter has been considered in several cases from other jurisdictions, in which not only were escalators in stores involved, but the facts were that small children had gotten their fingers caught in them, and it has been held that the proprietors of the stores might be held liable for negligence in not anticipating and guarding against such accidents, and that the question whether their failure in that respect did constitute negligence was one of fact for the jury. Hillerbrand v. May Mercantile Co., 1909, 141 Mo.App. 122, 121 S.W. 326, 328; Graves v. May Dept. Stores Co., Mo.App.1941, 153 S.W.2d 778, 783; Jablonski v. May Dept. Stores Co., Mo.App.1941, 153 S.W.2d 786; Reynolds v. May Dept. Stores Co., 8 Cir., April 8, 1942, 127 F.2d 396. In Hillerbrand v. May Mercantile Co., supra [141 Mo.App. 122, 121 S.W. 328], the court said: "Proprietors of premises who invite children on them must use care to keep them reasonably safe, not omitting precautions against injury from childish impulses. * * * This doctrine is but one phase of the wider doctrine that an owner must keep his premises reasonably safe for the use of people whom he invites to come on them—an application of the general doctrine with special reference to the nature of children, and in accordance with the principle that what constitutes due care in a given instance depends on the degree of danger to be apprehended. [Citing cases.] Because children are more heedless and have less discretion and capacity to avoid danger than adults, more care must be exercised by others for their safety." Part of this language was quoted with approval in Graves v. May Dept. Stores Co., supra [153 S.W.2d 783], where the court further said: "We think that the evidence in the case at bar was sufficient to warrant the jury in saying that the moving escalator was such an instrumentality as was likely to attract a small child's curiosity and likely to cause it to put its hand upon the moving step at the point where the opening was located, and justified a finding that it presented a condition of such a dangerous nature to children of tender age that a reasonably prudent person, exercising ordinary care, would have anticipated such danger to a child and guarded against it." The evidence there was not substantially different from that here, except that the injured child there was only 2½ years old. It was also held, we think correctly, in Hillerbrand v. May Mercantile Co., supra, and Graves v. May Dept. Stores Co., supra, that the fact that there was no evidence of previous similar accidents did not prevent the finding of negligence, the statement being made in the Hillerbrand case and repeated in the Graves case that "* * * the jury might say from their knowledge of the instincts of childhood that the construction and movement of the machinery was likely to excite a small child's curiosity, and allure it into thrusting its hand into the box * * *."

[8] Defendant insists that the rule of the turntable or attractive nuisance cases cannot be applied here because it is impossible to construct such an apparatus as an escalator without space between its moving parts, that any practicable space would be sufficient to receive the fingers of a small child, and that the rule does not apply unless the danger can be easily guarded against without impairing the usefulness of the instrumentality. The rule is qualified as thus contended. Morse v. Douglas, 1930, 107 Cal.App. 196, 201, 290 P. 465; Polk v. Laurel Hill Cemetery Ass'n, 1918, 37 Cal.App. 624, 629, 174 P. 414; Loftus v. Dehail, 1901, 133 Cal. 214, 217, 65 P. 379. But this qualification of the rule does not necessarily mean that the guard against danger must be wrought into the instrumentality. In this case the same result could have been accomplished by stationing guards at the places of danger, as was done when visitors were more numerous.

[9] We do not intend, by what we have just said, to declare that negligence of defendant corporation here was established as a matter of law, or that a verdict for it would have been without support in the evidence. But upon the evidence questions of fact arose for the jury, which should have been allowed to determine whether the escalator was of the class of objects naturally attractive to children, whether defendant corporation should in the exercise of ordinary care have known that it was of that class and anticipated accidents such as that which happened to plaintiff, and if so, whether ordinary care required the stationing of guards at the escalator to prevent such accidents. Upon these issues findings in favor of plaintiff would have been supported and would have required judgment in his favor against the defendant corporation. Another question, in a proper case, might be, whether defendant should have covered or protected the opening into which plaintiff's fingers were thrust; but there was here no evidence to show that this was possible or practicable and so no verdict for plaintiff could be based on that theory.

[10] The foregoing conclusions do not apply to defendant Goddard. He did not install or maintain the escalator and was not in charge of its operation. He was merely the floor manager in charge of the department of the store where plaintiff was injured. He had been instructed how to stop and start the escalator, in case accidents should happen, but is not shown to have had any other responsibility regarding it. He cannot be held liable to plaintiff on any of the grounds above suggested. Plaintiff contends, however, that other grounds of liability exist as to him, growing out of his conduct after the accident happened.

escalator and "then Takashi's finger came out with the blood shooting out," that before the escalator was reversed there was no blood visible on plaintiff's hand, and the blood appeared "just when the escalator was reversed." From this plaintiff seeks to draw the conclusions that the reversal of the escalator was the cause of the loss of parts of his fingers and that Goddard was negligent in reversing the escalator instead of calling mechanics, who were somewhere about the building, to remove the comb plate, an operation which would take 15 or 20 minutes after the mechanics arrived. In addition to the facts thus relied on by plaintiff, the mother's testimony also shows that the back of plaintiff's hand was injured "quite a bit * * * torn and blistered like." These facts do not justify the inference suggested by plaintiff. From the fact that the back of the hand received the injuries above stated—injuries which were impossible unless the back of the hand were drawn in between comb plate and step—it is clear that the fingers were not visible when plaintiff's mother looked at the hand before the escalator was reversed. Hence her failure to see blood affords no basis for an inference that the fingers were not then bleeding. It is easy to understand how the forward movement of the steps pulling on the fingers when the hand was caught in the escalator might inflict the injuries suffered by the fingers; but it is not so clear how the backward movement of the steps, freeing the fingers from detention, could have produced that result. We have no information regarding the internal construction of the escalator to aid us in reaching the conclusion that it did so. Any such conclusion must be based on pure conjecture, which is not a basis on which a verdict may be founded.

Moreover, Goddard knew that it would take 15 or 20 minutes to remove the comb plate and thus free plaintiff's hand, after the mechanics arrived, in addition to the time necessary to get them there. He had discovered that the hand could not be released by such efforts as he could make with the escalator stopped. Plaintiff was already crying with the pain of his injuries. Goddard's conclusion that a reversal of the escalator would at once free the hand was a reasonable one, under the circumstances, and was proved correct by the event. It is not shown that anything apparent to him should have caused him to know, or even to suspect, that reversal of the escalator would result in the cutting off of plaintiff's fingers or otherwise increase the injuries he had obviously suffered already. If Goddard decided, as apparently he did, that it was better to free plaintiff's hand at once than to keep him in a strained and necessarily painful position for a period of time which might considerably exceed 15 or 20 minutes, we see no reasonable ground on which a jury could have found that his conduct in that respect was negligent, even if we assume that, in fact, the reversal of the escalator did aggravate plaintiff's injuries.

[12-16] Plaintiff also contends that the doctrine of res ipsa loquitur is applicable here and that under it an inference of negligence on the part of both defendants may be supported without anything more than appears in the record. That doctrine is clearly not applicable in support of plaintiff's case against defendant Goddard. One of its fundamental elements is that the thing causing the injury be under the management and control of the defendant. 19 Cal.Jur. 704, 708. No such condition existed as to him. The doctrine is likewise not applicable to defendant corporation, but for other reasons. "The reason for the rule is that ordinarily the one injured is not in a position to know more than that, by some unusual movement of the instrumentality, he was injured, whereas the one who operates the instrumentality should know and be able to explain the precise cause of the accident." 19 Cal. Jur. 705–707; Alexander v. Wong Yick, 1938, 25 Cal.App.2d 265, 269, 77 P.2d 476. "The converse of this rule is likewise true. If the evidence affirmatively shows the operator or manager of the instrumentality by means of which the injuries are inflicted has no superior knowledge or by the exercise of reasonable care is unable to secure information regarding the cause of the accident, or the evidence establishes the fact that the complainant possesses all the knowledge or information thereof which is reasonably accessible to the operator of the machine, then the doctrine of res ipsa loquitur has no application." Johnson v. Ostrom, 1932, 128 Cal.App. 38, 43, 16 P.2d 794, 795; Alexander v. Wong Yick, supra, and cases therein cited; Jorgensen v. East Bay Transit Co., 1941, 46 Cal.App. 2d 189, 193, 115 P.2d 556. "* * * When the cause is established by either party to the action the doctrine is not then applicable." Manuel v. Pac. Gas & Elec. Co., 1933, 134 Cal.App. 512, 517, 25 P.2d 509,

511. Here the evidence clearly establishes the immediate cause of the plaintiff's accident. It resulted from the facts that the escalator was in operation and that it was so constructed that there was an opening in which plaintiff's fingers could get caught. It did not result from any abnormality in the operation of the escalator, such as the sudden jars or jolts which the operators of moving vehicles have been required, under this doctrine, to explain. Whether defendant corporation was to be held liable for the injuries thus caused depended on the consideration of matters which were as open to investigation by one party as by the other. Defendant could be held liable in this case, as we have held, for failure to station guards to keep watch over the escalators. But this conclusion of liability does not depend on the res ipsa loquitur rule. Since we hold that an inference of negligence was otherwise possible this point is perhaps not of great importance; but we determine it for the purpose of a new trial, to guide the trial court in its instructions to the jury, or its own consideration of the case if there is no jury.

[17-19] Defendant contends that plaintiff's mother was guilty of contributory negligence in failing to keep proper watch over plaintiff and to prevent him from getting caught in the escalator. As defendant concedes, such negligence would not bar plaintiff Takashi's action for his own injuries (Zarzana v. Neve Drug Co., 1919, 180 Cal. 32, 37, 179 P. 203, 15 A.L.R. 401), and it was not pleaded as a defense thereto; but defendant argues that any recovery by plaintiff Tsutomu would be community property of himself and his wife, the mother of the other plaintiff, and hence her contributory negligence would constitute a defense to Tsutomu's action. It is true that negligence of the wife, if any, in caring for the children of herself and her husband is imputable to the husband and is a defense to any action brought by him in behalf of the community to recover for injuries to the children to which such negligence contributed. Dull v. Atchison, T. & S. F. Ry. Co., 1938, 27 Cal.App.2d 473, 479, 81 P.2d 158. But from the evidence it appears that the wife took some precautions by way of watching over and caring for the son, and we cannot say, as a matter of law, that they were not sufficient. The question was one for the jury. See Healy v. Market St. Ry. Co., 1940, 41 Cal.App.2d 733, 738, 107 P.2d 488; Carrisosa v. Southern Service Co., 1932, 128 Cal.App. 160, 163–165, 16 P.2d 1032. The parties appear to assume that this action is, so far as plaintiff Tsutomu is concerned, one brought in behalf of the community. Nothing in the record indicates otherwise; but, if plaintiff Tsutomu had actually paid the bills for treatment, for which, only, he sues, from his separate property, we see no reason why his action should be regarded as one brought in behalf of the community.

[20, 21] The notice of appeal names Toki Kataoka, who is the mother of plaintiff Takashi, as an appellant. She was not made a plaintiff by the complaint and it stated no cause of action in her favor, no relief was sought against her by the answers, and although we have what purport to be complete clerk's and reporter's transcripts, no amendment of the complaint or other proceedings appear therein by which she was made a party to the action. Nevertheless, in the caption of both verdict and judgment she is named as a plaintiff and the judgment for defendants' costs runs against her by name. One who is not a party to the record may not appeal (2 Cal.Jur. 209); but when the court reaches out and enters judgment against one not theretofore a party to an action, we think such person becomes sufficiently a party to the record to entitle him to appeal. It also seems plain that a judgment against one who is not a party to the action in which it is rendered is erroneous.

The judgment in favor of defendant Goddard is affirmed in so far as it runs against plaintiffs Takashi Kataoka and Tsutomu Kataoka. The judgment in favor of defendant May Department Stores Company is reversed and the cause is remanded for a new trial as to that defendant. The judgment against Toki Kataoka is reversed.

In action for injuries arising out of head-on automobile collision, resulting when defendant, while driving at excessive speed and under influence of liquor, lost control of his automobile as he came over crest of hill and allowed automobile to cross onto wrong side of highway, evidence sustained finding that defendant's negligence was "proximate cause" of collision, and finding that plaintiff's act in passing another automobile before reaching hill did not contribute to accident and supported verdict for plaintiff.

Purpose of Soldiers' and Sailors' Civil Relief Act is to relieve those in military services from strain of litigation where fact of their service would adversely affect their prosecution or defense of a pending case. Soldiers' and Sailors' Civil Relief Act of 1940, § 1 et seq., 50 U.S.C.A. Appendix, § 501 et seq.

8. Army and navy ⚷34

Provision of Soldiers' and Sailors' Civil Relief Act pertaining to stay of civil proceedings is intended solely for benefit of those in military service, and is inapplicable unless rights of one in service will or might be prejudiced in which event court is required to protect his interests. Soldiers' and Sailors' Civil Relief Act of 1940, § 201, 50 U.S.C.A.Appendix, § 521.

9. Army and navy ⚷34

In determining whether a personal injury action should be stayed under Soldiers' and Sailors' Civil Relief Act because defendant is in military service, fact that defendant is insured is a factor to be considered by trial court in exercise of its discretion. Soldiers' and Sailors' Civil Relief Act of 1940, § 201, 50 U.S.C.A.Appendix, § 521.

10. Army and navy ⚷34

Soldiers' and Sailors' Civil Relief Act discloses congressional intent to vest in trial court wide discretion on motions for a stay to consider rights of civilian litigant and serviceman and to grant stay if it appears that serviceman's rights are adversely affected by his service. Soldiers' and Sailors' Civil Relief Act of 1940, § 201, 50 U.S.C.A.Appendix, § 521.

11. Army and navy ⚷34

Normally, a litigant in military service is entitled to be present at trial in order to defend or prosecute his action adequately. Soldiers' and Sailors' Civil Relief Act of 1940, § 1 et seq., 50 U.S.C.A.Appendix, § 501 et seq.

12. Army and navy ⚷34

Where sailor, in personal injury action arising out of automobile collision, was ably represented by insurance company attorneys and prior to trial was available for consultation with attorneys and testified by deposition and there was no showing except by sailor's unsupported assertion that he was unavailable for trial, trial court was justified in denying a stay under Soldiers' and Sailors' Civil Relief Act, notwithstanding that sailor's reputation for sobriety was involved and that he had made conflicting statements as to the details of the automobile accident. Soldiers' and Sailors' Civil Relief Act of 1940, § 201, 50 U.S.C.A.Appendix, § 521.

Congress did not intend that Soldiers' and Sailors' Civil Relief Act should be used by an insurance company as a means of defeating a cause of action in cases where no material benefit would be received by serviceman by delay. Soldiers' and Sailors' Civil Relief Act of 1940, § 201, 50 U.S.C.A.Appendix § 521.

14. Army and navy ⚷34

Under Insurance Code provision authorizing a judgment creditor of insured to sue insurance company on judgment, that judgment for injuries sustained in automobile collision was against insured personally and not against insurance company did not authorize insurance company to take advantage of provisions of Soldiers' and Sailors' Civil Relief Act to obtain a stay because insured was in military service. St.1935, p. 716, § 11580; Soldiers' and Sailors' Civil Relief Act of 1940, § 201, 50 U.S.C.A.Appendix, § 521.

15. Army and navy ⚷34

Fact that complaint against insured sailor, in action defended by insurance company, asked for more than amount of policy, did not require granting of stay under Soldiers' and Sailors' Civil Relief Act to protect sailor's interests, since trial court had power to award new trial if verdict were for an amount greater than amount of policy. Soldiers' and Sailors' Civil Relief Act of 1940, § 201, 50 U.S.C.A.Appendix, § 521.

On application for stay of personal injury action against serviceman, fact that serviceman is insured does not compel denial of application but existence of insurance is factor to be considered, so that, where it appears that insurer is attempting to use Soldiers' and Sailors' Civil Relief Act to postpone or defeat liability without material benefit to serviceman, trial court may properly refuse a stay. Soldiers' and Sailors' Civil Relief Act of 1940, § 201, 50 U.S.C.A.Appendix, § 521.

17. Army and navy ⚷34

The showing that one in military service is required to make under Soldiers' and Sailors' Civil Relief Act for a stay or limited continuance is much less than is required from a litigant requesting a limited continuance independently of the act, hence a showing insufficient to require a stay under the act is also insufficient independent of the act. Soldiers' and Sailors' Civil Relief Act of 1940, § 201, 50 U.S.C.A.Appendix, § 521.

An application for a continuance is addressed to sound discretion of trial court, and an abuse of discretion must be shown to justify a reversal of its decision.

19. Continuance ⚷12

The inability of a party to attend on the court does not ipso facto require granting of an application for a continuance particularly, where showing justifies conclusion that injustice will be as likely to follow from granting of continuance as from its refusal.

Action by Guy Johnson against Allan Johnson to recover for injuries sustained in an automobile collision. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals.

PETERS, Presiding Justice.

Defendant appeals from a judgment based on a jury verdict awarding plaintiff $3,000 general damages and $600 special damages, as compensation for injuries received by plaintiff when his car collided with that of defendant. The parties are not related although both possess the same last name.

The accident occurred at about 1:30 a. m. on the morning of October 26, 1941. Plaintiff was driving his car north, and defendant was driving his car south on a state highway south of Fort Bragg. The accident happened on the east side of the highway—in other words, defendant was on the wrong side of the highway at the point of impact. The evidence amply supports the inference that defendant's car was traveling at a high rate of speed. The force of the impact tore the motor from defendant's car and caused it to be thrown a distance of fifty-eight feet. Defendant's car traveled some sixty-seven feet after the collision. Defendant admitted in his deposition that he had had five glasses of beer and four whiskey highballs preceding the accident, and testified that he could not remember anything that happened immediately before, at, or after the accident. In a signed statement given to a deputy district attorney the day after the accident he admitted having more drinks before the accident than he later testified to in his deposition.

[1] Defendant concedes that the evidence supports the implied finding of the jury that he was guilty of negligence proximately contributing to the accident, but urges that, as a matter of law, plaintiff was guilty of contributory negligence. This contention is based on the following facts: South of the point of collision was a sharp turn in the highway. North of the place of impact was the crest of a hill. Between the turn and the crest of the hill was a straightaway of over 500 feet. According to the evidence plaintiff had been following closely behind one Snyder who was driving a Ford. Plaintiff followed Snyder around the sharp turn above mentioned and, on reaching the straightaway passed him. The collision took place immediately after plaintiff had passed the Ford and after he had cut back to and had reached his side of the highway. Defendant's theory is that on coming over the crest of the hill he was suddenly confronted with the headlights of two cars; that, confronted with this emergency, he applied the brakes and skidded over onto the wrong side of the highway; that plaintiff was negligent in thus passing the Snyder car so close to the crest of the hill; and that such contributory negligence, as a matter of law, proximately contributed to the accident. There is no merit to this contention. Even if it be assumed that the jury could have found that plaintiff was guilty of contributory negligence, the evidence does not compel that conclusion, nor does it compel the conclusion that the negligence, if any, of plaintiff proximately contributed to the accident. The evidence amply supports the inferences that as defendant came over the crest of the hill at a high rate of speed he lost control of his car; that this was due to the liquor he had consumed; and that the plaintiff's act in passing the Ford had nothing to do with the accident. Under such circumstances the jury's findings cannot be disturbed by an appellate court.

[2] Defendant also contends that the trial court was guilty of prejudicial error in failing to give two instructions requested by him. The first of these was on the doctrine of contributory negligence, and stated that the negligence of plaintiff "however slight" bars a recovery if it proximately contributed to the accident. The court did instruct that if plaintiff was "negligent in any particular at the time and place and under the circumstances" and such negligence proximately contributed to the accident, he could not recover. The instruction given adequately covered the field of the requested instruction. Burke v. John E. Marshall, Inc., 42 Cal.App.2d 195, 108 P.2d 738.

[3] The second refused instruction was to the general effect that if defendant was free from negligence up to the moment when a collision was apparent, and he then quickly applied his brakes in an attempt to stop and avoid the collision, the sudden application of the brakes was not negligence. The court fully and fairly instructed on the doctrine of imminent peril. It was not error to refuse to give this repetitious instruction.

The main point urged on this appeal is that the trial court abused its discretion in refusing to grant a stay or continuance of the trial because of defendant's inability to attend by reason of his enlistment in the United States Navy. On this issue the evidence shows the following:

On December 12, 1941, the court set the cause for trial on January 26, 1942. On December 18, 1941, the deposition of the defendant was taken. On January 16, 23 and 26, 1942, motions were made on behalf of defendant requesting that the trial be stayed until after the end of the war. The original motion of January 16th was also for a limited continuance of the trial, with no specific time requested and with no showing made as to whether defendant would be available short of the end of the war. The original motion was supported by the affidavits of one of defendant's attorneys and of defendant's mother. On information and belief they averred that defendant had enlisted in the Navy. At the hearing of this motion evidence was taken. It was then disclosed that defendant's deposition had been taken on December 18, 1941, and that plaintiff's deposition had been taken on January 14, 1942. Plaintiff's attorney also disclosed in detail what he expected to prove at the trial. He stated that he intended to offer the signed statement of the defendant given to the deputy district attorney in which defendant admitted that he had been drinking, and also intended to offer the deposition of the defendant. An examination of this deposition shows that at that time defendant was fully interrogated by plaintiff's and his own counsel concerning this statement, and that he pointed out in detail where he thought the statement was in error.

[4] It was also disclosed at the hearing on the 16th that defendant was insured against liability for accidents growing out of the use and operation of his motor vehicle, and that the insurance company had undertaken the defense of the action. At this time plaintiff's counsel offered to stipulate, if counsel for defendant would state the substance of defendant's testimony, that defendant would so testify if called. The trial court denied the motion for a stay based upon the sole ground of military service on the ground that there was no proper showing that defendant was in fact in military service, and no evidence to establish that he would be unable to attend the trial. In view of the insufficient factual recitations in the affidavits then before the court, this ruling was correct, and no serious objection is made thereto. The motion for a limited continuance was not then passed upon.

On January 23, 1942, defendant's formal motion for a stay until the termination of the war based upon defendant's military service came on for hearing. The motion for a limited continuance was not renewed at this hearing. In addition to the prior affidavits, another of defendant's counsel submitted an affidavit in which it is averred that on January 21, 1942, the affiant interviewed the defendant in San Francisco; that defendant was then on guard duty on the San Francisco waterfront; that affiant also interviewed Commander Cochran who informed affiant that it would be impossible to relieve defendant from guard duty on January 26th. There was also introduced the affidavit of defendant. In this affidavit it is averred that affiant enlisted in the Navy on January 10, 1942; that he is stationed in San Francisco; and "that by reason of the foregoing, it will be impossible for him to attend the trial of the above entitled case, and he prays that the above entitled matter may be continued until such time as he is released from the Navy." Counsel for plaintiff introduced testimony that Commander Cochran had not refused to permit defendant to be produced as a witness but had suggested defendant's deposition be taken, for which he would consent to defendant taking time off; that defendant was normally off duty twelve hours at a time. The court denied the motion because, in its opinion, defendant's representation by the insurance company was adequate to protect his rights, and because "there is no showing here that he cannot attend."

On January 26, 1942, defendant's counsel moved again for a continuance and a stay upon the prior record. At this time it developed that plaintiff was still confined to the hospital as a result of the injuries received in the accident and would be unable to appear, and would testify through the medium of his deposition. The court denied both motions.

On this record appellant contends that the trial court, as a matter of law, was compelled to grant defendant's motions for a stay until after the termination of the war under the provisions of the Soldiers' and Sailors' Civil Relief Act of 1940, 50 U.S.C.A.Appendix, § 501 et seq., and that, in any event, either under that act or independently thereof, the trial court abused its discretion in refusing at least a limited continuance because of defendant's inability to be present on January 26, 1942.

These contentions will be considered in order.

The particular section of the Soldiers' and Sailors' Civil Relief Act of 1940 upon which defendant relies is § 521, 50 U.S.C.A. Appendix, § 521. It reads as follows: "At any stage thereof any action or proceeding in any court in which a person in military service is involved, either as plaintiff or defendant, during the period of such service or within sixty days thereafter may, in the discretion of the court in which it is pending, on its own motion, and shall, on application to it by such person or some person on his behalf, be stayed as provided in this Act, unless, in the opinion of the court, the ability of plaintiff to prosecute the action or the defendant to conduct his defense is not materially affected by reason of his military service." Under § 524 of the act the court may grant the stay "for the period of military service and three months thereafter or any part of such period."

[5] It is the theory of defendant that upon a showing that he was in military service and unable to attend on the day set, he was entitled to a stay until after the termination of the war, unless plaintiff could show that the fact of military service did not adversely affect defendant's ability to defend the action; that the burden rested on plaintiff to make such showing; that no such showing was made here. We are of the opinion, after considering all of the evidence offered by both sides, that the trial court did not abuse its discretion in denying the motions for a stay based upon the fact of defendant's military service.

[6-9] The Soldiers' and Sailors' Civil Relief Act of 1940 does not grant an absolute right to a stay whenever it is made to appear that one of the parties is in the military service. The act was passed to relieve those in the armed services from the strain of litigation during their period of service where the fact of their service would adversely affect their prosecution or a defense of a pending case. It was intended to prevent any advantage to the civilian litigant and disadvantage to the soldier or sailor litigant growing out of the fact that one of the litigants was in the military service. Section 521, here involved, was intended solely for the benefit of those in the armed services. The section is inapplicable unless it is made to appear that the rights of a person in service will be prejudiced by a proceeding against him. Royster v. Lederle, 6 Cir., 128 F.2d 197; Charles Tolmas, Inc., v. Streiffer, 199 La. 25, 5 So.2d 372; Lightner v. Boone, 222 N.C. 205, 22 S.E.2d 426. If it appears that the rights of one in the service would, or might, be adversely affected because of such service, the court is required to protect his interests (Jamaica Sav. Bank v. Bryan, 175 Misc. 978, 25 N.Y.S.2d 17; Id., 176 Misc. 215, 25 N.Y.S.2d 641), but unless such is the fact this section offers no protection. Pope v. United States Fidelity & Guaranty Co., 67 Ga. App. 560, 21 S.E.2d 289. The statute vests discretionary power in the trial court. Swiderski v. Moodenbaugh, D.C., 44 F. Supp. 687; Id., D.C., 45 F.Supp. 790. This last mentioned case held that in determining whether a personal injury case should be stayed under this section because defendant was in military service the fact that defendant was insured was a factor to be considered by the trial court in the exercise of its discretion.

[10] It is quite apparent that Congress has determined that it is not necessary in order to protect the rights of those in military service to grant to them the absolute right to a stay. The Congress determined that, in considering the rights of all concerned, they could all be best protected, including the rights of those in the service, by vesting a wide discretionary power in the trial courts of the nation. It was believed that the rights of those in service would be adequately protected by the trial judges, who, in each case, could determine whether the service man's rights would be adversely affected by the fact of his service. The Congress also determined that the rights of civilian litigants must also be considered. It is a harsh thing to tell a litigant that he must wait to enforce his cause of action until after the war. Witnesses or parties may die, and witnesses may disappear or forget the facts. However, in the national interest, wherever the rights of one in the military service will be adversely affected unless a stay is given, the court must grant a stay. That is one price civilians must pay in aiding the war effort. In any case, however, the trial judge is called upon to determine, in that particular case, which interest is of the greatest importance. Doubtful cases should be resolved in favor of the service man.

The United States Supreme Court has recently considered this problem at length.

Boone v. Lightner, June 7, 1943, 63 S.Ct. 1223, 87 L.Ed. 1587. An action was brought against Boone in the state courts of North Carolina to require him to account as trustee of a trust, to remove him as trustee, and to obtain a personal judgment against him in the amount of the deficiency in the trust fund caused by his illegal management. When suit was filed Boone was in the military service stationed in Washington, D. C. Boone answered, denying all material allegations of the complaint. On February 2, 1942, the cause came on for hearing. On that date his then counsel moved for a continuance until May 25, 1942, on the ground that he, the lawyer, was about to be called into military service and would not be able to try the case. This continuance was granted. In its order granting the continuance the court stated that the presence of Boone at the trial "is highly desirable." The court directed a copy of the order to be sent to the Adjutant General of the United States Army, in order to advise Boone's superior officers of the importance of the litigation. On the day of the trial Boone invoked § 521 of the Soldiers' and Sailors' Civil Relief Act of 1940, and demanded a stay until the termination of the war. Prior to this date Boone's deposition had been taken. Boone was not personally present, but was represented by counsel who made the motion. The motion was denied, and Boone's counsel withdrew from the case. The court ordered the trial to proceed in the absence of Boone and in the absence of any lawyer representing Boone. The jury rendered its verdict against Boone and judgment was entered that Boone had been guilty of serious misconduct in handling the trust fund, and that he was personally liable in an amount exceeding $11,000. Boone appealed to the Supreme Court of North Carolina, and that court affirmed. 222 N.C. 205, 22 S.E. 2d 426. The Supreme Court of United States, on application of Boone, granted certiorari. The language of that court, in affirming the North Carolina courts, is so pertinent that we quote at length from the decision [63 S.Ct. 1226, 87 L.Ed. 1587]:

"The positions urged by petitioner come to these: first, that defendant's military service in Washington rendered a continuance mandatory; second, if not mandatory that the burden of showing that he could attend or would not be prejudiced by his absence was not on him, but on those who would force the proceedings; third, that the Court did not make the finding required by the Act for denial of a stay; and last, that in any view of the law the trial judge abused his discretion in this case. * * *

"1. The Act cannot be construed to require continuance on mere showing that the defendant was in Washington in the military service. Canons of statutory construction admonish us that we should not needlessly render as meaningless the language which, after authorizing stays, says 'unless, in the opinion of the court, the ability of plaintiff to prosecute the action or the defendant to conduct his defense is not materially affected by reason of his military service.'

"The Act of 1940 was a substantial reenactment of that of 1918 * * *. The legislative history of its antecedent shows that this clause was deliberately chosen and that judicial discretion thereby conferred on the trial court instead of rigid and undiscriminating suspension of civil proceedings was the very heart of the policy of the Act. While this Court had no occasion to speak on the subject, the Act was generally construed consistently with this policy.

"Reenacted against this background without reconsideration of the question beyond a statement in the Senate Committee Report that 'There are adequate safeguards incorporated in the bill to prevent any person from taking undue advantage' of its provisions, we are unable to ignore or sterilize the clause which plainly vests judicial discretion in the trial court.

"2. The Act makes no express provision as to who must carry the burden of showing that a party will or will not be prejudiced, in pursuance no doubt of its policy of making the law flexible to meet the great variety of situations no legislator and no court is wise enough to foresee. We, too, refrain from declaring any rigid doctrine of burden of proof in this matter, believing that courts called upon to use discretion will usually have enough sound sense to know from what direction their information should be expected to come. One case may turn on an issue of fact as to which the party is an important witness, where it only appears that he is in service at a remote place or at a place unknown. The next may involve an accident caused by one of his family using his car with his permission, which he did not witness, and as to which he is fully covered by insurance. Such a nominal defendant's absence in military service in Washington might be urged by the insurance company, the real defendant, as ground for deferring trial until after the war. To say that the mere fact of a party's military service has the same significance on burden of persuasion in the two contexts would be to put into the Act through a burden of proof theory the rigidity and lack of discriminating application which Congress sought to remove by making stays discretionary. We think the ultimate discretion includes a discretion as to whom the court may ask to come forward with facts needful to a fair judgment.

"In the present case, whoever might have had the burden originally, the continuance was finally denied upon a record which disclosed the facts so far as either party saw fit to do so. The defendant and his counsel submitted affidavits and the depositions and accounts before the court revealed facts relevant to the issue.

"Whether, if the court knew only the existence of this complicated controversy and that the defendant was absent in military service, it could have cast upon the defendant the burden of showing that the litigation could not go ahead without prejudice to him, is not before us. The court made no such ruling. The defendant appeared, he pleaded his defense, he took depositions showing fully what had happened to the fund, and he supplied his own affidavit showing where he was and what he was doing. Regardless of whether defendant was under a duty to make a disclosure of his situation, once he undertook to do so, the significance alike of what his affidavit said and of what it omitted was to be judged by ordinary tests. One of these is that 'all evidence * * * is to be weighed according to the proof which it was in the power of one side to have produced and in the power of the other side to have contradicted.' Cooper v. Dasher, 290 U.S. 106, 109, 54 S.Ct. 6, 78 L.Ed. 203. The trial court and the Supreme Court of North Carolina did just this. They did not deny his stay because he failed to meet their ideas of burden; they weighed the evidence he offered and found its conclusions discredited by its avoidance of supporting facts within his knowledge and not within that of his adversary. That is not a ruling on burden of proof. Finding that the courts below have proceeded upon no misapprehension of the law, we turn to their dealing with the facts of the particular case.

"3. * * * The Act does not expressly require findings. It is one intended to apply to courts not of record as well as those of record, and it requires only that the court be of opinion that ability to defend is not materially affected by military service. We accept the findings as sufficiently evidencing the opinion of the court to that effect.

"4. The final question is whether the evidence sufficiently supports the opinion or whether the order constitutes an abuse of discretion.

"We think the opinion of the court that Boone's military service did not prevent him from being present and doing whatever could have been done by way of defense finds ample support in the evidence. Boone had been able to get away from Washington to go to New York for the taking of depositions on two separate occasions. He had long notice of the trial date and the court had placed in the files of his Department its order showing the desirability of his presence at that time. Boone, being a lawyer and presumably knowing the gravity of the accusations against him, might be expected to make some move to get leave to be present. If it were denied, he might be expected to expose every circumstance of his effort to the court in his plea for continuance. Boone's affidavit, after reciting that he was assigned to the International Division, Headquarters, Services of Supply, Washington, D. C., says 'The work in said Division is very heavy, and full time and some extra time are required of all officers in said Division, including the defendant. Prior to the declaration of War on Dec. 8, 1941, the work in this Division was very heavy, but since the declaration of War the volume of work has been greatly increased. No leaves whatever have been granted, except in cases of serious emergency.'

"Most lawyers trained in the equity tradition of trustee fidelity would regard a trial of this kind as a serious emergency. Did he apply for a leave at all? The affidavit pretty clearly implied that he had not. We think the court had ample grounds for the opinion that Boone made no effort to attend to duties that should weigh heavily upon the honor of a lawyer-trustee.

"There was likewise support for the opinion that the failure to be represented by counsel did not result from Boone's military service. On February 2, 1942, the court granted his request for a continuance and set the case for trial on May 25, 1942. It was stated to the court that counsel then acting for him was expecting to be called immediately into military service, and it would be necessary for defendant to procure additional counsel. Nevertheless, when the trial date arrived, the fact that this counsel had gone into service on May 13, 1942, was urged as a reason for further postponement. No showing whatever was made as to any effort to obtain other counsel in the long interval allowed by the court for the purpose. This counsel was also stationed at Washington and said he 'would not assume to ask for leave at the present time, so soon after having reported for duty.'

"On the trial date defendant was nevertheless represented in court by local counsel. That counsel however was consulted only three or four days before the trial date and was employed for the sole purpose of making the motion for continuance, and when the court ruled on it he withdrew and declined to proceed further. The defendant's accounts presented to the trial judge showed disbursements since the beginning of the action and before trial for the following matters, among others, in connection with this case: On August 15, 1941, defendant's deposition was taken at Washington, D. C. This entailed a reporter's fee of $66.00 and a fee of $248.88 paid a Detroit attorney for appearing at the proceeding. On November 3, and 5, 1941, depositions were taken in New York City with the defendant present. These involved a court reporter's fee of $32.25, and fees in the amount of $375.00 for the Detroit attorney and New York counsel obtained to assist him. This item carried a notation that it did not 'include services rendered in the taking of depositions in other cases on same date.' From August 4, 1941, to January 26, 1942, Deal, the attorney who had represented defendant before withdrawing to accept a commission in Washington, received $218.00 for his services in representing defendant in the case. Two days after judgment, another lawyer from the firm of counsel who had withdrawn after making the motion of May 25 appeared and moved to set the verdict aside and took an appeal, later filing extensive assignments of error. Counsel who had withdrawn from the trial argued the appeal in the Supreme Court of North Carolina.

"At all times since the action began defendant has also been represented by counsel from Detroit, Michigan. His inability to appear on the trial date was explained on the ground that he was 'definitely engaged at the present time in the trial of cases at Detroit which will require his presence in Court there for approximately thirty days.' No affidavit from this counsel was produced, and no explanation is made as to how it came that other 'cases' were given priority over this in view of the long notice of the trial date and its importance to the client.

"In this Court, Boone is represented by his Detroit counsel and by Deal, the lawyer who withdrew from the case to accept a commission in Washington. Besides these, there also appear four other lawyers, none of whom are included in the five who have represented him at previous stages in the case. * * *

"The court was dealing not only with an individual but with a trustee, one charged with default in his duty, and with a fund which was said to be in jeopardy. Defendant in spite of his military service in Washington was continuing to administer the fund. The defendant was a member of the bar, and the charges struck at his honor as well as at his judgment. Instead of seeking the first competent forum and the earliest possible day to lay his accounts out for vindication, he sought to escape the forum and postpone the day. He was both present and represented by counsel when depositions were taken which establish his speculation with the trust funds in his personal margin account. We think the record amply supports the conclusion of the trial judge that the claim that military service would prejudice the conduct of his defense, was groundless, and that the absence of himself and all of his numerous and not uncompensated counsel on the day of judgment was dictated wholly by litigious strategy.

"The Soldiers' and Sailors' Civil Relief Act [of 1940] is always to be liberally construed to protect those who have been obliged to drop their own affairs to take up the burdens of the nation. The discretion that is vested in trial courts to that end is not to be withheld on nice calculations as to whether prejudice may result from absence, or absence result from the service.

Absence when one's rights or liabilities are being adjudged is usually prima facie prejudicial. But in some few cases absence may be a policy, instead of the result of military service, and discretion is vested in the courts to see that the immunities of the Act are not put to such unworthy use."

[11-13] If the rules thus stated be applied to the facts of the instant case, there can be no reasonable doubt that the trial court acted well within its discretionary power in refusing to grant defendant a stay. A reference to the affidavit filed by defendant discloses that he did not there take the position that his ability to defend the action would be adversely affected by his inability to be present at the trial. That contention has been made solely by defendant's counsel who admittedly appeared on behalf of an insurance company. It should also be noted that there was no affidavit of any superior officer of defendant that he would be unable to attend the trial on the 26th, or at any other time. In addition, the record shows that defendant was ably represented at the trial by counsel for the insurance company; that defendant was available for consultation with his attorneys prior to trial; that he had signed a statement taken by the deputy district attorney in which he fully described his recollection of the incidents prior to the accident; that his deposition had been taken; that in that deposition he had testified fully as to his recollection of the events leading up to the accident; that he had also pointed out therein those portions of the signed statement which he wished to challenge; that in both the signed statement and deposition he admitted taking several drinks prior to the accident, and admitted he had no clear recollection of what occurred for some time prior to and immediately after the accident. The trial court also knew that plaintiff could not personally appear but would testify through the medium of a deposition and that plaintiff had offered to stipulate as to the testimony that would be given by defendant. It also knew that no showing had been made at all, except by defendant's unsupported assertion, that defendant was not available. None of these factors, standing alone, is conclusive. But when all of them are considered together it seems quite clear that under the rules laid down in the Boone and the other cases cited, supra, the trial court acted well within its discretionary powers in refusing to find that defendant's military service adversely affected the ability of defendant to defend. The defendant's position amounts to the contention that military service and inability to attend per se require the granting of a stay. As was so clearly pointed out in the Boone case, supra, that is not the law. While it is true that normally a litigant in the military service is entitled to be present at the trial in order to defend or prosecute his action adequately, that right is not absolute. On the showing made the trial court was justified in believing that the insurance company was attempting to use the Soldiers' and Sailors' Civil Relief Act of 1940 as a protection for its rights, rather than as a protection for the insured. The Congress never intended that the provisions of this act should be used by insurance companies as a means of defeating a cause of action, which, in many cases, would be the result of years of postponement during which witnesses may have died, disappeared or forgotten the facts, in cases where no material benefit would be received by the defendant by the delay.

[14, 15] It is no answer to this conclusion to say that this judgment is against defendant personally and not against the insurance company. Under § 11580 of the Insurance Code, St.1935, p. 716, the judgment creditor may sue the insurance company on the judgment. See, Bias v. Ohio Farmers Indemnity Co., 28 Cal.App.2d 14, 81 P.2d 1057. Nor is it an answer to the above conclusion to say that the complaint asked for $15,600 which might have been in excess of the amount of insurance carried. The verdict was for $3,600, well within the limits of a minimum policy. Had the verdict been in excess of the limits of the policy, the trial court could then have granted a new trial. Under the act, the trial court possesses power to halt the case at any time whenever manifest injury to the person in military service appears. Swiderski v. Moodenbaugh, D. C., 44 F.Supp. 687; Id., D.C., 45 F.Supp. 790.

None of the cases cited by appellant compels or suggests a contrary conclusion. In Royster v. Lederle, 6 Cir., 128 F.2d 197, the trial court had granted the stay. The plaintiff sought by mandamus to set that ruling aside. The appellate court held that "we cannot say, as a matter of law, that Ruggiero's rights would not be affected by proceeding to the trial of the cause in his absence." Page 200 of 128 F.2d. The court did not hold that, had such a stay been refused, the order would be reversed, which is the problem here involved. It should be noted that in the cited case the appellate court required, as a condition to its refusal of mandate, that the insurance company post a bond in the amount of its policy to protect plaintiff in the collection of any judgment subsequently secured.

Craven v. Vought, 58 Montg.Co.Law Repr. 15, is a decision by a trial court in Pennsylvania. A stay was granted. In that case the insurance company made a showing that the defendant was "the only witness in his own defense; that his counsel has not been able, because of his absence with the army, to consult with him in the preparation of the case, and that his present whereabouts is unknown." Page 16 of 58 Montg.Co.Law Repr. The trial court, in the exercise of its discretion, granted the application for a stay on such a showing.

[16] Both cases held that the fact that the defendant was insured did not, as a matter of law, compel the denial of the application for a stay. We agree with these holdings. But, the existence of insurance is one factor that the trial courts should consider in exercising the discretion vested in them. Where, as in the instant case, it is a reasonable inference that the insurance company is attempting to use the Soldiers' and Sailors' Civil Relief Act of 1940 as a means of postponing and perhaps defeating liability, and that the defendant will not be materially benefited by a stay, the trial court is justified in refusing to thus injure the plaintiff for the sole advantage of the insurance company.

[17-19] Defendant also contends that either under the Soldiers' and Sailors' Civil Relief Act of 1940, or independently thereof, it was an abuse of discretion to deny his application for a limited continuance when it appeared that he would not be able to be present on Jan. 26, 1942. Insofar as this point is based on the provisions of the Soldiers' and Sailors' Civil Relief Act of 1940, what has already been said disposes of that contention. The showing that one in the military service is required to make under that act for a stay or limited continuance is much less than is required from a litigant requesting a limited continuance independently of that act. If the trial court did not abuse its discretion in denying the motion for a limited continuance under the Soldiers' and Sailors' Civil Relief Act of 1940, it certainly did not abuse its discretion in denying the application independent of that act. The rules applicable to the granting of continuances, amply supported by citations to the many cases, are set forth in 5 Cal.Jur. p. 968, § 5, as follows: "However, it is a settled rule of practice that an application for a continuance is addressed to the sound discretion of the trial court, and its ruling will not be reviewed except for the most cogent reasons. The trial court is apprised of all the circumstances of the case and the previous proceedings, and is, therefore, better able to decide upon the propriety of granting the application than an appellate court; and when it exercises a reasonable, and not an arbitrary discretion, its action will not be disturbed. It follows that an abuse of discretion must be shown to justify a reversal of the judgment because of a ruling on such matters. Thus it has been held that the sickness of a party to an action, preventing his attendance on the court, does not ipso facto require the court to grant an application for a continuance, made on his behalf; especially where the showing before the court fully justifies the conclusion that injustice will be as likely to follow from the granting of the continuance as from its refusal. Nor does the absence of a party always furnish ground for a continuance."

As has already been pointed out, the right of a litigant to be present to defend or prosecute an action is not absolute. The defendant failed to ask for a continuance for any definite period, and failed to disclose when he would be available. For reasons aready stated, the trial court was justified in believing that injury would result to the plaintiff, and that the defendant would be in no way materially benefited by a delay. That being so, it was not an abuse of discretion to deny the continuance.

The judgment is affirmed.

KNIGHT, J., concurs.

WARD, Justice (dissenting).

I dissent.

In effect, as applied to the facts of the case, the majority opinion, as I read it, holds (1) that a trial court may arbitrarily determine that an insured has no interest in the outcome of litigation arising out of a personal injury action instituted against him if insured against liability; (2) that a defendant in such action whose reputation for morality and sobriety is involved, who, in a deposition and a statement to a municipal or county officer, has made conflicting statements as to details, may not by reason of military service be granted a continuance of a trial for the purpose of explaining apparent discrepancies in such statements.

The complaint was filed twelve days after the accident, and the answer four weeks later, at which time the plaintiff served and filed notice of motion to set the cause for trial. On December 12, 1941, the court set the cause for trial on January 26, 1942. On December 18, 1941, the deposition of the defendant was taken. It appears that about this time the defendant anticipated the probability of a call to military service from his draft board. On January 16, 1942, defendant moved the court for an order staying proceedings upon the ground that he was then in the military service, furnishing supporting affidavits in that regard. This motion was denied. On the last mentioned date defendant also moved the court for a continuance of the case for trial, but this motion was not ruled upon at the time of denying the stay, but subsequently, on the day of trial, was formally denied.

On January 23, 1942, a regularly noticed motion for a stay of proceedings, based upon affidavits that the defendant was then in the United States Navy and at that time stationed in San Francisco, was heard. One of the affidavits was to the effect that defendant's commanding officer had been interviewed and had stated that it would be impossible to release Allan Johnson from duty on the date set for trial; another affidavit, by defendant, stated that he would be unable to attend, and prayed that the case be continued until such time as he is released from the navy. At the previous hearing it appeared that defendant carried insurance. At the conclusion of the second hearing the motion was denied. Among other reasons given, the court stated: "It is my view, inasmuch as the defendant is not at all personally interested in the outcome of the case, that the Court could not continue the matter under the Soldiers' and Sailors' Relief Act, or grant the motion on the ground of lack of witness—the inability of the witness to attend. I don't think I can grant the motion on that ground of the case, because there is no showing here that he cannot attend. I will have to deny the motion."

The motion was renewed on the morning of the first day of the trial, based upon the previous record. The court stated: "The motion for continuance and suspension of proceedings will be denied."

Appellant contends that the first ground given for the denial of the motion is based upon the fact that defendant was insured. Respondent does not contradict this statement.

Section 521 of the Soldiers' and Sailors' Civil Relief Act quoted in the majority opinion should be construed to effect its purpose, the protection of those in the armed service to the extent of permitting a postponement until the soldier or sailor, without restraint or restriction, is able to present his side of a contested material issue. However, the section is addressed to the reasonable discretion of the trial courts of the nation, to determine whether a litigant will be prejudiced by proceedings held in his absence, and each case should be determined upon the particular facts and surrounding circumstances. In the exercise of such discretion, if the trial court denies a postponement, and it subsequently appears that the litigant or his guarantor or indemnitor is prejudiced by reason of the absence of the parties, a new trial should be granted. In Richey & Gilbert Co. v. Northwestern Natural Gas Corp., Wash., 134 P.2d 444, 451, the court said: "The court in cases such as this one is obliged, at the outset, to visualize the trial and the preparation of it, with a view to determining the effect of the defendant's absence. It must be ready at any stage of the proceedings to change its decision and grant the stay if good reason therefor appears." For this reason, on a motion prior to trial the section should be liberally but reasonably construed in favor of the soldier or sailor to protect his interest. Jamaica Savings Bank v. Bryan, 175 Misc. 978, 25 N.Y.S.2d 17; Id., 176 Misc. 215, 25 N.Y.S.2d 641.

The section was not enacted particularly to protect insurance companies, though facts may arise to justify a continuance in favor of the insurance carrier upon the principle that a party in interest should not be forced to trial in the absence of a material witness (Craven v. Vought, 58 Montg.Co.Law Repr. 15, 4 Monroe L.R. 11, 55 York Leg.Rec. 173), or in the absence of a party to the action whose presence might materially affect the disposition of the case (Royster v. Lederle, 6 Cir., 128 F.2d 197), and, accordingly, whose absence in either event might be prejudicial to a determination of the material issues involved. It does not appear from the record that the amount of insurance was adequate to meet the sum prayed for in the complaint. The majority opinion assumes to the contrary, or, at least, surmises that the verdict was within the amount of the face of the policy. This assumption or surmise is without evidentiary support. Neither the court nor plaintiff demanded a bond of the insurance company that a verdict in a specified amount would be paid. Royster v. Lederle, supra. In addition, an insurance company has the privilege and right to demand cooperation from the insured. If the latter is a resident of the county of trial, it may be assumed that he would be of assistance in the selection of the jury, at least to the extent of indicating veniremen who might be prejudiced against him. A party's presence might have an effect upon the judgment or the amount thereof. Royster v. Lederle, supra.

If a proceeding may be postponed upon the application of an insurance carrier for sufficient reason, it should also be delayed if the insured has a material interest in the outcome, whether that interest be financial or personal. In Tulley v. Superior Court, 45 Cal.App.2d 24, pages 30, 31, 113 P.2d 477, 480, referring to section 510 et seq., this court said: "While it is true that the above-mentioned federal statute was passed subsequent to the commencement of the action in which petitioner is a defendant, it is an announcement of policy by the lawmaking body that normally should be the exclusive judge of policy, as to what it considers reasonable and necessary under such circumstances. Under that statute, or independent of that statute, the trial courts possess ample powers to protect the rights of those in the military service of the United States. It is inconceivable that, in a proper case, the trial court, upon a proper showing, would not grant a reasonable continuance to one engaged in military service to permit him to properly prepare his defense, and, if necessary, continue such case during the period of the defendant's foreign service. If the trial court should abuse its discretion in such a case there exist ample remedies to control such abuse." It is true that the decision by this court in that case referred to "foreign" service, but conditions might arise that would preclude the presence of a party at a trial even though he might be in the same county. As a matter of fact, if in foreign service the party would not be available.

Congress has directed a policy in relation to litigants in military service. The administration thereof rests in the discretion of the trial court. Such discretion should be used reasonably, with due regard to the rights of each side. Swiderski v. Moodenbaugh, D.C., 44 F.Supp. 687 It must be assumed that Congress gave mature consideration to the rights of those claiming damages in personal injury cases, and to the many contingencies that might arise, and the possible consequences that might result from delay in bringing causes to trial.

A defendant, though protected in the matter of monetary liability on a judgment, is still interested in refuting charges, if possible, against his reputation, or charges of intoxication. An intoxicated person in the operation of an automobile may become "active and alert or stupid and dull." Frisvold v. Leahy, 15 Cal.App.2d 752, 756, 60 P.2d 151, 153. Immediately after an accident statements may be made that under certain circumstances require explanation. Even a statement under oath may be contradicted or explained upon a trial. Royster v. Lederle, supra.

In addition to the motion for postponement under the Soldiers' and Sailors' Civil Relief Act of 1940, supra, as previously stated, a motion for a continuance was presented and denied. An application for such continuance is ordinarily left to the sound discretion of the trial court. If bad faith appears, or the form and substance of the application for continuance is legally inadequate, denial of motions for continuance has been upheld, but in many instances when the rights of a litigant have been jeopardized the reviewing court, in the interest of justice, has reversed the judgment. This motion, the first and only continuance requested, presented in proper form, could well have been granted in the interest of justice to give defendant, a material witness whose absence was reasonably explained, an opportunity to be present at the trial. Irrespective of the Soldiers' and Sailors' Civil Relief Act of 1940, such has been the determination of the reviewing courts in this state. Jaffe v. Lilienthal, 101 Cal. 175, 35 P. 636; Carl v. Thomas, 116 Cal.App. 294, 2 P.2d 872; Pacific Gas, etc., Co. v. Taylor, 52 Cal.App. 307, 198 P. 651; Betts Spring Co. v. Jardine Co., 23 Cal.App. 705, 139 P. 657; Morehouse v. Morehouse, 136 Cal. 332, 68 P. 976; Swayne & Hoyt v. Wells-Russell & Co., 169 Cal. 204, 146 P. 686.

If not independent of the federal act, certainly in conjunction with it, a continuance should have been granted. Under the act a stay or continuance may be granted for any period less than the period of military service (sec. 524).

The majority opinion relies upon Boone v. Lightner, a very recent decision which does not appear officially at this writing to have been declared final. The majority opinion also cites Swiderski v. Moodenbaugh, D.C., 44 F.Supp. 687 and Id., D.C., 45 F.Supp. 790. On appeal in the Swiderski case, 45 F.Supp. 790, it was assumed that the parties to the action in respectively requesting and refusing a postponement were playing a game. This brought forth the following statement by the court (page 792 of 45 F.Supp.): "This court repudiates such a game and orders the cause set for immediate trial." If appellant in the present action had been playing a game he should have come under the rule in the Swiderski case. Such facts do not here appear. There was no agreement to be bound by the amount of insurance carried by defendant; the date for trial was a date subsequent to defendant's entry into military service, and there was no action taken by the insurance company to delay proceedings other than the application under the provisions of the Soldiers' and Sailors' Civil Relief Act of 1940, and appellant was acting in good faith in making the ordinary motion for a continuance.

In the Boone case [63 S.Ct. 1223, 1225, 87 L.Ed. 1587] the same condition existed as in the Swiderski case. The petitioner was playing a game. He was trifling with the court. When the numerous quotations from the Boone case, found in the majority opinion, are considered, in view of other facts as set forth in the opinion of the Supreme Court of the United States, the conclusion reached is understandable.

Boone, a lawyer, and executor and trustee of his mother-in-law's estate, was charged with "losses caused by illegal management" of the fund. "He was then in military service of the United States as a Captain stationed in the office of the Under Secretary of War in Washington. * * * the same day the summons was served, he changed his 'domicile and legal residence' to Washington, D. C. * * * He pleaded at length facts to support his claim that he was no longer domiciled in North Carolina. * * * Boone moved for a continuance to the 25th of May, 1942, his counsel, Roy L. Deal, stating that he expected soon to be called into service and would be unable to try the case, and asking the continuance in order to give defendant ample time to employ other counsel. The request was granted, and that date peremptorily set for the trial. * * * Boone was not present, but counsel appeared for him to move for a further continuance under the Soldiers' and Sailors' Civil Relief Act [of 1940]. This motion was denied, counsel who had presented the motion withdrew from the case, and the trial proceeded. The verdict of the jury went against Boone; and judgment was entered that the trust was governed by the terms of the will, that Boone had been guilty of serious misconduct of the trust fund, and that he be held personally liable for the consequent loss to the trust fund of more than $11,000, and removed as trustee. * * * Boone had been able to get away from Washington to go to New York for the taking of depositions on two separate occasions. He had long notice of the trial date and the court had placed in the files of his Department its order showing the desirability of his presence at that time. Boone, being a lawyer and presumably knowing the gravity of the accusations against him, might be expected to make some move to get leave to be present. If it were denied, he might be expected to expose every circumstance of his effort to the court in his plea for continuance. * * * Most lawyers trained in the equity tradition of trustee fidelity would regard a trial of this kind as a serious emergency. Did he apply for a leave at all? The affidavit pretty clearly implied that he had not. * * * No showing whatever was made as to any effort to obtain other counsel in the long interval allowed by the court for the purpose. This counsel was also stationed at Washington and said he 'would not assume to ask for leave at the present time, so soon after having reported for duty.' On the trial date defendant was nevertheless represented in court by local counsel. * * * he withdrew and declined to proceed further. * * * Counsel who had withdrawn from the trial argued the appeal in the Supreme Court of North Carolina. At all times since the action began defendant has also been represented by counsel from Detroit, Michigan. His inability to appear on the trial date was explained on the ground that he was 'definitely engaged at the present time in the trial of cases at Detroit which will require his presence in Court there for approximately thirty days.' No affidavit from this counsel was produced, and no explanation is made as to how it came that other 'cases' were given priority over this in view of the long notice of the trial date and its importance to the client. In this Court, Boone is represented by his Detroit counsel and by Deal, the lawyer who withdrew from the case to accept a commission in Washington. Besides these, there also appear four other lawyers, none of whom are included in the five who have represented him at previous stages in the case. * * * The court was dealing not only with an individual but with a trustee, one charged with default in his duty, and with a fund which was said to be in jeopardy. Defendant in spite of his military service in Washington was continuing to administer the fund. The defendant was a member of the bar, and the charges struck at his honor as well as at his judgment. Instead of seeking the first competent forum and the earliest possible day to lay his accounts out for vindication, he sought to escape the forum and postpone the day. He was both present and represented by counsel when depositions were taken which establish his speculation with the trust funds in his personal margin account. We think the record amply supports the conclusion of the trial judge that the claim that military service would prejudice the conduct of his defense, was groundless, and that the absence of himself and all of his numerous and not uncompensated counsel on the day of judgment was dictated wholly by litigious strategy. * * * But in some few cases absence may be a policy, instead of the result of military service, and discretion is vested in the courts to see that the immunities of the Act are not put to such unworthy use." (Italics added)

Though it appeared that Boone was "playing a game," "trifling with the court," guilty of "litigious strategy," the opinion was not unanimous. In the dissenting opinion by Mr. Justice Black the following well-considered and appropriate statement was made: "I believe that the clause under consideration requires that an action against a person in military service must be stayed unless the trial judge concludes (a) that no personal judgment will result and that the action will in effect preserve the interests of all the parties for the duration of the war; or (b) that the defendant is only a formal party; or (c) that the defendant need not be present for any purpose, either before, during, or after the trial, and that he will be adequately represented and has no need to testify or participate in any way; or (d) that the defendant's military service does not preclude him from having ample opportunity to get ready for, and to take his necessary part in the litigation. * * * The Court emphasizes that Boone is a member of the bar. But for the duration of the war, he is primarily a soldier, with a job to do which Congress intended should overshadow personal interests, whether his, or those of others who seek a personal judgment against him. * * * He is required to devote himself to serious business, and should not be asked either to attempt to convince his superior officers of the importance of his private affairs or to spend his time hunting for lawyers. The trial court should, at the very least, have inquired of the appropriate military authorities whether the petitioner could be granted ample leave to prepare his defense and be present for trial. If the Act does not require this, it serves little purpose. It may be argued that this petitioner, a man of knowledge and experience, is as competent to ask his superior officer for leave as is the trial court; but the argument fails because the policy set here, no matter how many qualifications the Court tries to work into it, will shoot far beyond the confines of this case."

I am of the opinion that Mr. Justice Black is correct. Though Boone v. Lightner, supra, was not cited in argument by the litigants herein, the majority opinion quotes freely therefrom. It fails, however, to be guided by the repeated admonition of Mr. Justice Jackson that each case should be governed by the particular facts involved. In the majority opinion the holding with reference to the lawyer-captain charged with misappropriation of money is held applicable to a sailor who was unfortunately involved in an automobile accident. In the Boone case there was an apparent effort made that Boone should never be forced to testify. In the present case the court was informed by the attorney representing the defendant that "if Allen Johnson is available whenever this case shall be tried, it is my intention, of course, to produce him as a witness."

A litigant is entitled, if possible, to be present at a trial. In the present case the reputation of the defendant for morality and sobriety was at stake. A deposition made by him was introduced, but his absence precluded an opportunity to interpret statements contained therein or to explain the circumstances surrounding a statement made to the district attorney of the county shortly after the accident as to visits to certain places earlier in the evening.

The insurance company was prevented from conferring with the defendant relative to the use of challenges to prospective jurors. This was important in view of the fact that defendant was a resident of the county, and his reputation as a visitor to certain houses indicated in the record as houses of ill-fame was an evidentiary matter. There is some evidence that he did not actually enter the particular places, and also evidence by a physician, called in by the police, who examined defendant immediately after the accident that he was not intoxicated. No charge of intoxication while driving or otherwise was placed against defendant. This likewise is important in view of the conclusion set forth in the majority opinion that the accident "was due to the liquor he had consumed." The opinion does not hold that defendant was intoxicated, although that was one of the main contentions of plaintiff. The defense should have been afforded the right to present the defendant as a witness and thus permit the jury to determine from the character of his testimony and the manner in which he might testify the merits of the contentions of the respective parties. The presence of the defendant no doubt would have materially affected the disposition of the case. Royster v. Lederle, supra.

It was an abuse of discretion to deny a continuance until it was demonstrated that defendant purposely enlisted to avoid the trial, or that he could have appeared notwithstanding his duty in military service.

In my opinion the judgment should be reversed.

1. Negligence ⟾138(4)

To justify an instruction on doctrine of "last clear chance", it must appear that plaintiff was negligent and as result thereof was in position of danger from which he could not escape by ordinary care, whether because of physical impossibility or total unawareness of danger, that defendant knew of plaintiff's situation and had last clear chance to avoid accident by exercising ordinary care and failed to do so to injury of plaintiff in accident proximately resulting from such failure.

See Words and Phrases, Permanent Edition, for all other definitions of "Last Clear Chance".

2. Automobiles ⟾227(1)

Where plaintiff while looking out side of automobile drove onto wrong side of highway and collided with defendant's truck, and defendant did not know that plaintiff was not looking where he was going, doctrine of "last clear chance" was inapplicable.

Where verdict was for defendant and evidence did not justify verdict for plaintiff under doctrine of last clear chance, the giving of instructions on last clear chance was harmless error.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; J. T. B. Warne, Judge.

Action by Fred M. Keller, an incompetent, by and through the guardian of his person and his estate, Mrs. Fred M. Keller, against Arden Farms, Inc., and others to recover for injuries sustained when plaintiff's automobile collided with a milk truck owned by corporate defendant. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiff appeals.

Affirmed.

Frank H. Love and Frank E. Carleton, both of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Gibson, Dunn & Crutcher by Philip C. Sterry, all of Los Angeles, for respondents.

W. J. WOOD, Justice.

Plaintiff commenced this action to recover for injuries which he suffered when his Lincoln Zephyr automobile collided with a milk truck owned by defendant Arden Farms Company and driven by defendant Lewis. Defendant Brant was "helper" on the truck for defendant Lewis. The jury returned a verdict in favor of defendants and from the resulting judgment plaintiff prosecutes this appeal.

It is conceded that plaintiff was guilty of negligence in the operation of his own automobile and that his negligence contributed to his injuries. Plaintiff contends, however, that defendants are liable under the doctrine of last clear chance. The trial court instructed the jury on the rules pertaining to this doctrine and it is now claimed that the instructions on this subject were prejudicially erroneous. Defendant, without conceding that the instructions were erroneous, contends that there was no justification for giving any instruction on the doctrine of last clear chance and that any errors that may be found in the instructions need not be given consideration.

The accident occurred at about 8:00 a. m. in the morning on July 25, 1940, on a winding road 36 feet wide in Griffith Park in the city of Los Angeles. Defendant Lewis testified that he first observed plaintiff's approaching automobile when it was 300 yards distant, at which time it was being operated on the wrong side of the road, rounding a curve. He observed plaintiff's car when it was about 100 yards distant, at which time it was on its own side of the road, where it continued up to a point about 50 feet away from the truck. It then suddenly and without warning swerved toward the center of the road and struck the side of the truck back of the cab. He testified that plaintiff's automobile was being driven at approximately 35 miles per hour and the truck approximately 20 miles per hour. When plaintiff's car started to swerve toward the truck, Lewis tried to pull over to the side of the road and at the same time applied his brakes, the truck being almost at a standstill at the time of the collision. Defendant Lewis further testified that he watched the course of the car and did not look at the driver; that he did not know until after the collision whether the driver of plaintiff's car was a man or a woman. Defendant Brant testified that he saw plaintiff's automobile when it was about 700 feet away, at which time it was on the wrong side of the road; that it travelled on the wrong side for about 100 feet and then went back to its own side of the road and continued on its own side of the road until it was approximately 50 feet from the truck, at which time it pulled over onto the truck. Defendant Brant further testified that he was looking at the car and did not observe the driver of the car.

Plaintiff relies upon the testimony of Gretsell McRae, the only other witness who saw the collision. She testified that she was driving her car about 75 feet behind defendants' truck and in the same direction as the truck. She was travelling down hill, waiting for a chance to pass the truck. She testified: "I should judge the Zephyr loomed up under the tree about 200 feet when it started angling over toward the truck, coming ahead, over directly this way. I judge that was about 200 or 250 feet from where I was. I don't know how fast the Lincoln was going and have no opinion." She further testified that plaintiff was looking "out over the golf course up to the time he plowed into the side of the truck. * * * he was looking out of the opposite side of the car from where the steering wheel is". She further testified that "the truck kept straight on, without changing its course, neither turning to the right nor left."

[1] The elements necessary to justify the court in instructing the jury on the doctrine of last clear chance are well stated in the frequently cited case of Girdner v. Union Oil Co., 216 Cal. 197, 202, 13 P.2d 915, 917: "That plaintiff has been negligent and, as a result thereof, is in a position of danger from which he cannot escape by the exercise of ordinary care; and this includes not only where it is physically impossible for him to escape, but also in cases where he is totally unaware of his danger and for that reason unable to escape; that defendant has knowledge that the plaintiff is in such a situation, and knows, or in the exercise of ordinary care should know, that plaintiff cannot escape from such situation, and has the last clear chance to avoid the accident by exercising ordinary care, and fails to exercise the same, and the accident results thereby, and plaintiff is injured as the proximate result of such failure." There must be substantial evidence before the court to establish all of these elements or the doctrine is not applicable.

[2] Two theories have been suggested as justification for giving instructions on the last clear chance doctrine, both of which are mentioned in the Girdner case. One theory is that under the circumstances set forth in the rule the conduct of defendant becomes so "wilful and wanton" that he should be held liable. Under the other theory plaintiff's original negligence becomes remote and defendant's failure to avoid the accident becomes the proximate cause of the injury. Under either theory it cannot be held that the doctrine is applicable in the present case. Unquestionably it would be idle to argue that the truck driver's conduct was wanton. There is no substantial evidence to establish that the truck driver saw plaintiff in a position of peril at a time when he could avoid the injury by the exercise of ordinary care. The two defendants testified that although plaintiff had at some distance down the curving road travelled on the wrong side of the road, he had returned to the proper side of the road and continued thereon until he suddenly swerved onto the truck. They had not observed anything dangerous about the situation. It is true that Mrs. McRae testified that she saw plaintiff's car when it was at a distance of 125 to 175 feet from the truck and that plaintiff was then looking to one side and continued to look to one side, but the fact that this witness noticed the direction that plaintiff was looking does not furnish evidence that defendant Lewis was aware that defendant was not keeping his eyes upon the road. Most drivers observe the cars that are approaching from the opposite direction but do not pay particular attention to the drivers, who can generally be seen only through the windshields. Both defendants testified that they did not know that plaintiff was looking away from the road. There is nothing in the testimony of Mrs. McRae to contradict the statements of the two men who were on the truck that plaintiff returned to his own side of the road before making the swerve into the truck. Clearly, it cannot be held that the conduct of plaintiff became the remote cause and the conduct of defendant Lewis became the proximate cause of the collision. In Johnson v. Southwestern Eng. Co., 41 Cal.App.2d 623, 107 P.2d 417, the perilous predicament of the plaintiff was due to the fact that he had fallen asleep when he drove his truck into the intersection of two roads. It was held that the doctrine of last clear chance was inapplicable, since the defendant had not observed that the plaintiff had fallen asleep and therefore did not have knowledge of his perilous situation.

[3] Since the evidence did not justify a verdict in favor of plaintiff under the doctrine of last clear chance, the court erred in giving any instructions to the jury on this subject. The errors in giving such instructions were not prejudicial.

The judgment is affirmed.

PETERSEN et ux. v. MURPHY et al.

Civ. No. 6856.

District Court of Appeal, Third District, California.

June 29, 1943.

Rehearing Denied July 28, 1943.

1. Trial 🔑391

Unless waived, full findings by trial court are required on all material issues raised by the pleadings and evidence in case.

2. New trial 🔑64

Where trial court renders judgment without making findings upon all material issues of fact, decision is against law, and constitutes ground for granting a new trial, provided it appears that there was evidence introduced as to such issue and evidence was sufficient to sustain a finding in favor of complaining party if omitted findings might have the effect of countervailing or destroying effect of other findings.

3. Trial 🔑404(1)

Trial court's findings are to receive such a construction as will uphold rather than defeat its judgment thereon, and are to be read together and liberally construed in support of the judgment.

4. Appeal and error 🔑1071(6)

If findings are made by trial court upon issues which determine a cause, other issues become immaterial and a failure to find thereon does not constitute prejudicial error.

5. Trial ⚷395(1)

Trial court's finding that all of the allegations of a pleading are true or are untrue is sufficient.

6. Trial ⚷397(2)

Trial court need not make specific findings as to each of several material issues where the findings, taken as a whole, clearly show that they include trial court's conclusion upon the material issues.

7. Trial ⚷395(1)

If trial court's findings necessarily negative allegations of defendants' answer as to which specific findings were not made, the findings are sufficient.

8. Trial ⚷397(6)

Trial court's general finding of ownership of disputed land in plaintiffs at all times and finding that defendants had no interest in the premises sufficiently negatived defendants' affirmative defenses of adverse possession, statute of limitations, estoppel and laches, without making specific findings thereon.

9. Appeal and error ⚷1071(6)

Trial court's failure to find on an issue is not ground for reversal unless it appears that there was evidence introduced as to such issue sufficient to sustain a finding in favor of appellant.

10. Appeal and error ⚷1071(6)

Where trial court's findings on an issue, if made, would necessarily have been against appellant, appellant cannot complain.

11. Appeal and error ⚷757(3)

Where appellants failed to point out in their brief evidence to sustain issues upon which appellants claimed that trial court failed to make findings, District Court of Appeal would assume that there was no such evidence, and, in absence thereof, trial court's failure to make findings could not be held reversible error. Appeal from Superior Court, Amador County; A. L. Pierovich, Judge.

Action by Wm. F. Petersen and Lois V. Petersen, his wife, against Clarence E. Murphy and another to determine exact location and boundaries of a mining claim which had been excepted from a patent to land held by plaintiffs. From a judgment in favor of plaintiffs, the defendants appeal.

Affirmed.

Jos. H. Huberty, of San Andreas, for appellants.

A. N. Perovich, of Lodi, and Snyder & Snyder, of Jackson, for respondents.

ADAMS, Presiding Justice.

This action was brought by plaintiffs to determine the exact location and boundaries of a mining claim which had been excepted from a United States patent to the S.E.¼ of the N.W.¼ and the N.E.¼ of the S.W.¼ of Section 3, T. 6 N., R. 12 E., M. D. B. & M. Plaintiffs had acquired the patented land and defendants the mining claim. It appears that a segregation survey had been made by the United States in 1881, but that the field notes of same had been lost in the San Francisco fire of 1906. The area claimed by defendants to constitute the mining claim as excepted from the patent covered a part of what plaintiffs claimed was the segregated area, but included a portion in dispute, upon which disputed portion defendants had erected certain improvements consisting of a dwelling house, a water tank, etc., used in connection with their mining operations.

Plaintiffs' complaint is in two counts. The first count is in the usual form of an action to quiet title to the S.E.¼ of the N.W.¼ and the N.E.¼ of the S.W.¼ of Section 3, T. 6 N., R. 12 E., M. D. B. & M., excepting therefrom a specifically described tract containing about nine acres representing what plaintiffs claimed to be a correct description of the segregated area. The second count alleges a trespass by defendants upon plaintiffs' land and the extraction of ore therefrom to plaintiffs' damage in a specified sum.

Defendants answered denying plaintiffs' claim of ownership and alleged defendants' ownership of the mining claim, giving a specific description of same in accordance with their own ideas as to its location and boundaries. They also alleged that they, by their predecessors, had taken possession of said quartz mining claim as described by them, and that ever since July 25, 1929, they had been in the actual, open, visible, notorious, exclusive, continuous, uninterrupted, quiet and peaceable possession of "said land", "under a claim of right, holding and claiming to own the same adversely to plaintiff, and all other persons," and that they had "paid all taxes levied on and/or assessed against" same for a period of five years and more immediately preceding the filing of plaintiffs' complaint. They denied generally the allegations of plaintiffs' second cause of action. As separate defenses they pleaded the statute of limitations, their construction upon the land as described by them of the improvements above mentioned, and the carrying on by them of extensive mining operations thereon, all with the knowledge of plaintiffs and their predecessors in interest throughout a period of eleven years, and that plaintiffs and their predecessors had full knowledge of defendants' possession and improvements, made no claim therefor and acquiesced in all things done by defendants thereon. They also alleged laches on the part of plaintiffs and their predecessors in that they had not commenced any proceedings within the eleven years, though they had knowledge of all of the foregoing facts.

At the conclusion of the trial the court made findings to the effect that about October 1, 1883, the United States government had issued a patent to the S.E.¼ of the N.W.¼ and the N.E.¼ of the S.W.¼ of said Section 3, T. 6 N., R. 12 E., M. D. B. & M., excluding therefrom the so-called Manzanita Quartz Claim and adjoining area; and describing said excluded area as same was described in plaintiffs' complaint. It also found "that at all the times referred to in plaintiffs' complaint, plaintiffs were, and now are, the owners and possessed and entitled to the possession of the above described premises, excepting the segregated area last above described, and that the defendants have not, nor has either of them, any right, title, or interest whatever, of, in, to, or upon the said premises so conveyed by the United States Government to said Alexander L. Harding, as above described"; also "that all of the allegations alleged in the first cause of action pleaded in plaintiffs' complaint herein, as amended, are true and correct, and that all of the denials thereof, and all of the allegations of the defendants contrary thereto, in their answer in said proceeding are untrue." As to plaintiffs' second cause of action it found that defendants had "wilfully, wrongfully, and unlawfully, and against the will of plaintiffs," entered upon plaintiffs' ground and mined ore therefrom, but that the trespass was without malice and the cost of extraction exceeded the values derived, and that plaintiffs had, therefore, suffered no damage. It found that defendants were the owners of the segregated area "as above described" and that "any and all allegations contained in said cross-complaint inconsistent with or contrary to the latter finding of fact, are not true."

It also found that "through mistake" defendants had erected improvements upon plaintiffs' premises and that said improvements were so constructed upon plaintiffs' said premises without any knowledge, deception, concealment or fraud on the part of the said plaintiffs, but that it would be equitable to permit defendants to remove the said improvements from the plaintiffs' said premises; and by the judgment which followed defendants were given six months within which to remove the said improvements.

Defendants have appealed, contending that the trial court committed reversible error in failing to find on the affirmative defenses pleaded by them, to wit: adverse possession, statute of limitations, estoppel and laches. They assert in their brief that on all of these defenses evidence was offered and received and that the evidence leads to the conclusion that appellants were the sole possessors of their improvements and the lands upon which they were located, that they made that their home for eleven years continuously preceding plaintiffs' action and were never molested in their enjoyment, that they alone carried on mining operations and work thereon, undisturbed, through said period, that they asserted ownership under a claim of right adverse to plaintiffs, but plaintiffs never claimed, and in fact disavowed in court, any claims to the improvements, that appellants paid taxes on their claim continuously from 1931 to 1941, that plaintiffs have never been in possession of the "Manzanita Claim" or any part thereof at any time within eleven years; that plaintiffs' predecessor knew of the construction of appellants' improvements, their expenditure of time, money and labor thereon, and made no objection thereto nor any claim thereto; and that plaintiffs and their predecessors slept on their rights, if any, for eleven years.

[1, 2] It is well established that unless waived full findings are required on all material issues raised by the pleadings and evidence in a case (24 Cal. Jur. 935-936); that where a court renders a judgment without making findings upon all material issues of fact, the decision is against law, and constitutes ground for granting a new trial provided it appears that there was evidence introduced as to such issue and the evidence was sufficient to sustain a finding in favor of the complaining party if the omitted findings might have the effect of countervailing or destroying the effect of the other findings. 24 Cal.Jur. 940-941; Powell v. Johnson, 50 Cal.App.2d 680, 683, 123 P.2d 875; Wilcox v. West, 45 Cal.App.2d 267, 114 P.2d 39.

[3, 4] But it is equally well established that the findings of a court are to receive such a construction as will uphold rather than defeat its judgment thereon (Breeze v. Brooks, 97 Cal. 72, 77, 31 P. 742, 22 L.R.A. 257), and are to be read and considered together and liberally construed in support of the judgment (Menghetti v. Dillon, 10 Cal.2d 470, 472, 75 P.2d 596; Cornell v. Hollywood Turf Club, 32 Cal. App.2d 204, 208, 89 P.2d 449); and that if findings are made upon issues which determine a cause, other issues become immaterial and a failure to find thereon does not constitute prejudicial error. 24 Cal. Jur. 947; Merrill v. Gordon & Harrison, 208 Cal. 1, 6, 279 P. 996.

We shall consider first whether the findings were sufficient to constitute findings upon all the material issues in the case. As hereinbefore pointed out, defendants alleged ownership of the land as described by them, and adverse possession; and set up, as special defenses, the statute of limitations, estoppel and laches. The court found that plaintiffs were and at all times alleged in their complaint had been and were the owners, possessed, and entitled to the possession of the premises as described in their complaint (which included the disputed area), and that defendants have no right, title or interest whatever in or to said premises. Also that all of the allegations alleged in plaintiffs' first cause of action were true, and that "all of the denials thereof, and all of the allegations of defendants contrary thereto, in their answer in said proceeding are untrue." Also it found that defendants were the owners of the segregated area as described in the findings and in plaintiffs' complaint (which omitted the contested area) and that "any and all allegations contained in said cross-complaint inconsistent with or contrary to the latter finding of fact, are not true."

[5] It has been held in numerous cases that a finding that all of the allegations of a pleading are true or are untrue is sufficient. Hackler v. Tubach, 129 Cal.App. 680, 684, 19 P.2d 295; Fritz v. Mills, 170 Cal. 449, 150 P. 375; MacMurtry v. Fraties, 84 Cal.App. 401, 258 P. 120; Ferguson v. Koch, 204 Cal. 342, 268 P. 342, 58 A.L.R. 1176; Hicks v. Reis, 21 Cal.2d 654, 134 P.2d 788; Stevens v. Stevens, 215 Cal. 702, 705, 12 P.2d 432; Carr v. International Indemnity Co., 58 Cal.App. 614, 617, 209 P. 83.

[6] Also, it is not necessary to make specific findings as to each of several material issues where the findings, taken as a whole, or construed together, clearly show that they include the court's conclusion upon the material issues. Bowers v. Union Trust Co., 117 Cal.App. 259, 264, 265, 3 P.2d 614.

[7] If the findings made necessarily negative the allegations of defendants' answer as to which specific findings are not made, the findings are sufficient. In Remillard Brick Co. v. Remillard-Dandini Co., 51 Cal.App.2d 744, 125 P.2d 548, in an action on a promissory note, the defenses of payment and failure of consideration were interposed. The court found a certain amount paid, leaving a specified balance due, and further found that "none of the allegations of defendant's answer except as herein set forth and incorporated are true." On appeal the sufficiency of the findings was attacked, but the court said (51 Cal.App.2d at page 749, 125 P.2d at page 551): "On the issue of payment, the trial court found the amount paid and the amount remaining owing and unpaid on each note. On the issue of failure of consideration, the general finding above quoted was a finding against the allegation of defendant's answer creating that issue." Also see Winsette v. Winsette, 47 Cal.App. 2d 308, 117 P.2d 897; Eastman v. Piper, 68 Cal.App. 554, 559, 229 P. 1002; Winder v. Winder, 18 Cal.2d 123, 114 P.2d 347.

[8] Thus it seems that special facts need not be detailed in the findings if a general finding necessarily embodies an implied finding on such special facts. Here the general finding of ownership in plaintiffs at all times, and the finding that defendants have no right, title or interest in the premises, negative defendants' claim of title by adverse possession, and it is further negatived by the finding that all of the allegations of plaintiffs' first cause of action are true and that all of the allegations of defendants' answer contrary thereto are untrue. These findings likewise negative the allegations of defendants' special defenses.

In Haigler v. Donnelly, 18 Cal.2d 674, 676, 117 P.2d 331, the court said that there was no error in the failure of the trial court to make an express finding upon an issue if it was implicit in the findings made, and that there is no necessity to negate contradictory allegations. And in New Blue Point Mining Co. v. Weissbein, 198 Cal. 261, 244 P. 325, 45 A.L.R. 781, the court said that the affirmative findings of the trial court on certain issues by necessary implication carried with them a negative finding of the truth of facts alleged in opposition thereto. And in Woodhead v. Wilkinson, 181 Cal. 599, 185 P. 851, 10 A.L.R. 291, a finding the defendant's negligence was the sole proximate cause of injuries sustained in an accident was said to imply a finding that plaintiff was not guilty of contributory negligence.

[9, 10] However, if we were to assume that the findings as made do not cover all material issues raised by the pleadings, failure to find on an issue is not ground for reversal unless it appears that there was evidence introduced as to such issue sufficient to sustain a finding in favor of appellant (24 Cal.Jur. 940, 941; Powell v. Johnson, 50 Cal.App.2d 680, 683, 123 P.2d 875); and where a finding, if made, would necessarily have been against appellant, he cannot complain of the lack of such finding. Moore v. Hoar, 27 Cal.App.2d 269, 81 P.2d 226, 238; Johnson v. Peck, 90 Utah 544, 63 P.2d 251, 254; Consolidated Irr. Dist. v. Crawshaw, 130 Cal.App. 455, 462, 20 P.2d 119; Brooks v. Bailey, 40 Cal. App.2d 310, 316, 104 P.2d 854; 24 Cal.Jur. 944.

[11] Appellants assert in their brief that the evidence conclusively establishes appellants' affirmative defenses to the exclusion of any contrary findings, but they do not set forth said evidence but on the contrary say that it "would be a waste of time and space to review the entire record" to prove that the record leads to such conclusions. Such being their position, they cannot expect this court to waste either time or space in an endeavor to find and set forth evidence to sustain the issues upon which appellants claim the court failed to make findings. And since counsel for appellants have not found it worth while to point out such evidence we shall assume that there is none such; and in the absence thereof a failure of the trial court to make findings thereon cannot be held to be reversible error.

Section 953c of the Code of Civil Procedure provides that where, as here, an appeal is taken by the alternative method provided by Section 953 et seq. of said code, in filing briefs in said appeal the parties must print in their brief, or in a supplement thereto, such portions of the record as they desire to call to the attention of the court. In Keele v. Clouser, 92 Cal. App. 526, 533, 268 P. 682, 685, the court said: "This court is not required to search the typewritten record in order to discover possible grounds for a reversal. If the appellant fails to print in his brief or supplement sufficient of the record to justify a reversal of the judgment, it will be affirmed on the ground that the record fails to show error. [In re] Estate of Berry, 195 Cal. 354, 358, 233 P. 330; Steineck v. Coleman, 72 Cal.App. 244, 236 P. 962." Also see Jeffords v. Young, 197 Cal. 224, 229, 239 P. 1054; Dahlberg v. Dahlberg, 202 Cal. 295, 298, 260 P. 290; Wilshire Oil Co. v. Star Petroleum Co., 93 Cal.App. 437, 441, 269 P. 722; Turell v. Anderson, 16 Cal.App.2d 445, 451, 60 P.2d 906.

Appellants have entirely failed to comply with this rule. Also, though proposed findings were duly served upon defendants, it does not appear that they proposed any different or additional findings, or that they requested any change or revision of same on motion for a new trial.

The judgment is affirmed.

1. Taxation 🔑500, 611(6)

In actions to enjoin collection of taxes and to have court revalue oil leases for taxation purposes, evidence sustained finding that county board of equalization did not decide taxpayers' applications on the merits but intentionally failed to consider evidence.

2. Taxation 🔑486

Where taxpayers filed applications with county board of equalization for reduction of valuation placed by assessor on certain oil leases, the taxpayers were entitled to a judicial determination, from a consideration of evidence, regarding true value of the leaseholds.

3. Taxation 🔑490

Determination of value of property by county board of equalization in passing on applications for reduction of valuations fixed by assessor is binding on court unless adjudication by board is so willfully erroneous and arbitrary as to work a constructive fraud on taxpayers.

Taxation 🔑490

Where county board of equalization in considering taxpayers' applications for reduction of property valuation fixed by assessor gave no consideration to evidence and rendered no decision on facts in issue, there was a denial of "due process of law", so that court was free to try question of valuation de novo.

See Words and Phrases, Permanent Edition, for all other definitions of "Due Process of Law".

SHINN, Acting Presiding Justice.

Plaintiffs Universal Consolidated Oil Company and Long Beach Harbor Oil Co. filed applications with the Los Angeles County Board of Equalization for reduction of valuations placed by the assessor upon certain of their oil leases in the Long Beach Harbor-Wilmington field; their applications were denied and they brought the present actions to enjoin collection of the taxes and to have the court revalue the leases for taxation purposes. The actions were consolidated for trial, separate judgments were entered in favor of plaintiffs and defendant county has appealed therefrom. The appeals are presented upon one record and present identical questions.

Universal has a three-acre lease which the assessor valued at $417,740, and a six-acre lease which was valued at $359,500; Long Beach Harbor Oil Co. has a two-acre lease which was assessed at $305,400. The values fixed by the judgment were, respectively, $222,000, $62,000, and $175,000.

The briefs discuss at length two of the grounds urged for reversal, first, that the court erred in trying de novo the questions which were before the board for decision, and, second, the claimed insufficiency of the evidence either at the hearing before the board or upon the trial to show illegality.

[1] The question of plaintiffs' right to a trial de novo and the one as to the sufficiency of the evidence to show circumstances under which denial of the applications would be constructively fraudulent have been set at rest by findings to the effect that the board did not decide plaintiffs' applications upon the merits but intentionally failed and refused to consider the evidence given in support of plaintiffs' applications, and in disregard thereof expressly, intentionally, deliberately and wilfully withheld decision of the questions of fact in issue. The basis of these findings was that the board acted under the erroneous belief that plaintiffs' applications did not make an issue of alleged overvaluations of the leases but presented only a question of law which the court would have to decide. The findings that the board gave no consideration to the evidence and rendered no decision thereon, in our opinion, have support in the evidence. When the applications came on for hearing, testimony was taken before Supervisors Jessup, Hauge, and McDonough, and the matter was taken under advisement. It was brought up at a later meeting, when the above named and also Supervisors Ford and Smith were present, neither of whom had attended the hearing nor heard the testimony. Two other applications were before the board at that time, namely, those of Signal Oil & Gas Company, No. 268, and Long Beach Oil Development Company, No. 269. At this meeting the following proceedings were had:

"Chairman Jessup: Signal Oil & Gas Company No. 268 and Long Beach Oil Development Company, No. 269.

"Mr. McDonough: This is a possessory interest?

"Mr. Ford: I was not in on this.

"Mr. Smith: 1-2 and 5.

"Mr. McDonough: This is in the same situation as Signal.

"Mr. Smith: Yes.

"Mr. McDonough: They are both alike.

"Mr. Smith: Signal Oil & Gas Company and the Universal Oil Company and Long Beach Oil Company.

"Mr. McDonough: There is a legal question involved here.

"Mr. Smith: I think they appeared only to protect their rights in court and made very little showing and I think we should deny it.

"Mr. McDonough: Well, I still think we should have an opinion of the County Counsel attached to the application for the advice of the Board and also in the event it is pursued in court.

"Mr. Smith: It is in court right now.

"Mr. McDonough: Let's set it aside for a moment.

"Mr. Smith: I made a statement during the hearing.

"Chairman Jessup: Now, on the Signal Oil & Gas Company, No. 268, Long Beach Oil Development Company No. 269, Universal Oil Company No. 1020, and Long Beach Harbor Oil Company No. 1021.

"Mr. McDonough: Mr. Boller is here.

"Mr. Boller: Yes.

"Mr. McDonough: Now, these oil applications that we heard, they indicated that the applications show a contractor's lease with the land owners for the purpose of drilling of wells.

"Mr. Boller: Yes, on Signal Oil & Gas and Long Beach Oil Development Company.

"Mr. Smith: Universal and Long Beach Harbor Oil Company were similar.

"Mr. Boller: I think the two were the only ones Mr. Holmes handled.

"Mr. McDonough: Holmes appeared for—

"Mr. Boller: For Signal Oil & Gas Company and the Long Beach Oil Development Company.

"Mr. Smith: Didn't you make a statement at the time of the hearing that they were here appearing in regard to protecting their rights.

"Mr. Boller: That was as to the Signal Oil & Gas and the Long Beach Oil Development Company only.

"Mr. Smith: The other two would be the same.

"Mr. Boller: There is no question but what that is so on the two cases Mr. Holmes presented.

"Mr. Smith: I move that the Long Beach Oil Development Company—

"Mr. McDonough: Wait a minute, I want to ask Mr. Boller would it help the case any if it was referred to the County Counsel.

"Mr. Boller: No.

"Mr. Smith: Move that it be denied.

"Mr. Boller: On the Long Beach Oil Development Company the application was for cancellation and was heard in the same hearing and is to be acted upon by the Board of Supervisors.

"Mr. McDonough: That is another application on a case coming to us.

"Mr. Boller: You have answered on that.

"Mr. Smith: I move that the Signal Oil & Gas Company be denied.

"Chairman Jessup: So ordered.

"Mr. Smith: I move that the Long Beach Harbor Oil Company be denied and Universal Oil Company No. 1020 be denied.

"Chairman Jessup: So ordered.

"Mr. Smith: That these four be denied.

"Chairman Jessup: So ordered.

"Mr. McDonough: On these matters it is a legal question to be determined by the Court rather than a matter of equalization.

"Mr. Boller: It is essentially so in the Signal Oil & Gas Company and the Long Beach Oil Development Company cases. It seems to me the others were factual in their showing.

"Mr. Smith: It is the same thing, they have a lease and are being assessed on their interests. They have a contract and are being assessed as though it were a lease. They are protecting their interest and in case the Long Beach Oil Development Company and the other one should win in court, these people are in the same position.

"Mr. Boller: Their agreement is not as carefully drawn up with the thought of not being taxable as a lease.

"Mr. Smith: Yes, the resumé they attach is exactly the same.

"Mr. Boller: I didn't look at them.

"Mr. McDonough: The basis is the determination of a legal question rather than an appeal on a question of equalization.

"Mr. Boller: It is so as to Signal and the Long Beach Oil Development Company."

From the foregoing partial transcript of the hearing, which was in evidence at the trial, it appears that two members of the board stated their understanding to be that they were passing upon four applications which raised only a question of law and no questions of valuation. In spite of the advice given by a deputy county counsel that plaintiffs' cases were factual, they persisted in the belief that all four were alike and that if the claimants Signal Oil & Gas Company and Long Beach Oil Development Company should prevail in court upon a point of law which they raised, plaintiffs also would prevail upon the same ground, which appears to have been that under the particular form of contract they held they should not have been assessed at all. Plaintiffs had made no such contention. At this meeting Supervisor Ford did not participate. Supervisors Smith and McDonough expressed their views as we have stated, and Supervisors Jessup and Hauge remained silent throughout the discussion. No reference was made to the evidence that had been taken on plaintiffs' applications nor to the factual questions involved. As we construe the findings they mean that the trial judge deemed the silence of those members who said nothing in denial of the statements of Supervisors Smith and McDonough as an acquiescence therein and that the board as a whole acted under a mistake of fact as to the nature of the proceeding depending upon plaintiffs' applications and as to the matters which it was called upon to decide.

In view of the extensive evidence which three of the members had heard, a reasonable explanation of the mistake would be that the members of the board present at the second meeting did not associate plaintiffs' applications then brought up for action with the ones upon which the evidence had been taken. Plaintiffs' counsel were not notified that the applications would be considered at this meeting, and they were not present. The confusion in the minds of the members was so definite that the attempted explanation by the deputy county counsel appears to have made no impression upon them. But whatever may have been the cause of the mistake, the record, when it speaks affirmatively, shows that the board acted under a serious mistake of fact.

[2, 3] Plaintiffs were entitled to a judicial determination, from a consideration of the evidence as to the true value of their leaseholds. Bandini Estate Co. v. Los Angeles, 1938, 28 Cal.App.2d 224, 82 P.2d 185; County of Los Angeles v. Ransohoff, 1937, 24 Cal.App.2d 238, 74 P.2d 828; Southern Pac. Land Co. v. San Diego Co., 1920, 183

Cal. 543, 191 P. 931; Blinn Lumber Co. v. County of Los Angeles, 1932, 216 Cal. 474, 482, 14 P.2d 512, 84 A.L.R. 1304; Birch v. Orange County, 1921, 186 Cal. 736, 200 P. 647. It is not to be questioned that had such a determination been made it would have been binding upon the court unless the adjudication by the board was shown to have been so wilfully erroneous and arbitrary as to work a constructive fraud upon plaintiffs. But here there was no adjudication as to the facts in issue and no consideration of the evidence or the merits of the applications, although the testimony offered by plaintiffs at the hearing, if believed reliable, would have justified a reduction of the assessments. The decision of the board was that it had nothing to decide. The consequences of this failure to act were just as disastrous to plaintiffs' cases as would have been the board's refusal to take jurisdiction of the proceeding or to accord plaintiffs a hearing.

Appellants' contention that there can be no trial de novo to review a decision of a board of equalization upon a re-examination of assessments fixed by the assessor is reasoned from the fact that it is the action of the board that is under review, and that the motives of the members and the validity of their acts must be judged from a consideration of what was before them and which alone could have furnished a basis for their decision. But this rule can have no application where there was no adjudication or attempted adjudication by the board of the one issue that plaintiffs raised, namely, as to the taxable value of their properties. Plaintiffs introduced at the trial new theories and supporting evidence to prove error in the methods followed by the assessor. We are not intimating that this was a proper procedure in the attempt to prove constructive fraud. But we are not considering the question of constructive fraud with relation to any decision made by the board upon the evidence before it or with relation to the motives of the members of the board. Neither are we considering a mistake on the part of the board in the decision of questions of fact nor intimating that we could do so. The board simply failed to function and its failure to render a decision left the whole proceeding as incomplete as if the applications had been denied without a hearing or without receiving evidence offered by the applicants.

[4] As it was established that the board gave no consideration to the evidence and rendered no decision upon the facts in issue, it must follow that there was a denial of due process of law. See cases cited supra. In that event, or from the mere fact that there had been no adjudication by the board as to valuations, the court was free to try the question of valuation de novo, as it did.

[5, 6] It would serve no purpose to discuss the extensive and technical evidence given before the board and the voluminous evidence at the trial. There were opposing theories and methods of valuation used by the assessor's engineer who testified upon each occasion, and plaintiffs' expert witnesses. Testimony was given at the trial by plaintiffs' witness Williams, admittedly competent to give his opinion as to values, and his valuations as to each of the leaseholds was considerably lower than the amounts found by the court to be the true values. The court was fully warranted in accepting them in preference to the ones expressed by the witnesses for appellant. The findings as to values are therefore conclusive on appeal.

We find no error in the record which would call for a reversal of either judgment.

The judgments are affirmed.

Civ. 14049.

District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California.

June 26, 1943.

1. Bills and notes 🔑134

Where note and agreement, whereby corporate maker agreed to pay payee a specified bonus, were executed at the same time, as between the original parties, note and bonus agreement were construed together as part of a single transaction, but payee's agreement to pay one-half the "bonus" to her attorney who was a maker was no part of the transaction, where neither the corporate maker nor makers other than the attorney were parties to payee's agreement.

2. Bills and notes 🔑129(1)

Where collaterally secured note provided that upon makers' failure to respond forthwith to payee's call for additional security obligation should become due, provision relative to additional security was not so ambiguous as to be void but payee had right to call for additional security and was not required to specify the character thereof, and where call for such security was not complied with, the note forthwith became due.

3. Bills and notes 🔑129(3)

Where blank for maturity date of note was left unfilled, note was a "demand note". Civ.Code, § 3088.

4. Bills and notes 🔑444

Under statute providing that makers engage to pay note according to its tenor, corporate maker's agreement to pay payee a specified bonus did not modify makers' obligation to pay contemporaneously executed note and action on note was not "premature" on ground that bonus agreement established a "condition precedent" upon which payment of note depended. Civ.Code, § 3141.

6. Usury 🔑83

Corporate maker's agreement to pay to payee a specified bonus on the first 560 tons of ore to be shipped from its mines did not render note usurious where corporation had previously assigned future proceeds from its operations and did not receive money therefrom.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Charles S. Burnell, Judge.

Action by Ione C. Kent against I. W. Lampman and others on a note. From an adverse judgment, named defendant and another appeal.

Affirmed.

Henry O. Wackerbarth, of Los Angeles, for appellants.

Henry P. Goodwin, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

DRAPEAU, Justice pro tem.

Three individuals and a corporation, as joint makers, made, executed and delivered to plaintiff a promissory note for $6,000. In preparing the note a mimeographed form was used, and the blank for a maturity date was not filled in, so that that portion of the note read: "—after date for value received". The note also recited that collateral security was deposited for the payment thereof, with the following provision: "That Ione C. Kent has the right to call for such additional security as she may deem proper, and on failure to respond forthwith to such call, this obligation shall immediately thereupon become due and payable;". Notice of demand for additional security was served upon the makers of the note and not complied with, whereupon complaint was filed in the Superior Court to enforce the obligation.

Default of one of the individual defendants was entered; the action was dismissed without prejudice as to another individual defendant. The trial court found in favor of plaintiff and rendered judgment for the principal sum of the note, together with attorney's fees and interest against the corporation defendant and two of the individual defendants, one of whom had answered and one of whom had defaulted.

Upon appeal from this judgment by one of the individual defendants and the corporation, five defenses are presented:

First: The provision above quoted in the note relative to calling for additional security is so ambiguous and uncertain as to make it void, and that in any event, the plaintiff in her demand for additional security did not specify what security was required, thus making the demand void and of no force and effect.

Second: Action was prematurely filed because the note did not contain a due date, and at the time of its execution an agreement was entered into between plaintiff and the makers which established a condition precedent upon which payment depended; and, in any event, the collateral security constituted a mortgage on personal property which may be foreclosed in only one way.

Third: Neither the conditions precedent upon which the maturity of the note depended had come to pass, nor had a reasonable length of time elapsed within which such conditions could have been performed, so that the plaintiff might declare the note to be due.

Fourth: An agreement by the defendant corporation to pay a bonus to the plaintiff rendered the whole transaction usurious.

Fifth: At the time the note was made plaintiff and defaulting defendant conspired to make a secret profit out of the transaction.

To understand these contentions, it is necessary to set forth in some detail the dealings between the several parties. The two defendants, one of whom defaulted and one of whom was dismissed, were members of the State Bar. They maintained a law office with a common reception room. The plaintiff, a widow, called at this law office and propounded questions to one of the lawyers about legal matters. The lawyer was unable to give her satisfactory answers, no charge was made for his services, and that matter concluded.

Two or three weeks later one of the lawyers called the widow on the telephone and invited her to come back to the law offices. When she called in response to this invitation a proposition was put before her by the two lawyers to loan the corporate defendant, a Nevada mining corporation, $6,000, for which she was to receive the promissory note here in question, executed by the corporation and signed by the individuals already named. All of the individual makers of the note were officers of the corporation. The ore to be mined was to be scraped with a bulldozer out of an open pit in Nevada. The corporation not only had no assets to support a credit of $6,000, but had already assigned future proceeds from its operations, so that at the time suit was commenced it had never received any money whatever therefrom, and the market for its product had disappeared.

The plaintiff turned over to the defendants cashiers' checks for $6,000, whereupon the defendants delivered to her the promissory note, and an agreement executed on behalf of the corporation to pay her a bonus of $10 per ton on the first 560 tons of ore to be shipped from the mine of the corporate defendant. This, despite the prior assignment of the ore. Finally, the plaintiff and one of the attorneys executed what might be termed a side agreement whereby the plaintiff was to pay one-half of the "bonus" to him. All of these agreements were prepared by the attorneys or their stenographers, and presented to the plaintiff at the same time, and on the same day she had been summoned to the law office. From the record it cannot be determined whether the last agreement was an attorney's fee for services by the defendant lawyer to the plaintiff, or whether it was executed by the lawyer for his own private benefit and without the knowledge of the corporation of which he was an officer.

[1] This being a controversy between the original parties, the note and the bonus agreement are to be construed together as part of a single transaction. Symonds v. Sherman, 219 Cal. 249, 26 P.2d 293. Obviously the agreement between the defendant lawyer and the plaintiff is no part of the transaction. Neither the corporation nor any defendant other than the attorney who executed it were parties to it.

[2, 3] Applying this rule, it becomes apparent that there is no ambiguity in the language set forth in the promissory note. The payee had the right to call for additional security; the call was made and not complied with; and thereupon, in accordance with the terms of the note, it forthwith became due and payable. The payee was not required to specify the character of the additional security. It was the obligation of the makers of the note to furnish additional security, which they wholly failed to do. And if the agreement relative to collateral security were ambiguous, the blank for maturity date having been left unfilled, it was a demand note. Civ.Code, § 3088.

[4, 5] There is no merit in the second and third defenses that the action was prematurely filed for the reason as stated that the bonus agreement constituted a condition precedent before suit could be brought. It is elementary law that the makers of a promissory note engage to pay it according to the tenor of the instrument. Civ.Code, § 3141. The trial court properly found that the bonus agreement did not modify the obligation to pay the note. There was no reference to any mortgage security and no intention evident by any of the parties to make any mortgage.

[6, 7] The defense of usury is just as inapplicable. There is no usury evident in the transaction. And the agreement between the lawyer defendant and the plaintiff did not destroy the obligation of the note.

The judgment is affirmed.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Diego County; Edward J. Kelly, Judge.

Action by Arthur H. Shipway against John C. Monise for injuries sustained in an automobile accident. From a judgment for defendant, plaintiff appeals.

Reversed and remanded.

A. T. Procopio and Irvin J. Kahn, both of San Diego, and Henry F. Walker, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Luce, Forward, Lee & Kunzel, of San Diego, for respondent.

BARNARD, Presiding Justice.

This is an action for damages for personal injuries. Shortly after midnight on October 5, 1941, the plaintiff and another pedestrian, while crossing Pacific Highway in San Diego, were struck by an automobile driven by the defendant. Pacific runs north and south and is a four-lane highway. The plaintiff had parked on the west side of Pacific and was walking across that street towards the east when he was struck by defendant's car, which had been traveling north in the westerly of the two lanes for north-bound traffic. There was some question as to whether the plaintiff was at the time within an unmarked crosswalk, but most of the evidence would seem to indicate that he was crossing Pacific at a point about 60 feet north of an intersection.

The plaintiff testified that before attempting to cross he looked to the north and saw two or three south-bound cars coming; that he waited until they went by and then proceeded to cross; that as he neared the center of Pacific he looked to the south for any north-bound traffic; that he saw two cars approaching, one in each lane; that he stopped to allow these cars to pass; that when he stopped the nearest north-bound car was 200 or 250 feet to the south; that the place where he stopped was in the northerly crosswalk, about two feet west of the center of Pacific; and that just before the car in the westerly of the two lanes reached him it swerved across the center line and struck him before he could get out of the way.

The defendant testified that he was traveling north about two or three feet easterly from the center line; that his car at no time crossed over the center line of Pacific; that he did not see the plaintiff and first became conscious of having had an accident when he heard a "thud" at the front of his car; that there were several cars approaching from the north, one of which had unusually strong lights; and that while he was straining his eyes and trying to watch "this thud happened." Another witness testified that shortly after the accident he asked the defendant if he had seen the pedestrians before he struck them and that the defendant replied that "they loomed up in front of him about ten feet ahead."

A jury returned a verdict in favor of the defendant and the plaintiff has appealed from the judgment on the ground that the court erred in giving and refusing certain instructions.

One of the most important questions of fact presented at the trial was as to whether the appellant was guilty of negligence in failing to comply with the rules of law governing the manner in which he might cross a street between intersections, outside of a crosswalk. The giving of proper instructions applicable to that issue was, therefore, important and whether the jury was properly instructed in this regard is the main question raised on this appeal.

[1, 2] Section 562 of the Vehicle Code, St.1935, p. 188, provides that while so crossing a roadway a pedestrian shall yield the right of way to passing vehicles, but that this rule shall not relieve the driver of a vehicle from the duty of exercising due care for the safety of the pedestrian. In a number of cases in this state the meaning of this section has been passed upon. In Genola v. Barnett, 14 Cal.2d 217, 93 P.2d 105, it was held, in effect, that the right of way thus given to the driver of a car by this section is not an absolute one, that the section is not a prohibition against crossing between intersections, and that even where a pedestrian fails to so yield the right of way he may recover where it appears that the vehicle in question was being improperly operated. In Brannock v. Bromley, 30 Cal.App.2d 516, 86 P.2d 1062, 1067, the court stated that this duty of a pedestrian to yield the right of way may call for a higher degree of care than would be necessary for one crossing at a regular crosswalk, but that "the question as to whether or not such care was exercised in a given case is one for the jury, unless he is so careless that it can be said he is negligent as a matter of law." In Verner v. Skov, 20 Cal.App.2d 232, 67 P.2d 123, it was held that this statutory provision does not give the driver of the car an absolute right of way without regard to the surrounding circumstances and that whether a reasonably prudent person would have crossed at the particular time and place depends upon a number of things, such as the distance and speed of the approaching car, and was a question for the jury. In Watkins v. Nutting, 17 Cal.2d 490, 110 P.2d 384, 387, the court said: "The right of the automobile driver to claim the right of way over a pedestrian crossing a highway other than at an intersection, or in a marked crosswalk, is not, therefore, an absolute one, nor is the pedestrian absolutely prohibited from so crossing. * * * Where, as in the present case, there is evidence that the injured person looked, but either did not see the approaching automobile, or saw it and misjudged either its speed or distance, the question whether, under the particular circumstances then existing, he was guilty of contributory negligence is one of fact."

The respondent relies on Chase v. Thomas, 7 Cal.App.2d 440, 46 P.2d 200; Vitali v. Straight, 21 Cal.App.2d 253, 68 P.2d 746, and Weissman v. Seehusen, 55 Cal.App.2d 391, 131 P.2d 10, as holding, in effect, that under section 562 an absolute right of way is given to the driver of the vehicle and that such a pedestrian must yield the right of way. Some of the language used in these cases is somewhat inconsistent with the rules above referred to, but that language was used in discussing factual situations and not in connection with instructions given, and those were all cases where contributory negligence appeared as a matter of law or very clearly appeared as a matter of fact. These cases are not controlling here.

In this case, after giving several instructions to the effect that the driver of the automobile was bound to use ordinary care in the operation thereof and that the plaintiff was bound to use ordinary care in crossing the street, and in looking carefully in the direction from which the approach of vehicles might be anticipated, the court read the provisions of section 562 of the Vehicle Code and then instructed the jury that if it should find that the plaintiff conducted himself at that time and place in violation of that section such conduct constituted negligence, as a matter of law, and that if such negligence was a proximate cause of the injuries the verdict must be for the defendant. It may be noted, in passing, that while the court thus told the jury that a violation of this section by the plaintiff would constitute contributory negligence as a matter of law, it neither commented on the second part of that section, which somewhat modifies the effect of the first part, nor explained the rights and duties of a pedestrian under such circumstances as those rights and duties have been interpreted and clarified in the cases above cited.

[3] Immediately after the instruction above referred to the court gave one reading as follows: "You are further instructed that if you should find that plaintiff in this case, at the time of the accident, was crossing Pacific Avenue at a point other than within a marked cross-walk or within an unmarked cross-walk at an intersection, as provided in Section 562 of the Vehicle Code, the plaintiff would have been obliged not only to yield the right of way to the automobile of the defendant, but also at all times to exercise due care in the use of the highway; and if you should further find that the plaintiff made no effort to do either, and that his failure in this regard contributed proximately to the accident, your verdict must be for the defendant." In this instruction the jury was told that the plaintiff was not only obliged to exercise due care in the use of the highway but was also obliged to yield the right of way to the driver of the automobile. This is hardly a correct statement of the law and places a greater burden upon the plaintiff than that imposed upon him by the law. While it was his duty to exercise due care in crossing the highway, under the existing circumstances, if he did exercise such care he was entitled to proceed and was not obliged to yield the right of way in any event. Under the preponderance of the evidence, so far as shown by the record, the jury could hardly have helped finding that the appellant did not, in fact, yield the right of way to the respondent. This instruction came very close to telling the jury that this fact alone would prevent a recovery on his part.

After the jury had been sent out it returned into court and asked for further instructions "Relative to pedestrians' rights and responsibilities in crossing the highway in the middle of the block." The court then said:

"If you should find that the plaintiff was crossing Pacific Highway at a point other than the marked or unmarked crosswalk, then that pedestrian must yield the right of way to a motor vehicle on the highway. The motor vehicle has the right of way. It is his duty to yield to the vehicle which has the right of way.

"If you should find that the plaintiff was crossing at a crosswalk which is created by the prolongation of the curb and property lines across the street, then the pedestrian has the right of way and the automobile must yield to the pedestrian. Anyone using a highway has a right to expect that everyone else using the highway shall obey the law, but one must not rely upon that expectation to the extent that he does not take reasonable care not to do an injury to another.

"Now, that is about as far as I can go on these instructions."

[4, 5] While the duty to yield the right of way, imposed on a pedestrian by section 562, may call for a higher degree of care while crossing between intersections, the real question of fact in such a case is whether the required care has been exercised, and not merely whether or not the right of way has been actually yielded. These instructions, as a whole, emphasized the duty of the appellant to yield the right of way and failed to clearly inform the jury that that duty was not absolute and that the real question of fact in that connection was whether the appellant had exercised reasonable care under the circumstances there and then existing. This defect in the instructions was greatly accentuated in the final instruction, after the jury had returned and asked for further light on that particular matter. The jury was then told in precise language, and in reply to a definite question, that the vehicle had the right of way and the pedestrian must yield thereto. To thus instruct the jury that the appellant was "obliged" to yield the right of way, that he "must" yield it, and that it is his "duty" to yield it was, in effect, to instruct the jury that the driver's right to the right of way was absolute. In spite of technical niceties it can hardly be doubted that a jury would so understand, especially in view of the language used in response to its inquiry with respect to that very matter, about which the previous instructions had left it in doubt. Under these circumstances, it cannot reasonably be held that the giving of the final instruction in this form was not prejudicial to the appellant.

In some manner the jury should have been told that the right of the respondent to the right of way was not an absolute one, and that it should consider and decide whether or not the appellant acted with reasonable care under the conditions as they existed, including the matter of whether or not, as a reasonable man and in view of those conditions, he was justified in believing that he could safely proceed without interfering with the other's right of way.

[6] The appellant also attacks a number of other instructions given by the court. While some errors appear therein they could hardly be held sufficiently prejudicial to justify a reversal, and it is unnecessary to discuss them as they have now been pointed out and may easily be corrected upon a new trial. The appellant further contends that the court erred in refusing to give an instruction offered by him applying the doctrine of last clear chance. Not only was this instruction erroneous, in the form in which it was offered, but after reading the record we are of the opinion that no instruction of that nature should have been given under the circumstances here appearing.

The judgment is reversed and the cause remanded for a new trial.

Appeal from Superior Court, Napa County; Arthur Coats, Judge.

Action by Henry Eisenmenger against John Eisenmenger and William Eisenmenger for a judicial determination that defendants hold title to a certain ranch in trust for plaintiff, wherein John Eisenmenger cross complained. Judgment for defendant John Eisenmenger, and plaintiff appeals.

Affirmed.

E. B. Mering, of San Francisco, for appellant.

King & King, of Napa, for respondents.

PETERS, Presiding Justice.

The plaintiff, Henry Eisenmenger, and the defendants, John and William Eisenmenger, are brothers. The action was brought by Henry to have it determined that defendants hold title in trust for him to a 76 acre ranch in Napa County. William, who resides in Alaska, defaulted. The complaint alleges that John originally owned the property; that prior to October 14, 1930, John deeded the property to William to secure a $100 loan; that on October 14, 1930, it was agreed between Henry and John that "in consideration of said Henry Eisenmenger having lived for several years upon said property and having during all of said time taken care of their mother and stepfather, and also in consideration of Henry Eisenmenger having paid to said John Eisenmenger the sum of ——— and also in consideration of the promise of said Henry Eisenmenger that he would continue in the future to take care of said persons as he had done in the past that said John Eisenmenger would convey all of said property to said Henry Eisenmenger, in consideration of the matters above set forth, and also the promise of said Henry Eisenmenger to pay the funeral expenses of said parents." The alleged agreement is attached to the complaint as an exhibit. The complaint also alleged that Henry prepared deeds to be executed by William and forwarded the same to him together with an offer to execute a mortgage in favor of William to secure John's debt for which William then held the deeds as security; that William failed and refused to execute the deeds; that defendants have been in possession since that date and have removed certain buildings from the premises. Plaintiff avers full performance on his part of the terms of the alleged agreement between him and John. He prays for a decree that defendants hold the property in trust for him, and for damages for the use and occupation.

As disclosed by plaintiff's complaint, it is his theory that by the agreement of 1930 between him and John, William was to receive a mortgage from Henry in lieu of holding the deeds as security for John's debt to William. William was not a party to the agreement, and, it is alleged, refused to convey to Henry. It will be noted that, as pleaded, the conveyance was to be made in the future in return for certain considerations to be furnished by Henry, some of which were past and some future considerations.

John filed an answer and cross complaint. He averred that John paid William the amount owing to him and that on July 21, 1931, William conveyed the property to John. This deed was not recorded until after this action was commenced. John also averred that Henry failed to perform the agreement; that he failed to support the mother and stepfather; refused to pay the burial expenses of the mother, except for the sum of $20; failed to pay the doctor bills of the mother, except for $20; failed to pay the taxes; and that he, John, fully performed. He also pleaded the statute of limitations, and title by adverse possession, alleging possession and payment of taxes for the requisite period.

The trial court found that plaintiff had no interest in the property; that the agreement alleged in the complaint "was never consummated by any of the parties thereto and that no trust involving said property was ever created in favor of the plaintiff herein"; that plaintiff's cause of action was barred by the statute of limitations; and that, in any event, defendant had title by adverse possession.

Aside from certain technical contentions which are without merit, plaintiff's appeal is predicated upon the contention that the findings are unsupported.

The alleged agreement of October 14, 1930, is pleaded as an exhibit to the complaint. It is in the form of a letter addressed to William, in Alaska, and was admittedly signed by John. In that letter John requests William to execute the deeds which Henry had sent to William that morning, and states that Henry will give William a note and mortgage for the amount William had advanced to John. The letter reads in part: "I am in the office of C. M. Dawson, the attorney, handling the property situation, together with Henry, mother and my stepfather, and we have come to an agreement whereby Henry is to take over my interest in the property according to an agreement we had a year ago, Henry having paid the money to me as agreed and if you will sign the deeds of conveyance which Henry has mailed to you this morning it will fully straighten out the family differences. * * *

"We have come to an agreement relating to taking care of the old folks and I have agreed to give mother $10.00 a month and Henry will take care of the old folks for the balance of their lives, paying all expenses during their lives and funeral costs."

Henry signed a postscript to the letter stating: "This is a satisfactory arrangement with me and full agreed upon by my brother John and I, and I will see that you get the mortgage as soon as the matter is straightened out. As soon as possible I will pay the amount due you on the mortgage."

[1] It is an admitted fact that William never executed the deeds to Henry. It is also admitted that Henry never paid William the debt owed by John. The fact that William deeded the property to John on July 21, 1931, supports an inference that John paid this debt. The evidence offered by plaintiff on the other issues involved was most unsatisfactory and incomplete. On the issue of whether prior and subsequent to 1930 Henry had supported his mother and stepfather, the evidence is in conflict. There is evidence that he did not do so, although there is considerable evidence the other way. Such conflicts were for the trial court. There is evidence that John paid the last illness expenses for the mother, and that John and other brothers paid her funeral expenses. Henry testified he paid these bills in part but admitted he did not pay them in toto. It is obvious, therefore, that the trial court was justified in finding that the agreement of October 14, 1930, was never consummated —i.e., never performed by plaintiff.

As already pointed out, the complaint is squarely based on the letter of October 14, 1930. That letter refers to some agreement having been made between John and Henry the preceding year whereby Henry was to take over John's interest in the property. Henry testified that the 1929 agreement was in writing; that he had placed it in an old trunk; that it had been stolen from the trunk; and that he had a witness in the courtroom who saw it stolen. That witness was never produced. No satisfactory evidence was given as to the contents of this earlier agreement. It was apparently the theory of Henry that, prior to 1929, he had advanced $1,500 to help pay the expenses of the old folks, and that this was an obligation of John's. Apparently, although this is not entirely clear, this is the sum referred to in the letter of October 14, 1930, as having been paid by Henry. The complaint, in setting forth this transaction, leaves this sum blank. The record is entirely silent as to whether this was the total sum to be paid by Henry, or whether the 1929 agreement contained other covenants to be performed by Henry. The very fact that the 1930 agreement was entered into implies that the 1929 agreement was abrogated. This inference is supported by the fact that in the 1930 transaction Henry assumed certain executory obligations. If the 1929 agreement was complete, the property was his without further obligation on his part. This was apparently the theory adopted by Henry on the trial. At that time, apparently in an attempt to excuse his failure to perform some of the executory obligations of the 1930 agreement, Henry took the position that he was relying on the 1929 agreement. During his examination, the court asked Henry: "So you do not claim this agreement [that of October 14, 1930] as the agreement whereby you ought to have the property because you claim you already bought it before? A. I already bought it, but that [the 1930 agreement] just shows I did buy it a year ago. It says, 'According to an agreement we had a year ago.' It is still on there. That makes it '29."

[2] While plaintiff's testimony, which was supported by that of several witnesses, was that prior and subsequent to 1930 he had assumed almost the sole burden of supporting the mother and stepfather, and that, until 1931 or 1932, he had operated the ranch and at his own expense constructed several buildings thereon, the evidence is not in such a state that it requires a holding that, as a matter of law, a binding agreement, whether of 1929 or 1930, remained in effect. The burden rested on the plaintiff to show the terms of the contract forming the basis of his claim, and to show that that agreement, insofar as it was executory, had been performed by him. The agreement was executory as to John insofar as it required a future transfer by John or William to Henry. Unless plaintiff fully performed his part of the agreement he is in no position to demand a transfer. The terms of the 1929 agreement were not shown. Hence, it cannot be held that under that agreement there was an executed consideration. The complaint alleges, and the 1930 agreement recites, that, as part of the consideration for the transfer, Henry was to take care of the mother and stepfather for the balance of their lives and was to pay their funeral expenses. The evidence is in conflict on whether he performed these executory obligations.

Moreover, the agreement of 1930 contemplated a deed from William to Henry. In view of what has already been stated, it is clear that the evidence is too uncertain to support a finding, much less compel one, that a binding obligation to transfer the property continued when the transaction was not consummated as contemplated. Furthermore, there is no evidence that Henry ever paid William, which would indicate either that the agreement was abrogated when William failed to cooperate, or that if it continued in effect between Henry and John, that Henry failed to perform.

[3, 4] The trial court also found that plaintiff's action was barred by the statute of limitations. This finding is also supported. If a trust was created in 1930, and if John thus held the property subject to an enforceable claim of Henry, the statute would commence to run against enforcement of such claim from the date of repudiation by John. The evidence shows that the trust agreement, if any existed, was repudiated by John shortly after 1930. The mother died in May, 1931. Shortly thereafter, Henry was ordered off the premises by the Harts who were acting as the agents for John. In 1934—six years before the present action was commenced—Henry, in a prior action, sued to enforce the trust because of an alleged repudiation by John. The parties here stipulated that the judgment of nonsuit in that case was not res judicata, but the fact that an action was then commenced is some evidence that there had been a repudiation of the trust, if any existed, prior to 1934.

[5] The court also found that, in any event, John had title by adverse possession, finding, in this connection, that John had been in actual, adverse and exclusive possession of the property for more than five years next preceding the action and had paid the taxes thereon. The land is located in a remote portion of Napa County. John purchased it in 1923 and admittedly Henry operated it until 1931. John at no time lived on the property. He was a motorman in San Francisco until 1937 when he was sentenced to McNeil Island Federal Prison for a narcotic offense. He served twenty-seven months, and since his release has resided near the property in question. The evidence shows that Chris Hart (a brother of the two litigants, although he uses a different name) and his wife own a ranch adjoining the ranch here involved. Since sometime in 1931 or 1932 the Harts, except for a short period when John leased the premises to a tenant, have been in possession of the ranch as agents of John. John paid the taxes up to 1934 or 1935 and since that time the taxes have been paid by the Harts. John has given the Harts his note secured by a deed of trust on the property for all sums expended by them on his behalf. Thus, although John was not in personal possession, he has been in open and actual and adverse possession of the property through the agency of the Harts for more than five years preceding the action. Taxes having been paid, and a repudiation of the trust having occurred more than six years before the filing of the action, John now has title by adverse possession.

The judgment is that John owns the property free of any claim of Henry.

From what has been said, the trial court's holding was justified either on the theory that the agreement upon which plaintiff claims was never consummated, or that such agreement was repudiated by John who has since secured title by adverse possession.

The judgment is affirmed.

ELLENBERGER v. CITY OF OAKLAND et al.

Civ. 12338.

District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California.

June 25, 1943.

1. Evidence ⚷91

Burden of proof is on party presenting affirmative of issue. Code Civ.Proc. § 1981.

2. Evidence ⚷98

Where there is no evidence on an issue, finding should be against party who has burden of proof. Code Civ.Proc. § 1981.

3. Mandamus ⚷168(2)

Where, in proceeding on petition of policeman's widow to compel payment of pension, there was no evidence showing a causative connection between policeman's fall and death of policeman seven years thereafter, burden of proof did not shift to respondents.

4. Mandamus ⚷168(4), 187(9)

In proceeding on petition of policeman's widow to compel payment of pension, neither trial court nor reviewing court was permitted to surmise that respondent board of trustees of respondent city's police relief and pension fund was attempting to deprive petitioner illegally of a pension.

5. Mandamus ⚷168(4)

In action by policeman's widow to compel payment of pension, evidence as a matter of law did not require finding that policeman's fall, seven years prior to death, caused stroke which policeman suffered after fall and which resulted in death.

6. Continuance ⚷47

In support of a motion for continuance, it is incumbent on a party to be pre- where witnesses are not subpoenaed, to pared to prove its affirmative allegations or show sufficient excuse for failure to subpoena witnesses. Code Civ.Proc. §§ 1869, 1981.

7. Continuance ⚷47

Failure of a party to produce necessary evidence on a motion for continuance places the trier of facts in a position where evidence which party does introduce should be viewed with distrust. Code Civ.Proc. § 2061, subds. 6, 7.

8. Continuance ⚷26(3)

In proceeding on petition of policeman's widow to compel payment of pension, where petitioner's affirmative allegations as to sequence of causation from date of accident to date of death, seven years thereafter, which was the main question in the case, required expert evidence, and record did not disclose that petitioner's counsel made any preparation to call expert witnesses, refusal of continuance until counsel could obtain attendance of physician to prove matters that were not satisfactory to the court was not error. Code Civ.Proc. §§ 1869, 1981, 2061, subds. 6, 7.

9. Mandamus ⚷187(9)

In proceeding on petition of policeman's widow to compel payment of pension, where one question was whether policeman's fall, seven years before death, had caused a stroke or had been caused thereby, and there was evidence, aside from policeman's own statements, that policeman had fallen, exclusion of testimony of another policeman that immediately after the fall deceased had stated that deceased had slipped and fallen was, if error, without prejudice to petitioner.

Appeal from Superior Court, Alameda County; John J. Allen, Judge.

Petition by Annie Ellenberger against the City of Oakland, a municipal corporation, and others, for a writ of mandate. From an adverse judgment petitioner appeals.

Affirmed.

A. D. Ericksen, of Oakland, and Johnson & Harmon and William H. Henderson, all of San Francisco, for appellant.

F. Bert Fernhoff, City Atty., and John W. Collier, Asst. City Atty., both of Oakland, for respondents.

WARD, Justice.

This appeal is taken from an order denying appellant's petition for a writ of mandate to compel the Board of Trustees of the Police Relief and Pension Fund of the City of Oakland to grant her a pension amounting to one-half of the salary of her deceased husband as a policeman of the municipality.

The amended petition alleges that prior to January 6, 1932, George Ellenberger was in perfect health; that on that date "while in performance of his duty as such policeman, said George Ellenberger, while stepping on the running board, slipped between the patrol wagon and another car, twisted his neck and struck his head against the side of the patrol wagon; that immediately thereafter said George Ellenberger felt a severe pain in the neck and later nausea and dizziness and he lost consciousness; that he suffered a cerebral hemorrhage, injury to muscles and nerves of the head and neck, cerebral lesion and shock"; that subsequent to the accident Ellenberger showed a steady deterioration in health which, as alleged, was traceable to the injuries suffered in 1932.

There is no dispute that a stroke in 1939 caused death, or that there was a decline in Ellenberger's health from 1932 to 1939; also there is evidence that he suffered a fall in 1932 during the performance of his police duties, but whether this fall brought about a stroke or whether a stroke caused the fall, or whether the first attack contributed to the second, are the particular questions which were presented to the trial court.

[1-5] Appellant presents the first contention in the following form: "There is no substantial evidence supporting the court's findings that George Ellenberger did not fall on January 6, 1932, and strike his head while in the performance of his duties as policeman causing injuries directly resulting in his death on July 28, 1939." It is immaterial whether there is substantial evidence to support such a finding, though the evidence indicates justification for such a conclusion. The rule is that the burden of proof is upon the party presenting the affirmative of the issue. Code Civ.Proc. § 1981; Montgomery v. Board of Administration, etc., 34 Cal.App.2d 514, 93 P.2d 1046, 94 P.2d 610. If there is no evidence upon an issue, the finding should be against the party who has the burden of proof. This case does not even present a situation where if a prima facie case is presented, the burden of proof shifts to the opposing litigant. There is an entire absence of evidence as the record now stands, showing a causative connection between the occurrence of 1932 and the demise of Ellenberger in 1939; a conclusion to that effect must rest on nothing but conjecture. Neither the trial nor a reviewing court is permitted to surmise that there has been an attempt on the part of the board to illegally deprive the widow of a deceased officer of a pension. Omitting for the moment certain medical reports which will be considered later, the evidence as a matter of law does not require a finding that the fall of 1932 caused any stroke which the deceased may have suffered. In this respect the case is to be distinguished from Naughton v. Retirement Board of S. F., 43 Cal.App.2d 254, 110 P.2d 714, and Brant v. Retirement Board of S. F., 57 Cal.App.2d 721, 135 P.2d 396. In both these cases this court held that the uncontradicted evidence showed the receipt of an injury in the course of the employment and a causal relation between such injury and the death.

Up to this point the appeal has been viewed solely upon the record as it stands. The difficulty, if any, in the present appeal arises from the fact that certain medical reports were offered in evidence, to which objections were sustained, and that these were not all marked as exhibits, although two were so marked. Subsequently the trial court stated: "These reports may be considered for what they are worth." Assuming the possibility that the trial court intended to mark them as exhibits, and since the transcript is prefaced with the statement that the "exhibits [medical reports] were added to reporter's transcript by stipulation of respective counsel on settlement of transcript," in the interest of justice we have considered them.

Most of the reports indicate Ellenberger's physical decline from 1932 to the date of his death in 1939. The only statement, or part thereof, called to our attention in support of a theory that the 1932 accident, spell, stroke or fall was responsible for the affliction in 1939, appears in a report of a Dr. Warren B. Allen, who examined Ellenberger in 1932 and 1939, which is as follows: "It will probably be necessary to assume that the patient had a slight head injury on January 6, 1932, with little or no concussion, but which was followed by an edema of the brain which accounted for his delayed vomiting and unconsciousness. The microscopic findings in the cerebral spinal fluid would indicate a previous mild inflammatory disease of the meninges suggesting a chronic arachnoiditis (see lab. report) pre-existing and activated by the trauma." The report of Dr. Allen further stated that he did not feel that the injury sustained in 1932 "contributes or is responsible for his present disability" and "is not in any way industrial." Considering all of the hospital and medical reports as part of the record, there is no evidence that the condition which resulted in death was connected with the "fall" sustained in 1932. The reports are all based upon a statement by Ellenberger that he was stepping from an ambulance to a patrol wagon when he slipped "striking his head and straining his neck." This evidence, if admissible, does not require a finding as a matter of law that the fall caused a stroke suffered then, nor a subsequent one.

[6-8] When it appeared that the court intended to render judgment for respondent, and that it did not deem the medical reports, if admissible, sufficiently substantial to warrant any other decision, petitioner's counsel asked for a continuance "until we can get a doctor * * * to prove these facts that are not satisfactory to the court." Counsel for petitioner did not state the name of the doctor they wished to call, nor the particular, or any, point petitioner hoped to prove. Petitioner's counsel knew or should have known the contents of the medical reports. The sequence of causation from the date of the first trouble in 1932—the main question in the case—required expert evidence. The record does not disclose that any preparation was made to call any of such witnesses, whose testimony would be necessary to prove petitioner's theory. It is incumbent upon a party to be prepared to prove affirmative allegations (Code Civ. Proc., §§ 1869, 1981) or to make a sufficient showing why witnesses were not subpoenaed. Failure to produce necessary evidence places the trier of the facts in a position where the evidence introduced should be viewed with distrust. Code Civ. Proc., § 2061, subds. 6, 7.

[9] The third assignment of error is that the court erred in ruling inadmissible the testimony of a police officer that immediately after his fall in 1932 Ellenberger stated that he slipped and fell. Assuming that the statement was part of the res gestae, and there is authority for such assumption (Showalter v. Western Pac. R. Co., 16 Cal.2d 460, 106 P.2d 895), it does not appear that petitioner was prejudiced by the ruling. There is evidence that Ellenberger had fallen between the two cars to the floor of a garage, and this is borne out by the condition of his uniform, which was covered with dirt and grease. In addition the hospital reports, which were considered by the court, referred to Ellenberger as having "slipped, striking his head and straining his neck." The trial court found in accordance with appellant's position that decedent "slipped * * * twisted his neck and struck his head against the side of the patrol wagon." A statement by the police officer, had it been admitted, would not have determined whether a stroke caused the fall or the fall caused the stroke.

Appellant objects to certain findings as contradictory. Any inconsistency is unimportant. An examination of the findings discloses without conflict that decedent died as a result of natural causes.

The judgment is affirmed.

Appeal from Superior Court, Nevada County; George L. Jones, Judge.

Action by M. Markall, doing business as Markall Machinery Company, against M. R. Peterson to recover possession of Diesel engine and generator or the value thereof, wherein the defendant filed a cross-complaint. From an adverse judgment, the defendant appeals.

Affirmed.

Charles L. Gilmore, of Sacramento, for appellant.

H. Ward Sheldon, Nevada City, and John W. Dinkelspiel, of San Francisco, for respondent.

ADAMS, Presiding Justice.

Plaintiff brought this action for the recovery of the possession of a Diesel engine and generator or for the value thereof alleged to be $2,500. Defendant answered and filed a cross-complaint, alleging fraud on the part of plaintiff and praying for damages in the sum of $11,000. After trial by the court sitting without a jury, findings in favor of plaintiff were made and judgment for the amount of his demand, plus attorney's fees and costs, followed. The evidence which amply sustains the findings of the trial court shows that on November 28, 1939, plaintiff agreed to sell and defendant agreed to buy a Fairbanks-Morse Diesel engine, generator and excitor, at an agreed price of $2,500. On that date defendant paid down $500 and received therefor a receipt which recited that the seller had received $500, that when completed balance of $2,000 was to be paid $750 in cash and $1,250 on contract of 12 months from date of delivery, "Engine and Generator to be working order upon acceptance by M. R. Peterson." On December 16, 1939, defendant paid plaintiff the additional sum of $750 and on said date the parties executed a formal written conditional sale contract which provided that the balance of the purchase price ($1,250) should be paid in twelve equal monthly installments, that the equipment therein described was "used", that it was to be installed at the Giant King Mine in Nevada County. It also provided:

"The undersigned hereby acknowledges and accepts delivery at * * * the property listed in the within contract pursuant to its terms."

"The purchaser acknowledges that said property covered by this contract is in good order and condition when delivered and accepts the same without warranty of mechanical or other condition."

"It is expressly agreed that any claim for defects or defective parts shall be no defense for non-payment of any sums due under this contract, but that all such sums shall become due and payable in accordance with this agreement and shall be immediately paid when due."

"It is understood that the seller or his assignee shall not be bound by any agreement or representation not contained in this agreement, which purchaser hereby admits he has read and understands."

Said equipment was delivered at said mine on December 16th, at which time it had not been tested, but delivery was made at the instance of defendant and against the advice of plaintiff. Upon its installation it was discovered that it was not in working order and plaintiff thereupon arranged to have same repaired, and for the purposes of such repair defendant delivered said equipment at the Fairbanks-Morse plant in San Francisco on January 15, 1940. There extensive repairs were made and the machine placed in good working condition at a total cost of $1,182.02, which sum was paid by plaintiff. On February 12th defendant accepted said equipment at San Francisco and returned the same to the mine, but he made no effort to use it and he did not pay any of the installments provided to be paid. The contract provided that title to the property should remain in the seller until all payments were made, and that should purchaser fail to make any of said payments the seller might take immediate possession of the property and declare the purchaser in default, in which event all of the rights and equities of the purchaser in and to said property should immediately cease. About March 9, 1940, plaintiff wrote defendant demanding that he pay the balance of the purchase price for the equipment; and shortly thereafter he went to the mine where he again demanded payment or that he be permitted to take the property, but defendant failed and refused to do either. On May 16th, while said equipment was still in the possession of defendant, same was destroyed by fire. The court found that "the reasonable market value of the said equipment at the time of said sale, and prior to its destruction by fire, was $2,500.00."

Appellant makes no complaint that the evidence does not support the findings, but he does contend that at most the limit of his liability was the balance ($1,250) due on the original purchase price of the equipment, and that the court erred in awarding plaintiff $2,500 as the value thereof; that the court failed to make a finding as to the time of the value of the equipment and that, therefore, the judgment is without support; that in the contract of November 28th plaintiff warranted the engine and generator to be in working order upon its acceptance, that on December 16th, when the second contract was signed, plaintiff told appellant the unit was complete and in working order, that defendant relied upon this representation, but that the equipment was not in such condition, and, therefore, said contract was induced by the deceit and misrepresentation of plaintiff; also that as the equipment was to be put in working order before acceptance, by appellant, and, accordingly, he was not in default in his payments.

In support of his first point appellant cites section 3302 of the Civil Code which provides that: "The detriment caused by the breach of an obligation to pay money only, is deemed to be the amount due by the terms of the obligation, with interest thereon." Respondent replies by saying that this is not an action for damages nor a suit for the balance of the purchase price; that upon appellant's breach of the conditional sale agreement respondent could and did elect to declare appellant's interest in the equipment forfeited under the terms of the agreement; and that the fact that appellant could initially have obtained title by paying only the $1,250 due upon the contract is consequently beside the point.

[1-3] Respondent's contention appears to be sound. The evidence shows that prior to instituting this action plaintiff demanded payment of the balance due or delivery of the equipment, both of which defendant refused. By the terms of the conditional sale contract of December 16th appellant agreed that in case of his default plaintiff might retake the property, whereupon all of appellant's rights therein would cease. Plaintiff so elected and appellant's rights did cease, and on appellant's refusal to permit plaintiff to take possession this action in claim and delivery was a proper remedy for plaintiff to pursue to obtain such possession; and when, by virtue of the destruction of the property, its delivery became impossible, plaintiff was entitled to recover the value thereof. Los Angeles Furniture Co. v. Hansen, 46 Cal.App. 5, 188 P. 292; Meister & Sons Co. v. Harrison, 56 Cal.App. 679, 206 P. 106; McConnell v. Redd, 86 Cal.App. 785, 789, 261 P. 506. After the institution of this action defendant bonded against delivery, and, as was said in Drinkhouse v. Van Ness, 202 Cal. 359, 376, 260 P. 869, 875, "The decided weight of authority appears to be to the effect that neither a plaintiff in replevin who has given a bond and taken property, nor a defendant who, by giving bond, has retained or repossessed himself of the property, is relieved of liability therefor under his bond by its loss or destruction while in his possession pending the action."

We find no merit in appellant's contention that the judgment is without support by reason of the insufficiency of the court's finding as to the time when the property was of the value of $2,500.

Appellant cites Nelson v. Yonge, 73 Cal. App. 704, 710, 239 P. 67, 69, wherein it is said that in some jurisdictions, including California, where delivery cannot be had, the value should be that which the property had at the time of the trial. But the court there also said: "These decisions proceed upon the theory that, the money being but a substitute for the property, the amount of the alternative money judgment should be fixed by ascertaining it as of the date nearest to the time when the property would be delivered." Here it could no longer be delivered, and it had no value at the time of the trial.

[4] In Drinkhouse v. Van Ness, supra, the value at the time of the wrongful detention of a horse was said to constitute the proper measure where the horse had died before the trial; but we find in neither that case nor in Nelson v. Yonge any statement that if the exact date of the valuation was not found the judgment would not be sustained. Here the demand was made on March 9, 1940. At the trial plaintiff was asked what was the reasonable value of this equipment at the time he demanded redelivery of it, and he answered: "It was still worth the twenty-five hundred dollars that I sold it to him for." No other witness testified to its value and it is apparent that if a finding of its value "at the time of its wrongful detention" had been made, no different value would have been found. The suit was filed April 5 and the property was destroyed May 16, 1940. There is no evidence that the value of the property fluctuated or that it had any other value than $2,500; and the court's finding that its value at the time of the sale and prior to its destruction by fire was $2,500 was sufficiently comprehensive to include its value at the time of the wrongful detention.

[5] We also find no merit in appellant's argument that the contract signed December 16th was induced by fraud and deceit on the part of plaintiff. The court found that it was not true that at the time of the execution of said contract of December 16, 1939, or at any other time, plaintiff informed defendant that he had the said engine and generator in "A-1" condition; that it was not true that plaintiff had warranted the condition of said equipment and that it was not true that plaintiff failed to deliver to defendant any part of the equipment provided to be sold by the contract of December 16th; and that all of the allegations of defendant's cross-complaint inconsistent therewith were untrue. While it does appear that the original receipt signed by plaintiff on November 28, 1939, provided that the engine and generator were to be in working order upon acceptance by appellant, the evidence fully sustains the finding of the trial court that when delivery was taken by appellant in December 1939, the equipment had not been tested and that delivery was made at the insistence of defendant and against the advice of plaintiff. The latter testified to this effect and stated that appellant insisted upon taking the engine to the mine at that time as he was afraid that later delivery might become impossible because of snow. Plaintiff's employee, Mr. Hill, who had assembled the engine and generator, corroborated plaintiff's testimony, stating that he, too, had objected to appellant's taking the equipment to the mine until they had had time to test it; and that appellant was not told that it was ready for delivery. It was at that time that appellant signed the contract of December 16th in which he accepted delivery "without warranty of mechanical or other condition," agreed that any claim for defect should be no defense for nonpayment of sums to become due, and that the seller should not be bound by any agreement or representation not contained in that written agreement.

We find no evidence of any fraudulent acts on the part of plaintiff. When, after its original delivery at the mine, the engine failed to work, plaintiff expended large sums for repairs; and when the equipment was again returned to defendant in February, 1940, it was, according to the testimony of the repairmen from the Fairbanks-Morse Company where the repairs were made, then completed and ready to run. Appellant admits that after this he made no effort to start the machinery or to operate it and that he made no request for help to get it started, and that in spite of these facts he refused to permit plaintiff to retake possession and likewise refused his demand for payment of the balance due

[6] While appellant in his briefs refers to testimony in conflict with the findings of the trial court, it is not within our province to consider same. There being evidence to sustain the findings and judgment, said judgment is affirmed.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Joseph W. Vickers, Judge.

Proceeding by Mutual Building & Loan Association of Pasadena against Helen V. Wiborg and another for the appointment of a substitute trustee under a deed of trust. From a judgment of dismissal, the petitioner appeals.

Affirmed.

Hahn & Hahn, of Pasadena, for appellant.

O'Melveny & Myers, Louis W. Myers, and Pierce Works, all of Los Angeles, for respondents.

MOORE, Presiding Justice.

The question for determination is whether the superior court has jurisdiction to appoint a substitute trustee under a deed of trust which reserves a joint power in the trustor and the cestui que trust to make a substitution, where they have not agreed upon a substitution after the corporate trustee has merged with a kindred corporation which inherited all the assets, powers and trusts of the designated trustee.

Title Guarantee & Trust Co., hereafter referred to as Title Guarantee, was named as trustee in a deed of trust by respondent Wiborg, which instrument was given to secure payment of a promissory note payable to appellant. In its petition to the superior court under sections 2287 and 2289, Civil Code, appellant recited the present circumstances of the indebtedness and that on December 19, 1942, pursuant to section 31b of the Bank Act, Gen.Laws 1937, Act 652, as well as under the provisions of section 361 of the Civil Code, Title Guarantee became and is now merged in respondent Title Insurance & Trust Company hereinafter designated Title Insurance; that the separate, corporate existence of Title Guarantee then and there ceased; that it surrendered its license to do a bank or trust business or any other business, that Title Insurance claims that by operation of law as a result of the merger, it became the trustee. The petition recited further that pursuant to the provision of paragraph B–7 of the deed of trust it had demanded respondent Wiborg to join with petitioner in the nomination and appointment of a substitute trustee in the place of the Title Guarantee; that she had refused to do so; that by reason of the foregoing facts, there is a vacancy as to the trusteeship under the deed of trust; that the deed of trust does not provide a practical method of appointment of a substitute trustee; that by reason of a merger of Title Guarantee with respondent Title Insurance, by operation of law, Title Insurance became and now is the trustee under the deed of trust.

The respondents demurred to the petition on the ground that the court has no jurisdiction or power to grant the relief prayed. Following an order sustaining the demurrer, petitioner having declined to amend, a judgment of dismissal followed.

The deed of trust contains the following provision:

"B. It is mutually agreed that:

"7. Trustor, or if said property shall have been transferred, the then record owner, together with Beneficiary, may from time to time, by instrument in writing, substitute a successor or successors to any Trustee named herein or acting hereunder, which instrument, executed and acknowledged by each and recorded in the office of the recorder of the county or counties where said property is situated, shall be conclusive proof of proper substitution of such successor Trustee. * * * The procedure herein provided for substitution of Trustees shall be exclusive of all other provisions for substitution, statutory or otherwise."

[1] Appellant insists that by virtue of the quoted paragraph that Title Insurance is not substituted as trustee; that despite section 31b of the Bank Act the court has the power, under sections 2287, 2289 of the Civil Code to act solely upon the request of the beneficiary under the deed of trust and substitute a new trustee under the doctrine that one who creates a trust may provide a method for filling vacancies and for the appointment of substitute trustees. 26 Ruling Case Law 1278; 65 C.J. 575. It then proceeds to attempt to show that paragraph B–7 is the exclusive procedure for effecting the appointment of a substitute trustee. Since the deed of trust provides that a substitute trustee may be named by the trustor "together with beneficiary" by a writing recorded in the office of the County Recorder, it follows that if the trustor declines to join with the beneficiary, in making a substitution there is no method by which to effect a substitution upon the petition of the beneficiary alone or otherwise.

There is no vacancy of the trusteeship. By virtue of the merger, the separate corporate existence of Title Guarantee suffered the fate of all merged corporations, to wit, they become a part of the muscle and the blood stream of the mergee corporation, transfusing into the mergee all its rights and privileges. By such act all rights and interests in and to all property are without further action or deed vested in the mergee which shall hold, enjoy and enforce the same in its own right "as fully as the same was possessed, enjoyed and held" by the substituted trustee. The mergee corporation, by operation of law and without further transfer, shall "in all courts and places be deemed and held to have, and shall become subrogated and shall succeed, to all such rights * * * agreements, court and private trusts * * * and shall execute and perform all such * * * trusts in the same manner as though it had itself originally assumed the relation of trust or incurred the obligation or liability * * *." Subd. 5, section 31b of the Bank Act.

[2, 3] By virtue of such provision, there was an automatic succession of the trusteeship to Title Insurance. All rights of Title Guarantee in the property held in trust passed without interruption to Title Insurance. Language could not be more emphatic than that used by the legislature in continuing the trusteeship of a trustee in the event of a merger of the named corporate trustee with another corporation. In re Estate of Barreiro, 125 Cal.App. 153, 167, 13 P.2d 1017; In re Estate of Barnett, 97 Cal.App. 138, 275 P. 453; Mercantile Trust Co. v. San Joaquin Agricultural Corp., 89 Cal.App. 558, 265 P. 583. It follows that there could have been no vacancy merely because of the consolidation. And without a vacancy, there would be no power in the court to appoint a substitute trustee.

Although the distinct corporate entity of Title Guarantee passed out of existence or became extinct upon the completion of the act of consolidation, its corporate activities did not cease but were continued and carried on through the new channel. Mercantile Trust Co. v. San Joaquin Agricultural Corp., supra. While the Title Guarantee merger with Title Insurance caused it to lose its identity as to its separate existence, yet it became an integral part of Title Insurance, and carried with it all of its rights, powers, liabilities, and assets "except the indicia and attributes of a corporate body, distinct from that into which it is merged." McElwain Co. v. Primavera, 180 App.Div. 288, 167 N.Y.S. 815, 819. The consolidation did not create an entirely new entity but "merely directs the blood of the old corporation into the veins of the new, the old living in the new." In re Estate of Barreiro, supra [125 Cal.App. 153, 13 P.2d 1026].

Neither the reserved power of appointment by the parties nor appellant's wish to have the court exercise its power of appointment created a vacancy. Nothing could have created a vacancy except the resignation or removal of the trustee in the absence of an agreement on the part of the trustor and the beneficiary to agree upon a substitution. Upon their failure so to agree the present trustee remains in office and the superior court has no jurisdiction under Sections 2287 and 2289, Civil Code, to make a substitution.

While paragraph B–7 makes its own procedure for substitution exclusive of all others, such is not available in the absence of a concord of the cestui que trust and the trustor. The necessity of their joinder in order to make a substitution renders inapplicable section 2934a. That section authorizes a substitution by the beneficiaries only. But where by automatic succession resulting from a merger, the designated trustee is absorbed by the corporate mergee, there is no power in the court to divest the successor-trustee of its office and asset at the caprice of the cestui que trust. There is nothing in the deed of trust that would imply a desire on the part of the beneficiary and the trustor either to declare a vacancy in event of a merger or to supplant the mergee following the consolidation. An intention to do so would have been declared as emphatically as was the reservation in the deed of trust of the joint power to substitute. This was not done. However, a power was reserved and it is not inconsistent with the scheme provided by Sec. 31a of the Bank Act, Statutes 1913, page 152, Deering's General Laws of 1937, Act 652. Such power remains unimpaired for the parties to appoint a substitute trustee after the merger of the Title Guarantee with the Title Insurance. Mercantile Trust Co. v. San Joaquin Agricultural Corp., supra. The provision of Section 31a making the succession to the trusteeship automatic distinctly denies to the superior court the power to make an appointment until the dissolution or merger of the Title Insurance or until its resignation or removal. Before or after such occurrence a substitution can be made only by the joint act of the cestui que trust and the trustor.

[4, 5] Moreover, appellant knew at all times the meaning of laws governing corporations, of their rights of dissolving and of merging. Such law entered into the contract between Mrs. Wiborg and appellant. By their contract they both by implication assented to the right of Title Guarantee to consolidate. Also, because they reserved power to substitute a trustee, they knew they did not thereby authorize the appointment of a new trustee in the event of the merger of their trustee with another corporation. Mercantile Trust Co. v. San Joaquin Agricultural Corp., supra.

Appellant argues that the trustor in making the trust adopted "the full scheme for substitution of trustees prescribed in that act" (citing In re Estate of Barnett, 97 Cal.App. 138, 275 P. 453); that upon a consolidation a substitution could not occur "until such time as a trustee is substituted by the exclusive method provided in the deed of trust." But we have shown above that the superior court may not dislodge such substitute trustee and appoint another. Should there be no removal or resignation of Title Insurance or a substitution by the joint act of appellant and Mrs. Wiborg, the court is powerless to act and the exclusive procedure of B–7 of the deed of trust is unavailing.

The judgment is affirmed.

Appeal from Superior Court, Sacramento County; Raymond T. Coughlin, Judge.

Action by Takako Inai and Suzanne Inai and Kazuo Inai, by their guardian ad litem, Takako Inai, against Charles Ede and others and Takeo Takeuchi for personal injuries sustained by the plaintiffs. From a judgment for plaintiffs against the defendant Takeo Takeuchi alone, the defendant Takeo Takeuchi alone appeals.

Charles V. Barfield and John J. Healy, Jr., both of San Francisco, for appellant.

Johnson & Curtright, of Sacramento, for defendants Ede.

Robt. H. Schwab, of Sacramento, for respondent.

PEEK, Justice.

This is an appeal by defendant Takeuchi from a judgment against him alone. By its verdict the jury awarded damages to the plaintiffs for personal injuries suffered as the result of a collision between a car operated by the defendant Ede and the parked car of appellant.

On March 20, 1938, respondents, together with their families and several friends, journeyed to the high Sierras for a day in the snow. They parked their cars on Highway No. 40 approximately two or three miles south of the town of Emigrant Gap. The highway at that point runs in a general northerly and southerly direction. On this particular day the only available space for parking was a strip along the easterly side of the highway. A snow bank several feet in height and extending to the edge of the paved portion made it impossible to park on the west side. The appellant, looking for a space to park his car, but finding none, drove past this area to a point where he was compelled to turn back because of orders not to proceed further without chains. While driving slowly back along the line of parked cars he observed a space on his left which he stated was probably the length of a car and one-half, and sufficient for him to park his car. He headed his car into the bank leaving the rear extending onto the paved portion of the highway and made no effort to maneuver it into a line parallel with the other cars parked along the highway. The briefs of both parties infer that the right hand door of the car was left open, the width of which, as stated in appellant's brief, was 49 inches. The distance which the rear of his car extended onto the paved portion was placed by witnesses from three to four or more feet. Some witnesses placed it parallel to the road and others at an angle so that the rear extended farther onto the pavement than did the front. The highway at that particular point was 20 feet in width with the easterly shoulder extending approximately four feet from the edge of the pavement to a snow bank, and sloping southerly on a five per cent down grade. The highway at the time was slushy.

Shortly after appellant parked, two of the respondents who were walking north and two who were walking south met at a point approximately opposite the open right door of appellant's car. While so stopped, the respondent, Suzanne's mother, bent over to fix one of Suzanne's galoshes. At this moment defendant Ede's car, which had gone out of control when the driver endeavored to avoid hitting a small boy who had darted across the highway, skidded a distance of approximately 90 feet, striking the right rear fender and door of appellant's car, which in turn struck the respondents and caused the injuries as alleged in their complaint.

Appellant contends that his car could at most be considered only as a remote condition and not the proximate cause of the accident; that even under these circumstances a violation of the parking law could not be actionable negligence in that respondents had voluntarily assumed positions next to the car, with the inference that by so doing they were not pedestrians. Further error is assigned in the giving and refusing to give certain instructions.

[1] The appellant argues that the efficient and proximate cause of the accident was the skidding of the Ede car. It is quite true that had not the Ede car gone out of control it probably would not have struck appellant's car. Nevertheless, as in the case of Pastene v. Adams, 49 Cal. 87, the negligent piling of the lumber in the street did not cause the truck to be driven against it, thereby toppling over and injuring the plaintiff, but the court in that instance held that piling lumber in such a fashion was concurring negligence in that it concurred with the negligence of the driver of the truck; and the judgment against the defendant was sustained. This court cannot say that the situation here presented is at all different than that in the Pastene case. In the present case the alleged negligent parking by appellant was a question of fact and was found by the jury to be a continuing negligence and a violation of the Motor Vehicle Code, St. 1935, p. 93, and therefore was a concurring negligence with that of the defendant Ede.

In substantiation of his contention appellant cites the case of Klarquist v. Chamberlain & Proctor, 124 Cal.App. 398, 12 P. 2d 664, stating that there the defendant contractor obstructed the sidewalk; but he fails to mention that such obstruction was lawful. As the late Presiding Justice Pullen said in regard to the Klarquist case, when the instant case (Inai v. Ede, 42 Cal. App.2d 521, 526, 109 P.2d 400, 403) was before this court on appeal from an order sustaining defendant Takeuchi's demurrer without leave to amend: "There a contractor was lawfully building a sidewalk, and because of barriers around the work plaintiff was compelled to walk into the street, where he was struck by a negligently operated car. There the contractor was constructing a necessary public work, under the authority of a municipality —and the contractor was therefore not bound to have anticipated the reckless act of a third person. There plaintiffs attempted to invoke the rule applicable to concurrent and negligent causes of injury, under which, liability of the defendant contractor would arise from the fact it should have anticipated the negligence of the driver in leaving his regular course, but the court said '* * * their argument fails to convince us that liability of one legally constructing a necessary public way, under the authority of a municipality, who cannot be said to have anticipated the reckless act of a third party, should be predicated upon or measured by the same rules'. If, however, after completing its work of laying the sidewalk, the contracting company had then negligently placed a pile of gravel in the street alongside the sidewalk and had negligently permitted it to remain there unguarded, and a truck had, by reason thereof, been thrown from its course and struck a pedestrian, undoubtedly the company would have been liable, or at least put upon its defense."

It is obvious that the Klarquist case is not in point.

Fennessey v. Pacific G. & E. Co., 20 Cal. 2d 141, 124 P.2d 51, 54, is a case very similar to the one before us wherein the defendant, in violation of a statute parked a truck between the safety zone and curb, leaving insufficient space for traffic to pass between. Plaintiff was hit by a bus when she was standing in the pedestrian lane. On appeal it was contended that the bus driver broke the chain of causation but the court affirmed judgment for plaintiff, stating: "Whether the parking of appellants' repair truck between the safety zone and the curb had anything to do with the swerve or turn of the jitney bus on to the first or second street car tracks, as the result of which the accident occurred, or whether the jitney driver could have averted such accident, notwithstanding that he violated the ordinance prohibiting driving to the left of a safety zone, were purely questions of fact to be determined by the jury. If the jury believed the evidence in support of respondents' theory that the parking of appellant company's car was a proximate cause of the accident, we are unable to interfere. * * * 'where the original negligence continues and exists up to the time of the injury, the concurrent negligent act of a third person causing the injury will not be regarded as an independent act of negligence, but the two concurring acts of negligence will be held to be the proximate cause of the injury.'" of fact for the jury. This same question was directly in issue in the case of Scalf v. Eicher, 11 Cal.App.2d 44, 54, 53 P.2d 368, 373, wherein the court said: "The violation of a statute or ordinance which proximately contributes to the injuries is presumptively an act of negligence unless the act or omission was justifiable or excusable under the circumstances. * * * Whether or not a violation of a statute or ordinance proximately contributed to an accident and whether the violation was excusable or justifiable are questions of fact except in a case where 'the court is impelled to say that from the facts reasonable men can draw but one inference, and that an inference pointing unerringly to the negligence of the plaintiff contributing to his injury.'"

As stated in the Scalf case, supra, the question of causation is one of fact depending upon the circumstances of each particular case and is ordinarily for the jury to determine. Whether such fact exists is often difficult to determine, but where reasonable men can differ as to its existence or non-existence it is a question for the jury to determine under appropriate instructions. This the jury has done. Under the circumstances as herein presented we cannot say as a matter of law that the present case comes within the exception previously noted.

[5] Appellant's final complaint is directed at certain instructions which were given and certain others which were not given. Where, as in this case, innumerable instructions were proposed by all of the parties it is an ever present possibility that some particular instruction will fail to contain either a complete or accurate statement of the law. It is but one of the many difficulties where several parties are involved in the same trial. It therefore becomes increasingly necessary to examine the entire charge in the light of fair and reasonable construction, without straining at any particular portion of the language. Then if in the light of such scrutiny it may be reasonably said that the particular inaccuracy or omission or phraseology appears to have been cured by the entire charge and that the jury was fairly and impartially instructed as to the law, it is sufficient to defeat any claim of error predicated upon defects in particular instructions. Henderson v. Los Angeles Traction Co., 150 Cal. 689, 89 P. 976.

[7-9] The first two instructions complained of relate to the question of proximate cause and the concurring negligence of both defendants. If said instructions had been the only ones proposed on those questions yet were rejected, then appellant's complaint would have merit. However, an examination of the record discloses others were proposed and were given on the same subject which, read as a whole, fairly state that principle of law in general. The third question raised by appellant relates to an instruction proposed by the defendant Ede and given by the court. In substance it pertained to a section of the Motor Vehicle Code not at issue and concerning which there is no apparent mention in the record. Assuming such instruction to have been error, yet in the light of the abundant evidence which was produced it is difficult to see how appellant was prejudiced thereby, and at most it could be considered as harmless error. Appellant's further complaint is directed at an instruction requested by him pertaining to the question of passion and prejudice, which was rejected by the trial court. It would seem reasonable that such complaint would only be valid if the award of the jury had been grossly excessive and so clearly the result of prejudice or passion as to be manifestly unfair and unjust. Yet nowhere in appellant's brief is such point raised. Appellant's only support of this contention is contained in his brief wherein he states: "The case, involving as it did, rather serious injuries to a little girl * * * the jury, unless specifically instructed and admonished by the trial court, might well permit their natural sympathies to influence them." But no showing is made that the jurors' sympathies were aroused and as a result they were influenced thereby. If appellant's statement be valid then it might as well be argued by plaintiffs that because she was Japanese the judgment was grossly inadequate. It is not necessary to speculate in this regard for the record discloses that satisfactory and sufficiently explanatory instructions on the question of damages were given by the court. Under all of the evidence the damages would appear to be reasonable.

Appellant's final complaint as regards the instructions is but a reargument of his theory of the case. He again cites the case of Klarquist v. Chamberlain & Proctor, supra.

Respondents reply that the answer to appellant's contention is again to be found in the previous decision in this case (Inai v. Ede, supra) wherein this court, in emphasizing the distinguishing features of the two cases, stated: "An obstruction lawfully placed upon a highway is subject to an entirely different rule than an unlawful obstruction, as we have here."

The judgment is affirmed.

Where it was understood between owner of land on which gravel pit was partially located and contractor that contractor might continue to remove rock, sand and gravel from the land, paying reasonable value thereof and of rock, sand and gravel previously moved, evidence of such understanding was admissible as defeating owner's right to hold contractor as a converter.

5. Money received 🔑19(4)

Where contractor, after removing rock, sand and gravel from pit located partially on plaintiff's land, had sold, not merely the rock, sand and gravel so removed, but so-called concrete yards, which included cement, weighing proportion and delivery, plaintiff was entitled to recover, not the full price received by defendant, but only the reasonable value of the rock, sand and gravel in place.

6. Evidence 🔑317(6)

In action by owner of land on which gravel pit was partially located, against contractor for conversion of rock, sand and gravel removed from the land, where there was no proof that contractor's acts were malicious, testimony of contractor's former driver that driver had been told by one of contractor's foremen that contractor had sold the material for a higher price than the price testified to by contractor's superintendent was properly excluded as "hearsay".

See Words and Phrases, Permanent Edition, for all other definitions of "Hearsay".

7. Interest 🔑19(1)

Where it was shown that defendant's removal of rock, sand and gravel from pit located partially on plaintiff's land was not a conversion, and amount due plaintiff from defendant was unliquidated until time of judgment, trial court properly refused to allow interest prior to entry of judgment. Civ.Code, § 3336.

8. Interest 🔑19(1)

An unliquidated claim does not bear interest.

Appeal from Superior Court, Mono County; Pat R. Parker, Judge.

Action by Benjamin F. Farrington against A. Teichert & Son, Inc., and others to recover for the alleged conversion of rock, sand and gravel removed from plaintiff's land. From a judgment against the named defendant in an unsatisfactory amount, plaintiff appeals.

KNIGHT, Justice.

Plaintiff brought this action against the defendant A. Teichert & Son, Inc., the City of Los Angeles, and the Department of Water and Power of said city, to recover damages for the alleged conversion of rock, sand and gravel removed from plaintiff's land. The city did not appear; and the demurrer of the Department of Water and Power was sustained without leave to amend; thereupon judgment was entered in its favor. The action against the defendant A. Teichert & Son, Inc., was tried before the court sitting without a jury, and the court held that the taking of the material was not tortious, but was with plaintiff's consent, acquiescence, ratification, approval and confirmation; and that accordingly plaintiff was entitled upon a quantum meruit to receive the reasonable market value of the rock, sand and gravel removed, which the court found to be 3½ cents a cubic yard for 39,701 cubic yards, and gave judgment for $1,389.54. Plaintiff appeals from the judgment so rendered. The measure of damages in actions for tort such as conversion or trespass is greater than the measure of damages allowed upon a quantum meruit arising out of a contractual relationship, express or implied, and the principal question involved on this appeal is whether the trial court's conclusion that there was no conversion is supported by the evidence.

The essential facts stated in chronological sequence are these: In March, 1940, respondent, a contracting firm, was negotiating with the city of Los Angeles for a contract to construct a conduit from Leevining Creek to Grant Lake Reservoir in Mono county, and in this connection the superintendent of the firm visited the site of the proposed construction and discussed the same with the city's engineers. In the course of this examination, since rock, sand and gravel were required in the proposed construction, respondent and the city's engineers examined the gravel pits from which the city's specifications proposed that such rock, sand and gravel should be obtained. The City owned a great deal of the land in and around that locality; the gravel pits were shown on a blueprint attached to the contract specifications; and at the time of the inspection the city's resident engineer verified the pits being inspected as the ones shown upon the blueprint, and advised respondent that all of the land belonged to the city and that all of the gravel therefrom was free. Subsequently respondent was awarded a contract for the construction. Preliminary work was started in May, principally by the construction of respondent's plants for screening and processing rock, sand and gravel. All of these structures and a substantial portion of respondent's gravel pit were in fact on the city's land. In June there was a small operation from the gravel pit, and in July operations therefrom commenced in quantity. But in June, before respondent had started any substantial production from the gravel pit, appellant observed the location of the pit and plants, and thought the pit might be on his property. He continued to visit the site of the pit some seven or eight times, examining the pit, checking locations and noting respondent's operations and removal of rock, sand and gravel, but did not during that time indicate to respondent that the gravel pit might be partially upon his land. On September 11th he notified the city of Los Angeles that the respondent was on his land; but the first conversation of any sort between appellant and respondent occurred on September 16, 1940, at which time appellant called at respondent's office and told the superintendent that he considered that a portion of the gravel pit was on his land. There was some discussion on the point, during which they scaled a map produced by appellant in an effort to locate boundary lines. The whole area involved is uncultivated and without fences or other improvements. The property here involved is a part of a "sagebrush plateau" without fences or anything to indicate where the line was, and this was the first indication to respondent that they were on anything but property belonging to the city of Los Angeles. The superintendent testified that he told appellant that if there were any question that respondent was on his land, they would have the lines surveyed, and if the gravel pit were on appellant's property they would remove therefrom; that appellant said no, that he would rather sell the gravel, or get something out of it, so they discussed the "going" price on similar material. Appellant testified that he went into respondent's office for the purpose of making a settlement on the gravel that was removed, and after going over the map and discussing price, appellant requested a meeting with Mr. Teichert, so that they could arrive at a settlement. At no time, however, throughout the course of this conversation did appellant direct or even suggest that respondent cease excavating from the gravel pit in question; and appellant conceded that it was satisfactory with him and that he understood that to the extent that any material should be removed from his land respondent should pay him the reasonable value. Subsequently several meetings were held in an effort to agree upon a reasonable price for the material. Appellant, the superintendent and Teichert were present, and the price of the material was discussed, but at none of these discussions was there anything said about respondent removing from appellant's land. Quite to the contrary the evidence shows that appellant was satisfied with the arrangement and that his understanding was that he should receive the reasonable value for the material. In this connection the evidence shows that appellant thought $6,000 was a reasonable price, and respondent offered $2,000; thereupon at Teichert's suggestion a letter was drafted making a demand for $6,000, and Teichert stated he would try to get $3,000 for appellant from the city of Los Angeles. However, appellant finally decided he should consult an attorney before he signed the demand—this was on October 15, 1940; and on November 4, 1940, he filed his complaint herein for conversion, alleging that 150,000 yards of rock, sand and gravel had been unlawfully converted, which he alleged was of the value of $75,000, for which amount he asked judgment, together with $25,000 exemplary damages.

Mainly from these facts the trial court found that it was not true that respondent had unlawfully converted the rock, sand and gravel; that it was not true that respondent removed the rock, sand and gravel without right, title or license; that the removal of the rock, sand and gravel was ratified, approved, confirmed and consented to, and acquiesced in by appellant; that appellant is estopped from claiming that respondent converted the rock, sand and gravel, or any part thereof, and has, by his conduct, ratification, approval, confirmation, acquiescence and consent become entitled to and agreed to receive therefor the reasonable market value of said rock, sand and gravel in place on his said lands; and that he represented to respondent that the removal of said rock, sand and gravel was agreeable and satisfactory to him.

[1, 2] It is apparent that the facts above narrated fully sustain the trial court's findings. Summarized they may be stated as follows: Appellant admits that he first saw respondent's operations in June, before they had begun in any quantity, and again seven or eight times prior to September, and that during this time he watched the operations and checked his title, but that notwithstanding this fact he did not discuss the situation with respondent or call it to respondent's attention until September 16, 1940. When he did actually discuss the matter with respondent and advised respondent that he considered respondent was upon his land, he did not ask respondent to desist or get off the land, but on the contrary expressly stated that he had no such desire, and that it was satisfactory to him that respondent remain, and that he desired respondent to continue to take rock, sand and gravel at a reasonable price, since he desired to "sell it and get something out of it." At the meeting of September 16, 1940, and at all subsequent meetings, respondent indicated that the values it had in mind were substantially those finally found by the trial court; yet appellant was content that respondent should continue operations. At none of the conversations between appellant and respondent throughout the entire time that respondent was upon appellant's land did appellant ever indicate that he was dissatisfied with receiving the reasonable value of the material being taken, or ever request respondent to desist. On the contrary, he encouraged respondent to take material upon the understanding that it was satisfactory to him, and that such would be compensated for upon the basis of its reasonable value. At no time did appellant ever do anything to avoid the consequences or minimize respondent's taking; instead he encouraged and abetted that taking. Thus it would seem that not only was there implied consent and acquiescence to respondent's acts but express ratification and approval thereof; and the law is well settled that there can be no conversion where an owner either expressly or impliedly assents to or ratifies the taking, use or disposition of his property. 24 Cal.Jur. p. 1024; 65 Cor.Jur. p. 14, § 5. Therefore there is no merit in appellant's contention that the trial court applied an improper measure in fixing the reasonable value of the material taken. The measure appellant contends should have been adopted is the one governing in cases of tortious conversion; but the trial court found and the evidence shows there was no tortious conversion. In fact appellant does not deny that the measure applied by the trial court was proper for quantum meruit; and this is such a case.

[3, 4] Appellant treats the September negotiations as an offer of compromise which failed by reason of the fact that a reasonable value was not agreed on. He cites Boyes v. Evans, 14 Cal.App.2d 472, at page 479, 58 P.2d 922, at page 926, where the court says: "It is a well-established rule of law that it is not permissible to show that a party to litigation has offered to compromise the cause. The rule not only excludes the offer to compromise, but also all negotiations with relation thereto. 22 C.J. 308, sec. 347." But such rule has no application here, for since the evidence shows that it was understood between appellant and respondent that respondent might continue to remove material, paying the reasonable value thereof and of that previously removed, notwithstanding they had been unable to reach an agreement as to such value, appellant could not hold respondent for a measure of damages based on conversion when it became necessary to sue to fix the reasonable value. Evidence of such understanding would clearly be admissible as defeating the right of appellant to hold respondent as a converter. That it was understood that respondent should continue to remove material is admitted by plaintiff in his concession that he cannot claim on a tort basis for material removed after the September conferences.

[5, 6] Respondent's superintendent testified that 2,400 "concrete yards" were sold by respondent to the Macco Company for $2 a yard, and that about a third of the rock, sand and gravel which went into this batch came from appellant's land. Appellant contends, therefore, that the trial court should have given appellant judgment for these 800 yards at the rate of $2 a yard, or for an additional $1,600, stating that "The selling price of an article is recoverable in an action for conversion, since no man can profit by his own wrong." The evidence further shows, however, that the 2,400 yards so sold was not just rock, sand and gravel, but was "concrete yards * * * with the cement, weighing proportion and everything," including delivery, so that "the only thing that would be necessary to have to add is water to make it concrete." Obviously, therefore, appellant was not entitled to recover the full price received by respondent, but only the value of the quantity of rock, sand and gravel taken from his land; and since there was no conversion, all he was entitled to recover therefor was the reasonable value of the rock, sand and gravel in place, which the court found to be 3½ cents a yard, and he was given judgment for the quantity so taken at that price. In this connection appellant further argues that the trial court erred in excluding the proffered testimony of one Munger, who worked for respondent as a driver for two months, to the effect that he was told by one of respondent's foremen that the respondent had sold said sand, rock and gravel to the Macco Company for $2.50 a yard, which appellant contends would have shown a higher price than that testified to by respondent's superintendent, and would have shown that all the sand, rock and gravel sold to said company came from the land of the appellant. The conversation was properly excluded on the ground that it was hearsay insofar as respondent was concerned; that it had not been shown to be in the course of duty; and that it was incompetent, and without foundation, upon the question of damages, for the reason that since there was a total failure of any proof that respondent's acts were malicious in fact, such testimony, even if otherwise competent, was totally irrelevant and inadmissible upon any proper theory of damages, either for innocent conversion or upon a quantum meruit.

[7, 8] Appellant's final point is that the trial court erred in not allowing interest prior to the entry of judgment, citing section 3336 of the Civil Code. That section, however, as shown by its heading and context, applies only in cases of conversion; whereas here, upon a quantum meruit for the reasonable value of the material received by respondent, the amount was unliquidated until the time of judgment; and an unbroken line of authorities holds that an unliquidated claim does not bear interest. See Parkford v. Union Drilling, etc., Co., 118 Cal.App. 538, 5 P.2d 440.

The judgment is affirmed.

MOON v. SUPERIOR COURT IN AND FOR LOS ANGELES COUNTY et al.

Civ. No. A-14031.

June 28, 1943.

1. Courts 🔑207(5)

Where prohibition proceeding to prevent enforcement of superior court's order, modifying interlocutory divorce judgment by changing minor child's custody from wife to husband, was transferred by District Court of Appeal to Supreme Court and retransferred thereby to District Court of Appeal after respondents raised point that such court should not consider matter because appeal from such order was properly taken to Supreme Court, rule of comity that District Court of Appeal should not entertain petition for writ affecting pending proceeding appealable directly to Supreme Court was inapplicable.

2. Divorce 🔑312

A divorced wife's appeal to Supreme Court from superior court's order modifying interlocutory divorce judgment by changing minor child's custody from wife to husband effected stay of proceedings to enforce such order, subject to superior court's power, in its discretion, to require undertaking from appellant to make stay operative. Code Civ.Proc. § 949.

3. Divorce 🔑312

If superior court, contrary to statutory stay of proceedings to enforce its order modifying interlocutory divorce judgment by changing minor child's custody from wife to husband pending wife's appeal therefrom to Supreme Court, undertakes to enforce such order pending appeal, Supreme Court may grant writ of supersedeas to prevent such enforcement.

4. Divorce 🔑312

The superior court's order, directing divorced wife to deliver spouses' minor child to husband by specified time, after hearing on question of continuing such court's stay of proceedings to enforce its previous order changing child's custody from wife to husband pending wife's appeal therefrom to Supreme Court was an act by superior court to enforce such order pending appeal and afforded ground for Supreme Court's issuance of supersedeas to prevent such enforcement.

5. Prohibition 🔑3(1)

A writ of prohibition will not be issued where there is plain, speedy and adequate remedy in ordinary course of law. Code Civ.Proc. § 1103.

6. Prohibition 🔑3(2)

An appeal, at least in case wherein writ of supersedeas may be obtained to prevent doing of acts against which writ of prohibition is sought, such as enforcement of order awarding custody of divorced parents' minor child to husband, is a plain, speedy and adequate remedy in ordinary course of law, so as to preclude issuance of writ of prohibition. Code Civ.Proc. § 1103.

7. Prohibition 🔑28

In prohibition proceeding to prevent enforcement of superior court's order, awarding custody of divorced parents' minor child to husband, pending wife's appeal to Supreme Court from such order, questions whether superior court's order, requiring petitioner to give undertaking, was contrary to alternative writ already issued, and whether order staying enforcement of custody order, without requiring undertaking, constituted determination that no undertaking was necessary and, if so, whether court could change such determination, will not be considered, as all such matters can be decided on proper application by petitioner for writ of supersedeas. Code Civ.Proc. § 949.

Original proceeding by Naomi Moon for a writ of prohibition to prevent further proceedings for enforcement of an order of the Superior Court in and for the County of Los Angeles, modifying an interlocutory judgment, granting relator a divorce from Charles Moon and awarding their minor child's custody to relator, by awarding such custody to respondent Charles Moon, and an order directing relator to deliver the child to respondent Moon by a specified time.

Alternative writ discharged, and peremptory writ denied.

SHAW, Justice pro tem.

This is a proceeding in prohibition. It appears from the petition that in an action for divorce between the petitioner herein, Naomi Moon, and her husband, Charles Moon, the court made its interlocutory judgment of divorce, in which it awarded the custody of the minor child of the parties to said Naomi Moon, who was the plaintiff in that action. Thereafter, on December 18, 1942, upon the application of Charles Moon, the court made an order in the divorce action changing the custody of the child and awarding it to Charles Moon. On January 5, 1943, Naomi Moon took an appeal from the last mentioned order, and that appeal is still pending. On January 6, 1943, the same court made an ex parte order purporting to stay the enforcement, pending said appeal, of the order of December 18, 1942, changing the custody of the child. Later the court ordered Naomi Moon to appear on January 19, 1943, at a hearing for the purpose of considering whether this stay should be continued in force pending the appeal, and at the conclusion of that hearing on January 19th the court ordered her to deliver the child to Charles Moon by 5 p. m. of that day. The writ of prohibition is asked here to prevent further proceedings for the enforcement of the last mentioned order as well as that of December 18.

[1] The respondents here contend that this court should not entertain or consider the matter because the appeal from the order of December 18, 1942 was not taken to this court but to the Supreme Court, where, under the Constitution, jurisdiction of such an appeal was vested, citing Foster v. Superior Court (1935) 4 Cal.App.2d 466, 41 P.2d 187, and Gunder v. Superior Court (1929) 100 Cal.App. 334, 279 P. 822. Those cases do declare that a District Court of Appeal should not entertain a petition for a writ affecting a pending proceeding which is appealable directly to the Supreme Court, and there are other cases to the same effect. Waidley v. Superior Court (1942) 51 Cal. App.2d 690, 125 P.2d 507 and cases cited. This rule appears to be one of comity rather than of jurisdiction; and any effect that it might have here is dispelled by the fact that since the point was raised this proceeding has been transferred to the Supreme Court and retransferred to this court by the Supreme Court. Smith v. Tristam (1933) 130 Cal.App. 750, 751, 20 P.2d 770.

[2-4] Manifestly, what the petitioner seeks here is a stay of proceedings on the orders of December 18 and January 19 until her appeal from the order of December 18 has been determined. Her appeal of its own force effected a stay of proceedings to enforce the order of December 18, subject to the power of the trial court, in its discretion, to require an undertaking from appellant to make the stay operative. Code Civ. Proc. § 949; Smith v. Smith (1941) 18 Cal. 2d 462, 465, 116 P.2d 3; Foster v. Foster (1936) 5 Cal.2d 669, 672, 55 P.2d 1175; Vosburg v. Vosburg (1902) 137 Cal. 493, 495, 70 P. 473. If the trial court should, contrary to this statutory stay, undertake to enforce its order while the appeal is pending, the court in which the appeal is pending may, in the course of the proceedings on the appeal, grant a writ of supersedeas to prevent such enforcement. Smith v. Smith, supra; Southern Pac. Co. v. Superior Court (1914) 167 Cal. 250, 252, 139 P. 69; Hubbard v. University Bank (1898) 120 Cal. 632, 52 P. 1070. The order of January 19 appears to be such an act by the trial court and would afford a ground for the issuance of a supersedeas. Smith v. Smith, supra.

[5, 6] The writ of prohibition will not be issued where there is a plain, speedy and adequate remedy in the ordinary course of law. Code Civ.Proc. § 1103; McAneny v. Superior Court (1906) 150 Cal. 6, 9, 87 P. 1020; Glasser v. Municipal Court (1938) 27 Cal.App.2d 455, 81 P.2d 260; Highland Securities Co. v. Superior Court (1931) 119 Cal.App. 107, 116, 6 P.2d 116; Lightner Mining Co. v. Superior Court (1910) 14 Cal.App. 642, 649, 112 P. 909. An appeal, at least in a case where a writ of supersedeas may be obtained to prevent the doing of the acts against which the writ of prohibition is sought, is such a remedy. McAneny v. Superior Court, supra; Highland Securities Co. v. Superior Court, supra; Glasser v. Municipal Court, supra; Lightner Mining Co. v. Superior Court, supra.

[7] A supplemental petition has been filed herein, alleging that on January 25, 1943, the trial court, purporting to act under section 949, Code of Civil Procedure, made a further order requiring the petitioner here to give an undertaking in the sum of $100, and that said order is contrary to the alternative writ already issued in the present proceeding. Questions may also arise whether the order of January 6 staying enforcement of the order of December 18, without requiring any undertaking, constituted a determination that no undertaking was necessary, and if so, whether the trial court could change its determination in this respect. See Hubbard v. University Bank, supra, 120 Cal. 632, 52 P. 1070. All of these matters can be decided upon a proper application for a writ of supersedeas, and hence we do not undertake to consider them now.

The alternative writ of prohibition is discharged and the peremptory writ is denied.

Action by Mrs. Joseph Gosling and another against A. La Verne Nichols, an individual, and A. McCOMB, Justice.

From a judgment of dismissal predicated upon the ground that the present action abated on the death of defendant's intestate, plaintiffs appeal. The action was instituted to recover damages for the wrongful death of Joseph Gosling.

These are the essential facts:

On December 10, 1941, plaintiffs, as the sole heirs at law of Joseph Gosling, deceased, filed an action against A. La Verne Nichols, pursuant to the provisions of section 377 of the Code of Civil Procedure, to recover damages for the wrongful death of Mr. Gosling.

The complaint contained two causes of action: (1) for negligence, and (2) for breach of an implied warranty that food sold to Mr. Gosling was wholesome.

The two causes of action are predicated upon allegations in the complaint that on or about May 6, 1939, Mr. Nichols was operating a public golf club known as the Rancho Public Golf Club, and in connection with such golf club he engaged in the business of selling and furnishing food and meals to the general public. That on or about the aforementioned date Mr. Gosling purchased from Mr. Nichols food which was tainted, unwholesome, and unfit for human consumption, and that as a proximate result of eating such food Mr. Gosling contracted an illness from which he died December 15, 1940.

Mr. Nichols was duly served with the complaint and filed an answer thereto. However, before the action was tried he died on June 5, 1942. Thereafter pursuant to a motion of the plaintiffs, defendant Winifred Nichols, as administratrix of the estate of A. La Verne Nichols, was substituted as defendant in the present action in the place and stead of her intestate.

On February 25, 1942, pursuant to a motion of defendant, a judgment of dismissal of the present action was entered and filed upon the ground that the action abated with the death of Mr. Nichols.

This is the sole question necessary for us to determine:

Did the causes of action alleged in the complaint abate with the death of Mr. Nichols?

This question must be answered in the affirmative and is governed by the following pertinent rules:

[1] (1) A right of action for death by wrongful act pursuant to the provisions of section 377 of the Code of Civil Procedure is a tort action which does not survive the death of the wrongdoer. Sayles v. Peters, 11 Cal.App.2d 401, 403, 54 P.2d 94; National Auto Insurance Co. v. Cunningham, 41 Cal.App.2d 828, 831, 107 P.2d 643; see also Clark v. Goodman, 170 Cal. 527, 531, 150 P. 357, L.R.A.1916A, 1142.

[2] (2) A tort action abates upon the death of the wrongdoer at any time before the action is ready for rendition of a final judgment, in the absence of a statute expressly providing that the cause of action shall survive, Clark v. Goodwin, 170 Cal. 527, 529, 150 P. 357, L.R.A.1916A, 1142; Rideaux v. Torgrimson, 39 Cal.App.2d 273, 275, 102 P.2d 1104; see also 1 C.J.S.(1936), Abatement and Revival, p. 173, § 126, and

[3] (3) The gravamen of a cause of action for breach of an implied warranty that food is fit for human consumption is the personal injury which results, and the action "sounds in tort". The cause of action is not ex contractu. Singley v. Bigelow, 108 Cal.App. 436, 445, 291 P. 899; Speer v. Brown, 26 Cal.App.2d 283, 294, 79 P.2d 179; Harkins v. Provenzo, 116 Misc. 61, 189 N.Y.S. 258, 259, et seq; Bernstein v. Queens County Jockey Club, 222 App. Div. 191, 225 N.Y.S. 449, et seq.

[4] Applying the foregoing rules to the facts in the instant case it is apparent that under rule 1, supra, plaintiffs' cause of action for negligence was a tort action and abated upon the death of the wrongdoer (Mr. Nichols), since his death occurred prior to the time the action was ready for the rendition of a final judgment, and there was no applicable statute modifying the common law rule that a tort action abates with the death of the wrongdoer, rule 2, supra.

[5] Likewise, under rule 3, supra, plaintiffs' cause of action for breach of an implied warranty that the food sold by Mr. Nichols was wholesome, was a cause of action "sounding in tort", which under rule 2, supra, abated with Mr. Nichols' death.

For the foregoing reasons the judgment is affirmed.

Where position of head janitor was in a separate class in civil service of city and county of San Francisco before 1930 reclassification, reclassification did not deprive foreman janitor in the grade next below head janitor of right to promotion without examination under rule authorizing such promotions in grade within a class in violation of charter amendment providing that any new classification should not adversely affect classification or duties of any person holding a position when amendment was adopted.

3. Municipal corporations ⚷217(5)

Promotion from position of foreman janitor to head janitor in civil service of city and county of San Francisco was by promotional examination under charter and rules in effect before adoption of new charter in 1932, and hence one holding position of foreman janitor before 1932 had not acquired right to promotion without examination which must be preserved under charter provision continuing in force any civil service rights acquired under the old charter.

4. Municipal corporations ⚷216(2)

Rules adopted by civil service commission under rule-making power conferred by charter of city and county of San Francisco, and not in conflict with such charter, have the same force and effect as the charter.

5. Municipal corporations ⚷216(2)

Civil service commission of city and county of San Francisco cannot by general resolution provide a basis of advancement for those who have been in civil service under old charter different from that of promotional examination and ascertained merit where practicable, as provided by charter adopted in 1932.

6. Municipal corporations ⚷217(5)

A foreman janitor in civil service of city and county of San Francisco was not entitled to promotion without examination to fill vacancy in position of head janitor, though he had occupied position of foreman janitor under the old charter in effect before 1932.

7. Municipal corporations ⚷217(5)

In action for declaratory relief, foreman janitor holding second position on eligible list for head janitor could challenge right of recent appointee to such position on ground that, although position formerly occupied by appointee as janitor had been reclassified as that of foreman janitor, duties of position were not those prescribed for a foreman janitor, and hence appointee was not eligible to take promotional examination for position of head janitor.

8. Appeal and error ⚷1056(1)

In action for declaratory relief, exclusion of evidence offered by foreman janitor holding second position on eligible list for head janitor that recent appointee to head janitor position was not eligible to take promotional examination for the position because, although position occupied by him had been reclassified as that of head janitor, his duties were not those prescribed for that position, was prejudicial error.

9. Action ⚷6

In action for declaratory relief determining that recent appointee to position of head janitor was not eligible to take promotional examination for that position because, although position formerly occupied by him as janitor had been reclassified as foreman janitor, his duties were not those prescribed for a foreman janitor, pleadings and proof offered thereunder sufficiently presented question of civil service commission's abuse of discretion in reclassifying the position of janitor formerly held by appointee.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Sylvain J. Lazarus, Judge.

Action by Henry Viner against the Civil Service Commission of the City and County of San Francisco and others for declaratory relief to determine plaintiff's right to promotion from foreman janitor to head janitor in the civil service of the City and County of San Francisco, wherein Russell V. Rush intervened. From an adverse judgment, plaintiff appeals.

Judgment affirmed in part, and in part reversed for a trial on the merits.

Joseph T. Curley and Marvin C. Hix, both of San Francisco, for appellant.

John J. O'Toole, City Atty., and Norman Sanford Wolff, Deputy City Atty., both of San Francisco (L. R. Bunney, of San Francisco, of counsel), for respondents defendants.

Thomas V. Maloney, Jr., of San Francisco, for intervener respondent.

PETERS, Presiding Justice.

Plaintiff appeals from a judgment against him in an action for declaratory relief by which he seeks to determine his right to promotion from foreman janitor to head janitor in the civil service system of the City and County of San Francisco. The plaintiff and two others took a promotional examination given on April 7, 1939, to establish an eligible list for the position of head janitor. Plaintiff placed third. Intervener Rush passed first, and was assigned to the position when it became vacant on June 1, 1939, with the retirement of the incumbent. Plaintiff contends that under the charter of the City and County of San Francisco in effect until January 8, 1932, and rules adopted by the defendant commission pursuant thereto, he was entitled to promotion without taking an examination, and that this right was continued by § 142 of the new charter, which provides that: "The civil service rights, acquired by persons under the provisions of the charter superseded by this charter, shall continue under this charter." The other participants in the examination did not become foreman janitors until after the new charter went into effect.

Plaintiff further contends that intervener Rush was not entitled to take the examination, for the reason that it was open only to foremen janitors, and Rush, in the analysis of plaintiff, was not a foreman janitor. Morris, the other man who took the examination, did not intervene, and is not a party to these proceedings. The trial court decided against plaintiff on both contentions.

[1] Plaintiff brought the present suit on July 19, 1939. The commission concedes that he is not estopped to urge his right to the position without examination because he took the examination without protest. The right to bring an action for declaratory relief against a municipal corporation or other subdivision of the state is upheld in Hoyt v. Board of Civil Service Commissioners, 21 Cal.2d 399, 132 P.2d 804.

Plaintiff was first employed by the city and county in 1902. In 1905 he and other janitors in the employ of the city and county under the Department of Public Works took a civil service examination. Plaintiff was listed as number nine on the list made up from that examination. He testified that all who took the test received a grade of 100%. The basis for the order of listing does not appear. In 1907, or prior thereto, plaintiff was assigned by the Department of Public Works to act as assistant head janitor. Bellett, who was number one on the list, acted as head janitor. It was Bellett's retirement in 1939 which opened the position of head janitor. Of the persons who took the janitorial examination in 1905, plaintiff and Bellett were the only ones in the employ of the city and county at the date of the 1939 examination.

Prior to 1930 the position of head janitor was not separately classified by the defendant commission in its listed classification of positions. In the classification as it appears in the 1916 edition of "Charter Provisions, Rules and Classification," issued by the commission, there is the single classification "Janitors" for all types of janitorial work. (P. 65.) In the 1924 edition the classification appears "Janitors (includes head janitor and window washers)." (P. 82.) In November, 1930, a new classification was adopted with a Janitorial Subdivision listing six classes, as follows: C 102 Janitress; C 104 Janitor; C 106 Sub-Foreman Janitor; C 108 Foreman Janitor; C 110 Head Janitor; C 112 Supervisor of School Janitors. A Window Cleaning Subdivision included two classes in the new classification: C 202 Window Cleaner and C 204 Sub-Foreman Window Cleaner.

On November 8, 1933, the commission adopted a resolution to determine the status of employees appointed under the old classification who were working under the new classification. Bellett was declared entitled to hold the position of head janitor under the new classification, and plaintiff to hold a position of the class C 108 Foreman Janitor. No other employee was listed as occupying a foreman janitor position. The duties of that position as set forth in the classification of November 17, 1930, are as follows: "Assists a Head Janitor in supervising a large group of Janitors or directs a large group of Janitors such as those at the Hall of Justice; looks after supplies; may keep time of subordinates." Plaintiff had been performing duties of this type for many years and continued to do so at all times after the reclassification.

Intervener Rush, who, by his complaint in intervention, placed in issue his right to hold the position of head janitor, was first employed as a janitor by the city and county on June 1, 1927, from a list made up from an examination. His class under the new classification was C 104 Janitor. From time to time he served temporarily as a foreman janitor between October, 1933, and July, 1936. His regular position as janitor was in the rooms of the Civil Service Commission. In 1935 he took an examination to establish an eligible list for the position of foreman janitor. On June 15, 1936, the commission reclassified as C 108 Foreman Janitor the position which he held as C 104 Janitor in the offices of the commission. On July 20, 1936, Rush was appointed to this position as reclassified. He held it at the time he took the 1939 examination for head janitor.

Plaintiff contends that the commission abused its discretion and acted without legal authority in reclassifying the position in the offices of the commission as of the class C 108 Foreman Janitor in 1936, for the reason that it did not involve duties prescribed for that class in the provision of the 1930 classification quoted above. For such reason, plaintiff contends, Rush did not hold a position as a foreman janitor and was ineligible to take the promotional examination for head janitor, open only to those who were foreman janitors. By his complaint in intervention Rush put in issue the validity of the 1936 order reclassifying his position as C 108 Foreman Janitor.

Plaintiff's main contention is that he was entitled to the position of head janitor without examination. This contention rests on the proposition that he had that right under the old charter, in effect until January 8, 1932, and rules of the commission pursuant thereto, and that § 142 of the new charter, quoted in the opening paragraph above, preserved such right. Rush and Morris did not become foreman janitors until after the new charter went into effect, and hence that charter is the sole measure of their rights to the position of head janitor.

The old charter, like the new, made ascertained merit and promotional examination the basis for advancement from class to class. Old charter: Stats.1899, pp. 241, 351, Art. XIII, § 8; new charter: Stats.1931, pp. 2973, 3064, § 146. But the old charter in 1913, Stats.1913, p. 1611, amending Art. XIII, § 2, authorized the commission to establish grades within classes. On the theory that it could provide for advancement from grade to grade within a class without promotional examinations, the commission adopted rule 38. That rule provided for advancement to a vacancy in a higher grade by the person in the next lower grade having the highest rating for service, without promotional examination.

Plaintiff contends that prior to the reclassification of November, 1930, he held a position in the next grade below that of Bellett, head janitor. After the November, 1930, reclassification the position of head janitor was in a different class from lower janitorial positions, rather than merely in a different grade. If the result of placing the head janitor position in a separate class was to render rule 38 inapplicable to that position after 1930, then plaintiff had no right under the old charter to advance to the position without examination. The consequence would be that § 142 of the new charter, which went into effect in 1932, could preserve no such right to him because such right no longer existed when the new charter went into effect. Plaintiff contends, however, that the benefit of rule 38 survived the reclassification of 1930 by reason of a 1925 amendment to the old charter which provided as to any classification the commission might make "that such classification and grading shall not operate to adversely affect the civil service classification or duties of any person holding a position at the time of the adoption of this amendment." Stats.1925, p. 1166. Plaintiff contends that to take from one in the class of janitor in the grade next below head janitor the right to advance to the head janitor position without examination is to affect adversely the former classification.

It is a premise of plaintiff's argument that he was in the next grade below Bellett. Rule 38 as it appears in the 1924 edition of Charter Provisions, Rules and Classification, establishes grades based on salary applicable to all classes in the civil service. Positions carrying a salary of more than $250 and not more than $300 were grade eight. After August 1, 1924, Bellett received a salary of $260 and hence was in such grade. Plaintiff received a salary of $180, which placed him in grade five, for the salary range between $175 and $200. If no janitor received a salary in the intervening grades, six and seven, plaintiff was in the grade next below Bellett in the janitorial class. A reasonable interpretation of the evidence is that there was no janitor in the intervening grades when Bellett retired nor prior thereto. One Ralston also acted as assistant head janitor until his retirement in 1932, but it is not shown that he received a salary which placed him in a higher grade than plaintiff. Plaintiff testified to the foreman of the night gang receiving $5 more a month than he did, but this would not place him in a different grade from plaintiff.

[2] Conceding that plaintiff was in the grade next below Bellett, his contention nevertheless cannot be upheld. Plaintiff rests his case on rule 38, but overlooks rule 35 as it stood when the November, 1930, reclassification was made. Rule 35 required the position of head janitor to be filled by promotive examination. The rule in its 1930 form is as follows:

> "All positions of Foremen and Sub-foremen of the trades and skilled occupations shall be separately classified, and, when practicable, shall be filled by promotive examination. For each such position to be filled, the three highest eligibles, of the class involved, shall be certified.
> "All such Foremen and Sub-foremen regularly holding their positions on June 11, 1930, under the rules then in force, shall continue to hold their positions without examination and may be removed therefrom only for cause, under Rule 23."

The janitorial class was expressly included in the "trades and skilled occupations" when rule 35 was adopted in its 1930 form prior to the November, 1930, reclassification. Division N of the Classification preceding that of 1930, in which division the class of janitors was listed, is entitled "Mechanical Service (includes the trades and skilled occupations not classified elsewhere)." Charter Provisions, Rules and Classification, 1924 Ed., p. 81.

That the head janitor was a foreman within the meaning of rule 35, we have no doubt. That rule rendered rule 38 inapplicable to the head and sub-supervisory positions of any class in the trades and skilled occupations. The positions which Bellett and plaintiff held were not taken out of rule 35 because the Board of Public Works described them as head janitor and assistant head janitor. Nor was rule 35 inapplicable to the head supervisory position because the reclassification of 1930 gave to it the title head janitor. The question is whether the position occupied by Bellett was that of foreman within the meaning of rule 35 before the reclassification. We hold that it was. The requirement of the rule as to promotive examinations applied notwithstanding the head position was not separately classified until November, 1930. It follows that advancement to that position under the old charter and rules, as well as under the new, was by promotional examination.

[3] That the designations foremen and sub-foremen were intended to relate to the supervisory positions in any class in Division N regardless of the departmental title is indicated by the two earlier forms of the rule. As the rule appears in the 1916 edition of Charter Provisions, Rules and Classification (p. 48), it refers to foremen, inspectors and superintendents as overseers. The rule authorized departmental heads to appoint a temporary sub-foreman, but provided that all other positions of overseers should be classified according to duties and filled by examination. In the 1924 edition (p. 58), Rule 35 is entitled "Overseers." It provides that where positions of "overseers, foremen or chiefs" are not separately classified, "the appointing power may select the senior employee of a class to act as overseer, foreman or chief of such class of employees." Note that the rule provides for the appointment of the senior employee, rather than the employee with the highest rating for service as under rule 38. Before the 1930 reclassification the rule had been changed again to require the chief position to be filled by promotive examination. It is apparent that it was rule 35, and not rule 38, which regulated the filling of the head janitorial position under the old charter. Since rule 35 required a promotional examination, plaintiff had no right under the old charter to advance to the head janitor position without examination and hence such right was not preserved to him by § 142 of the new charter.

[4] Defendant commission and the intervener contend that § 142 preserved rights which plaintiff had under the old charter but not rights which he had under rules enacted pursuant thereto; that if rule 38 was applicable to the head janitor position, the new charter did not guarantee to plaintiff the benefit of that rule or any other. This argument is unsound. Rules adopted by the commission under the rule making power conferred by the charter, and not in conflict with it, have the same force and effect as the charter. Mitchell v. McKevitt, 128 Cal.App. 458, 461, 17 P.2d 789; Bruce v. Civil Service Board, 6 Cal. App.2d 633, 637, 45 P.2d 419. For this reason we rest our decision on the proposition that it is rule 35, rather than rule 38, which is decisive. Under this conclusion it is unnecessary to consider the effect of the 1925 charter amendment, quoted above, as a restriction on the power of the commission to cut off rights under rule 38 through reclassification.

[5, 6] Reference has heretofore been made to the status resolution of 1933 which found Bellett to be occupying the position of head janitor under the new classification, and plaintiff the position of foreman janitor. That resolution contained provisions which plaintiff contends constitute a recognition of a right to succeed to the head janitor position without examination. If plaintiff had such right under the old charter and rules enacted pursuant to it, then § 142 preserved the right without need of its recognition by the commission. If he did not have the right under the old charter, then it was beyond the power of the commission to accord it to him by resolution. The new charter provides for advancement on the basis of promotional examinations and ascertained merit where practicable. Allen v. McKinley, 18 Cal.2d 697, 117 P.2d 342. The commission could not by general resolution provide a different basis of advancement for those who had been in the civil service under the old charter. Plaintiff recognizes this in his brief when he says: "Plaintiff does not look to it [the status resolution] for the creation of his right, but only to it as a recognition of the right he had under the old charter and rule 38." We conclude that plaintiff was not entitled to succeed to the position of head janitor without examination.

Plaintiff makes the additional point that Rush was improperly assigned to the head janitor position for the reason that he was ineligible to take the promotional examination for that position, which was open only to those who were foreman janitors; that Rush was not legally a foreman janitor. The facts are, as outlined above, that Rush became a janitor in 1927. In 1935 he was placed on an eligible list for the class C 108 Foreman Janitor as a result of an examination. At this time his position as janitor, class C 104, was in the rooms of the Civil Service Commission. In June, 1936, the commission changed the classification of that position from class C 104 Janitor to C 108 Foreman Janitor. On July 20, 1936, Rush was assigned to the position which he held until he was placed in the head janitor position after passing the 1939 examination in first place.

[7, 8] Plaintiff's contention is that the commission abused its discretion and thereby acted without authority of law in changing the classification of the particular position which Rush held from class C 104 to C 108 in 1936 for the reason that it involved no duties of the type prescribed in the official classification for the position of foreman janitor, but only ordinary janitor duties. The duties of the class C 108 Foreman Janitor are as follows: "Assists a Head Janitor in supervising a large group of Janitors or directs a large group of Janitors such as those at the Hall of Justice; looks after supplies; may keep time of subordinates." Plaintiff sought to show, through interrogation of Rush, that the janitorial position in the offices of the Civil Service Commission did not involve any duties whatsoever of the type prescribed for class C 108 Foreman Janitor at any time, either before or after the reclassification of that position. Plaintiff's purpose was to establish the commission's abuse of discretion. The court excluded the evidence on the theory that plaintiff could not make such an attack on the action of the commission. We are of the view that the court erred. This ruling was prejudicial. Plaintiff has an interest in eliminating Rush, since in such event if Morris takes the position plaintiff's name will be the only one, rather than second, on the eligibility list.

The complaint as first filed alleged: "That said Russell V. Rush has never held a position of foreman janitor in the employ of said City and County of San Francisco and for such reason was not qualified to take such examination." During the trial the following was added by amendment: "That said Russell V. Rush never did while employed in the position of Janitor in the rooms occupied and used by said Civil Service Commission have supervision of a large group of janitors or supervision of any janitors nor did he direct a large or any other group of janitors such as those at the Hall of Justice, nor did he look after supplies; never kept the time of subordinates; never assisted the Head Janitor in supervising a large group of janitors and never performed any duties or work except of the kind described under the duties attached to the classification of C 104 Janitor as set forth in the classification adopted about November 17, 1930, by said Civil Service Commission; that the reclassification of the position occupied by the said Russel V. Rush by said Commission was illegal and without any authority in law and that said Commission abused its discretion in permitting said Russell V. Rush to take said examination so held as aforesaid on April 7, 1939." (Italics added.)

Defendant commission and the intervener note that the allegation is that while employed as janitor Rush did not perform duties of the type required of a foreman janitor. What he did as janitor is immaterial, they say. The purpose of this allegation is, however, to show that it was improper to reclassify the position of janitor which Rush was filling as of the class foreman janitor because he was not performing duties of the type prescribed for a foreman janitor job.

Rush became a party to the action by his complaint in intervention in which he alleged that the commission reclassified the position which he held pursuant to the power and authority vested in it by the charter, and that he performed the duties of foreman janitor. The prayer was that the court determine that intervener at all times since June 1, 1939, had been entitled to the head janitor position.

[9] We are of the view that the pleadings and offer of proof sufficiently present the question of the commission's abuse of discretion in reclassifying the position of janitor which Rush held.

The judgment is affirmed insofar as it determines that plaintiff was not entitled to advance to the position of head janitor without examination. Insofar as it determines Rush's right to the position of head janitor the judgment is reversed for a trial on the merits on that issue. Each side shall bear its own costs on appeal.

Civ. 6844.

District Court of Appeal, Third District, California.

June 30, 1943.

Rehearing Denied July 20, 1943.

Order Denying Rehearing Vacated July 22, 1943.

Rehearing Granted July 30, 1943.

1. Wills 🔑155(1)

To set aside a will on ground of undue influence, it is necessary to show that influence was such as in effect to destroy testator's free agency and substitute for his own another person's will.

2. Wills 🔑166(1)

To set aside a will on ground of undue influence, evidence must be produced that pressure was brought to bear directly upon the testamentary act.

3. Wills 🔑159

Mere general influence, however strong and controlling, not brought to bear upon the testamentary act, is not enough to justify setting aside will on ground of "undue influence", but it must be influence used directly to procure the will and must amount to coercion destroying free agency on part of testator.

See Words and Phrases, Permanent Edition, for all other definitions of "Undue Influences".

4. Wills 🔑166(7)

Mere opportunity to influence the mind of testator, even coupled with an interest or a motive to do so, is not sufficient to establish "undue influence".

5. Wills 🔑166(2)

Evidence was insufficient to support finding of undue influence on part of husband in connection with will executed by wife disinheriting wife's married daughter.

6. Wills 🔑163(1)

Where the due execution of will was proved by testimony of subscribing witnesses, burden of proof was upon contestant to establish undue influence.

7. Wills 🔑82

A will cannot be set aside on mere ground that it is unjust or unnatural, since an unnatural, unfair or unjust will creates in itself no presumption of incompetency or undue influence.

8. Wills 🔑82

A will is not necessarily unnatural that favors a spouse over an adult daughter, especially where the child is self-supporting and is married with a husband living, and is not dependent upon testator.

9. Wills 🔑166(7)

Opportunity, even coupled with a motive alone, will not sustain a finding of undue influence, in the absence of evidence showing pressure operating directly upon testamentary act, and it cannot be presumed that because a husband has opportunity and inducement to exert undue influence over his wife that he has done so.

10. Wills 🔑53(2)

Evidence as to mental condition before or after execution of a will is important only in so far as it tends to show mental condition at the time of the execution of the will.

11. Wills 🔑54(1), 55(8)

That testator is a suicide may be given in evidence as tending to establish insanity, but more than mere fact of suicide must be shown to establish that the insanity was so complete as to destroy testamentary capacity, or that it was of such nature as to have exercised a direct influence bearing upon the testamentary act.

12. Evidence 🔑568(2)

The opinion of a lay witness as to mental capacity of testatrix has no greater probative value than the facts given by him as the basis of his conclusion.

13. Evidence 🔑568(2)

Facts given by contestant's witnesses, as basis of their opinions as to mental incapacity of testatrix, merely showing peculiarities, few isolated acts, idiosyncrasies or mental departures from the normal, but did not bear directly upon and influence the testamentary act, were insufficient to support finding of "mental incapacity".

See Words and Phrases, Permanent Edition, for all other definitions of "Mental Capacity".

14. Evidence 🔑571(2)

Physician's testimony that testatrix was incompetent, based on a question framed to call for an answer favorable to contestant, was the weakest and most unsatisfactory evidence.

Testamentary capacity is always presumed, and burden is upon contestant to show affirmatively and by preponderance of the evidence that testator was of unsound mind at time of execution of will.

16. Wills 🔑50

Testator is of "sound mind" if at time of making will he has sufficient mental capacity to be able to understand the nature of the act he is doing, to understand and recall the nature and situation of his property, and to remember and understand his relation to the persons who have claims on his bounty and whose interests are affected by the instrument.

See Words and Phrases, Permanent Edition, for all other definitions of "Sound Mind".

17. Wills 🔑31

"Mental incompetency" sufficient to avoid a testamentary act must be either insanity of such a broad character as to establish mental incompetency generally, or some specific and narrower form of insanity under which testator is victim of some hallucination or delusion which influenced the creation of terms of the will.

See Words and Phrases, Permanent Edition, for all other definitions of "Mental Competency".

18. Wills 🔑55(1, 3)

Evidence was insufficient to establish that at time of executing will testatrix failed to understand nature of her act or nature and situation of her property and her relation to her daughter who was disinherited, and failed to establish insanity of such a broad character as to establish "mental incompetency" generally, or any delusions or hallucinations which influence creation and terms of will.

THOMPSON, J., dissenting.

Appeal from Superior Court, Humboldt County; Harry W. Falk, Judge.

In the matter of the estate of Irene L. Teel, also known as Irene L. Friend, deceased, wherein Rilma K. Gaskill contested the validity of decedent's purported last will and testament on ground of undue influence and mental incapacity. From a judgment denying probate of the proposed will, John E. Teel, proponent, appeals.

Reversed with directions.

Hill & Hill, of Eureka, for appellant.

John F. Quinn and Irwin T. Quinn, both of Eureka, for respondent.

ADAMS, Presiding Justice.

This is an appeal from judgment refusing admission to probate of the proposed will of Irene L. Teel.

The testatrix, who was a widow about sixty years of age, and proponent, a widower aged sixty-nine, intermarried on June 29, 1940. On November 14, 1940, at the office of H. L. Ricks, decedent's attorney, they executed formal wills under the reciprocal provisions of which each was the sole beneficiary of the other. At the same time they executed deeds whereby they created a joint tenancy between themselves in certain of their properties. On December 2, 1940, Irene Teel committed suicide.

Proponent's petition for admission to probate of his wife's will was opposed by contestant, Rilma K. Gaskill, her only child by a former marriage, on the grounds of decedent's lack of testamentary capacity and undue influence exerted by proponent. At the trial proponent made a prima facie case by calling the witnesses to the will, Attorney Ricks and his secretary, Mrs. Burgess. Evidence was then adduced by contestant, at the conclusion of which proponent made a motion for a nonsuit, which was denied. Proponent then offered further evidence and at the conclusion of the trial moved the court for a directed verdict. This motion was also denied and the case was submitted to a jury upon special interrogatories. The jury found in favor of contestant on both grounds. Proponent then made a motion for judgment notwithstanding the verdict, but this motion also was denied and judgment was entered in accordance with the verdict. This appeal is presented on the sole ground of the insufficiency of the evidence.

Proponent's motions should have been granted. The evidence produced by contestant is insufficient to show either undue influence or incompetency to make a will.

[1-4] As to what constitutes undue influence sufficient to support a finding, the court said in Re Estate of Arnold, 16 Cal. 2d 573, 577, 107 P.2d 25, 27:

"In an action to set aside a will of a deceased person on the ground of undue influence, it is necessary to show that the influence was such as, in effect, to destroy the testator's free agency and substitute for his own another person's will. [In re] Estate of Motz, 136 Cal. 558, 563, 69 P. 294. Evidence must be produced that pressure was brought to bear directly upon the testamentary act. In re McDevitt's Estate, 95 Cal. 17, 33, 30 P. 101. Mere general influence, however strong and controlling, not to bear upon the testamentary act, is not enough; it must be influence used directly to procure the will, and must amount to coercion destroying free agency on the part of the testator. [In re] Estate of Keegan, 139 Cal. 123, 127, 72 P. 828. It is further held that mere opportunity to influence the mind of the testator, even coupled with an interest or a motive to do so, is not sufficient. [In re] Estate of Easton, 140 Cal.App. 367, 371, 35 P.2d 614.

" 'The unbroken rule in this state is that courts must refuse to set aside the solemnly executed will of a deceased person upon the ground of undue influence unless there be proof of "a pressure which overpowered the mind and bore down the volition of the testator at the very time the will was made." ' [In re] Estate of Gleason, 164 Cal. 756, 765, 130 P. 872."

[5] There was no evidence produced by contestant of any such influence upon the testator. Attorney Ricks, who prepared the wills, testified that Mrs. Teel's will was prepared at her request and in accordance with her wishes; that she first came to his office on November 7th with Mr. Teel and stated that she wanted to make her will in favor of her husband, leaving nothing to her daughter; that at that time he tried to discourage her from omitting the daughter and told her to think it over; that he, however, took information from both parties and prepared wills in accordance therewith, and that subsequently the two returned and the wills were executed by them; that he did not talk to Mrs. Teel alone and that both parties were present when both wills were signed. He testified, however, that there was no apparent domination by Mr. Teel, and that he saw no evidence of influence; that he kept Mrs. Teel's will after its execution and that she could have had it at any time, but never called for it. Mrs. Burgess testified also that Mrs. Teel was not acting under duress, menace, fraud or undue influence.

[6] The due execution of the will having been proved by the testimony of the subscribing witnesses thereto, the burden of proof was upon the contestant to establish undue influence. 26 Cal.Jur. 759; In re Estate of Black, 132 Cal. 392, 64 P. 695. There was no evidence produced by contestant in her case in chief bearing upon the testamentary act, or anything indicating coercion or lack of free agency on the part of decedent when she executed the will. Furthermore, one of contestant's own witnesses, Mrs. Hutchins, testified that decedent was a strong-willed woman.

Respondent's argument in support of the finding of undue influence is that Teel and decedent entered into a prenuptial agreement to make reciprocal wills, each naming the other as sole beneficiary, and that this shows that appellant married decedent for her money; that appellant "took decedent" to two other attorneys before their visit to Mr. Ricks; that he telephoned Mr. Ricks' office several times after the first visit to see if the papers were prepared; that he had in his possession necessary documents and made arrangements to furnish descriptions; that he discussed with Mr. Ricks and decedent the terms of the will and deeds; that he was present when the will was executed; that he took possession of the deeds after their execution; that there was a confidential relationship between Teel and decedent, and that Teel unduly profited under the will.

Even assuming the truth of the foregoing, it does no more than suggest motive and opportunity on the part of proponent, and completely fails to show pressure bearing directly upon the testamentary act or that testator's free agency was destroyed and proponent's will substituted for her own. Also, the evidence does not show that proponent "took" his wife to the other attorneys, but merely that the parties went together. Mr. Mitchell, one of these attorneys, who had previously transacted business for decedent, testified that in 1940 Mrs. Teel consulted him at least twice in reference to the disposition of her property; that Mr. Teel was probably present at one interview but that he did not participate in the conversation, and that on the other visit he talked to Mrs. Teel alone; that decedent told him that she had received a letter from her child demanding a share of the estate of the child's father, and that she asked if she was free to make such disposition of her property by will as she wished; and that he advised her that she was. Mr. Mitchell was apparently not asked to draw a will but merely to give advice as to what decedent could do. As to the visit to the office of Attorney Mace, there was no testimony that Teel took his wife to that office. Mr. Mace testified that she came there on November 1st with her husband and asked about making a will; that when he learned the nature of her business he took her into his private office, and that Teel did not participate in the conversation; that Mrs. Teel said she wanted to leave all to her husband, and that she was very emphatic that her daughter was to get nothing; that she said that she would think the matter over but did not return. These visits were prior to the visits to Attorney Ricks.

Respondent's argument that proponent unduly profited by decedent's will seems to be based upon a contention that decedent had more property than her husband and that, therefore, proponent, on her death, received more than decedent would have received had her husband predeceased her; but this does not make a case of unduly profiting under a will. Considered as a trade, it might have been a poor one, but upon Teel's death his wife would have received what little he may have owned, and after her death she had no use for either his or her own.

[7-9] A will cannot be set aside on the mere ground that it is unjust or unnatural. In re Estate of Martin, 170 Cal. 657, 663, 151 P. 138. An unnatural, unfair or unjust will creates of itself no presumption of incompetency or undue influence (In re Estate of Smith, 200 Cal. 152, 160, 252 P. 325; In re Estate of Putnam, 1 Cal.2d 162, 34 P.2d 148); nor is a will necessarily unnatural that favors a spouse over an adult daughter, especially where such child is self-supporting and is married with a husband living, and is not dependent upon her mother. In re Estate of Stone, 172 Cal. 215, 222, 155 P. 992. Opportunity even coupled with a motive alone will not sustain a finding of undue influence in the absence of evidence showing pressure operating directly upon the testamentary act (In re Estate of Kilborn, 162 Cal. 4, 11, 120 P. 762); and it cannot be presumed because a husband has opportunity and inducement to exert undue influence over his wife, that he has done so. In re Estate of Donovan, 140 Cal. 390, 73 P. 1081.

Without unduly prolonging a discussion of this phase of the case we are of the opinion that the very most that can be said of contestant's evidence of undue influence is that it showed opportunity and perhaps motive. Taking it in its aspect most favorable to contestant, and disregarding conflicting evidence, it does not show even general influence over the testator by proponent; and there was no evidence that his influence was brought to bear upon her testamentary act amounting to coercion destroying free agency on her part.

[10] Coming now to the evidence adduced on behalf of contestant relating to the mental capacity of the testatrix at the time the will was executed, it is to be considered that "evidence as to mental condition before or after the execution of the will is important only in so far as it tends to show mental condition at the time of the execution of the will." In re Estate of Perkins, 195 Cal. 699, 703, 235 P. 45, 46; In re Estate of Sexton, 199 Cal. 759, 765, 251 P. 778. Also that the validity of wills of admittedly insane persons has been upheld where said wills were executed during lucid intervals. In re Estate of Fisher, 202 Cal. 205, 212, 259 P. 755; In re Estate of De Graaf, 34 Cal.App.2d 120, 93 P.2d 199; In re Estate of Young, 38 Cal.App.2d 588, 101 P.2d 770; In re Estate of Worrall, 53 Cal.App.2d 243, 246, 127 P.2d 593; 26 Cal. Jur. 634.

But taking the testimony adduced by contestant in its aspect most favorable to her, it is as follows:

Mrs. Hattie Hutchins (formerly Mrs. Colby), who from 1938 to 1939 lived on a portion of the property belonging to and next door to decedent, testified that decedent secured the execution of deeds that vested the title to the property occupied by the Colbys in Mr. and Mrs. Colby and herself as joint tenants, and that she put $2,500 in a joint bank account in her name and that of Mrs. Colby, so that the Colbys might build a house upon the property; that after Mr. Colby died the relations between her and decedent were not very friendly; that the witness found four flat tires on her car, broken red lights, damaged padlocks with solder poured in them, and that decedent girdled walnut trees on the lot so they would die; that in July, 1939, witness quitclaimed the property back to decedent and received $500. That during the time she lived next to decedent at times she firmly believed that she was mentally unbalanced; that she based this opinion on her actions, her looks and the things she did; that at times she had a peculiar look; that at one time decedent told her she had planted a hedge so a neighbor could not see her, and later trimmed it off so she could see; that she would tell one neighbor he could have feed for his cows, and in a day or two let another neighbor have it; that decedent tried to run one's life and wanted you to do absolutely what she wanted; that probably eight times she mentioned suicide, giving no reason except that once she said she felt "ornery"; that in 1938 or 1939 decedent said she thought she would see a doctor and have the wheels taken out of her head; that she mentioned leaving her daughter a ranch around Fruitland; that she didn't seem to want to leave her daughter and granddaughter any property; that she did not show peculiarities at all times; that she was "a very peculiar woman"; that they were not good friends at the time the witness left.

George Baham, brother of Mrs. Colby, testified to receiving a postal card from decedent in December, 1939, requesting him to have a deed from Mrs. Colby recorded when it had already been recorded; also a letter dated January 2nd in which decedent said she wanted Mrs. Colby to give her a quitclaim deed, though such a deed had already been given; that the letter meant "Just confusion; I don't know nothing else"; also a letter by testator dated February 19th regarding the same matter. (From this correspondence it appeared that decedent was worried because she had executed a deed of the same property to one Stevenson without getting a deed from Mrs. Colby, though the Colby deed had been executed.) This witness saw Mrs. Teel the day before she died, and testified also to events after her death concerning Teel's actions and two notes left by decedent. He had known decedent three and one-half years. When asked regarding her mental condition he answered: "I would say she was most peculiar"; "she would do something and then wish she hadn't done it and things of that kind, confusion."

Mrs. Gertrude Lewis, clerk in a dry goods store, testified that Mrs. Teel, three or four days before her suicide, bought a nightgown, saying she wanted a "real nice one" because "I won't use it but the once."

Mrs. Lola Lutman testified that after Mrs. Teel's death she found a letter from decedent in the mail box which they used jointly, which note read: "John is swell, don't think badly of him, he is a dear. Say nothing of this to John and use it just for yourself and Bud"; that the envelope contained $20, also a birthday card (witness was to have a birthday December 21st); that there was another envelope in the mail box addressed to Mrs. Carpenter containing about $65, which she saw Mr. Teel give to Carpenter that evening; that she found a note from decedent for Mr. Teel in a drawer in the kitchen where they kept writing material; that she did not read it but heard Teel read it; that in the letter testator spoke about money matters, said she was sorry they could not agree on money matters, but that nothing she could say would change his mind about money matters as he would say and always think he had to work; that there was something about how much she loved him and was sorry they couldn't be happy together. She also testified that Mrs. Teel had told her she wanted Teel to quit work, and that they could travel; that she had known Mrs. Teel for thirty years, lived near her for eighteen years, and the last eight years was with her a great deal.

Estelle Gaskill, contestant's daughter, fifteen years of age, said that Mrs. Teel, one day of a rodeo at Fortuna, offered her money to go to the rodeo, saying that she could not go as John was not able to go. Witness identified a card later received from Mrs. Teel saying they had her ticket and a new handkerchief for her but that she did not come to see them again before the rodeo. She also testified that she received a card from decedent on her birthday, November 27, 1940.

Mrs. Gaskill, Estelle's grandmother, testified that the day of the rodeo she had gone with Estelle to the Teel home and decedent had offered her [not Estelle] the money for Estelle's rodeo ticket.

Roy Brown, former business partner of Mr. Friend for six or seven years many years earlier, testified that in 1921 or 1922 he pulled Mrs. Friend out of the river; that he did not see her jump in; that he had previously heard her make remarks about committing suicide, but not since; that he saw her off and on after that. When asked as to her mental state, he said: "Why I consider she was badly unbalanced the first time I seen her and last act she did on earth"; that she once wanted him to go up and take a piece of their property, saying she would "fix up so I got it"; that she looked like she had "faded away in the last few years." On cross-examination he stated that he lived on the Gaskill place; that he once tried to sell decedent some fruit in 1940, after her marriage. Asked if in his opinion Mrs. Teel was insane he said: "Well she was not exactly insane, no, but she was daggone badly off balance * * * weakminded * * * would only carry one friend at a time"; that she did Andy's (Friend's) business; that he considered her unbalanced because she once bought a cow for $150 (in 1920, 1921 or 1922) that "had wonderful papers tied to her, but she was old, real old and she was not worth 25¢"; that he sold the cow and when he and Friend quit Mrs. Friend "soaked" him $75; that she bought a heifer for $80 that was only good for the butcher as its teats were grown together; that he had had no transactions with her since that time and based his opinions on transactions during 1920-1922 and her suicide. He said: "I considered her very queer * * * as long as I could keep her friendship she was all right, but she would turn her back on you * * * as long as she was your friend she would give you anything she had"; that when friendship ceased "she would get your goat if she could." (A motion to strike this testimony as too remote was denied.)

Mr. Teel, called under section 2055 of the Code of Civil Procedure, testified that he could not find the note left by his wife, but that it read: "Johnny, you will find the house clean and beds clean; go get you a pal. I am sorry, Rena."

George Friend, a brother of Andrew Friend, 85 years old, said he saw decedent quite often before his brother's death but that he did not see her very often after Andrew died; that his brother was blind for twenty years. As to what in his opinion decedent's mental condition was, he said: "Well it was rather bad"; "I would call her very peculiar." His reason was that "at times she would be very friendly and treat me nicely and other times she would be very cool for no cause as I could see. Sometimes she would jump in and get me a nice cup of coffee as soon as I went and other times she wouldn't give me anything to eat all day. I would call that peculiarities, wouldn't you?" He said that after his brother died he saw decedent about once a year—half a dozen times; that when he saw her about three years ago she was very pleasant; that he saw her just before she married Teel and she was pleasant then.

Rilma Gaskill, contestant, testified that as a girl she always had old-fashioned clothes, a little hat, etc., and boy's shoes; that the kids made fun of her; that she married in 1923 at the age of twenty-three, then taught school for two years, living at the Gaskill Ranch; that she left Humboldt County in 1925 and went to Oakland; that she had worked the last few years and that her husband was employed all the time; that her parents gave her some land on the Klamath River (238 acres); also lots in the Santa Clara tract at Eureka, which she finally sold for $400 or $500; that she sent money to her parents to make up a sum loaned to her Uncle George, at which time she and her husband put up $915; that they got back $1,200; that since living in Oakland she had gone to Humboldt County every vacation and paid visits to her parents when they were there; that her mother corresponded with her and her daughter and sent them Christmas and birthday cards, gifts, etc. Asked as to her mother's mental competency about the time the will was executed, she said: "I know that her mental condition was bad." The reasons given by her for believing her mother's mind was not right were: "She married Mr. Teel and she committed suicide after she had been married to him for five months. Some time before she was married to him she had written to me and asked me if it was all right if she gave the property there at Hydesville, the entire property to my daughter and asked if it would be all right if she would give it to her instead of to me. * * * She committed suicide and took the dog with her. * * * I was on the property when she attempted, or made her suicide attempt that Mr. Brown spoke about the other day. I was there when he brought her back to the house from the river and heard her say at other times that she guessed she would commit suicide. She was always complaining about pains in her head; she couldn't think straight. She feared that she had some incurable disease. She told me the last time I saw her before she passed away that she was sure she had some kind of a growth and she suffered all the time. She had low blood pressure, she doctored for that; * * * she wrote me that she couldn't think straight; * * * that was in 1934." (Here witness exhibited letters and postal cards from mother to daughter and granddaughter, sending love, etc. Some of these were sent on birthdays or other holiday occasions—one was sent to the granddaughter on her graduation from junior high school in 1940.) She stated she had discussed with her mother her marriage to Teel but had not objected; that at that time she mentioned property that had been her father's individual property—the Fruitland property; that she just asked her mother about Dad's property and if she intended to do anything about Dad's individual part of the property before she married; that her mother replied that there wasn't anything. She did not definitely recall that she ever assisted in the care of her father's and mother's business after she left home. She said that her mother had been peculiar back to some of her earliest recollections; that when she was a small child her mother would insist upon her giving food that was in a spoiled condition to her uncle; that she would buy clothing, hang it up in the closet and perhaps never wear it and perhaps later tear it up for rags; that about 1927 or 1928 she took a fancy to being an equestrian, and bought a saddle horse but didn't keep it very long and disposed of it; that she was always melancholy and mournful and couldn't understand why she couldn't be like other people; that she was not always melancholy; that she would be cheerful in the morning and in the afternoon would be moody and complain of pains; that she doctored all the time and was not able to do her work all the time. Other reasons for believing that her mother's mind was not right were that the last thing she did was to commit suicide with the dog; that she made a will disposing of her property to someone that was apparently more or less of a stranger to the family, while at the same time her letters and cards indicated loving and wanting to do things for her own family.

Rex Musser, a mortician at Fortuna, testified for contestant that when Andrew Friend died Mrs. Friend made arrangements for the funeral; that she was to bring Mr. Friend's clothing down, but instead she brought a dress.

Decedent's physician Dr. Kramer, called by contestant, testified that he had known decedent about seven years; that she had consulted him after her marriage; that she had low blood pressure and a cancer phobia (fear of cancer), but that he found no organic disease; that he last saw her in August, 1940; that he saw no evidence of insanity and, with the possible exception of that phobia, her mind seemed to be perfectly clear at all times; that in his talks with her he found nothing to indicate insanity. He did testify that the commission of suicide is not a normal act; also he was asked a hypothetical question as follows:

"What would your opinion of a person be who in 1922 threw herself into a river and attempted suicide—in an attempt to commit suicide and was pulled out and who thereafter at least six or seven times threatened to commit suicide, did commit suicide in December 2nd of 1940, that prior thereto, a month or two or two months, the time is a little indefinite, told her husband that she would or might commit suicide, a woman who at one time purchased a high priced animal for $175.00 and then disposed of it for a little or nothing, had to get rid of it, who at time three or four years, in 1937 or 1938 was in a business transaction, a transaction completely closed and the deeds had been drawn up and delivered and after all this was done she wrote a letter in which she stated that she wanted these quit-claim deeds to be made out and placed on record, when it already had been done; a woman that complained about her head, laid down a great deal, complained that she was not able to do her work; a woman that in drawing up her will left her property to a man she had been married four months to, cut out completely her only child, only daughter; who complained a great deal of headaches, she had low blood pressure, would you say a person that had such characteristics, whether or not * * * she was of sound or unsound mind?" and his answer was: "I would strongly suspect she was of unsound mind if all those facts were true."

However, some of the things upon which contestant's witnesses based their beliefs are explained.

The letter wherein testatrix told her daughter she couldn't think straight was introduced in evidence. It was as follows:

"Dearest kids—Just rec'd Stanleys very nice letter—many thanks—also yours, Rilma—and last & least—the check. The mtge is $3,652.50. ¼ is 913.12. You sent $750. That leaves $163.12. Plus corset money, 1.35 is $164.47. So take what is over on your check of $165. out of the tax money. Better keep it ¼ on everything. Taxes were $13.44 on one piece & $82.15 on the other. Total $95.59. ¼ is $23.89. Just think, there is nearly $75. interest already. The mtge from Sept. 5th & taxes from Nov. 14th. Keep these dates. Now Rilma if I make any mistakes in the figures, tell me, please, for my old head hurts & does not think good nor quick & I can not see good and am very liable to get something wrong. I do not mean to, so if I do, you come right back, right then. Don't hesitate, hear?

"I had a little lamp for the radio—one from the 10¢ store—the green one is real small on the bottom & the shade large, so your dad would likely tip it over. I will have a wire run thru the ceiling—should have been done before—& put it in the living room. It is too tall to go on the sideboard under the cupboards.

"Did I tell you we have a big Belgian shepherd dog? His name is King. Not cross but a good watch dog. Tell Estelle he brings in wood, brings our slippers and does all sorts of tricks even to bringing his pan in when you tell him. He is an old dear & thinks the world of us—will not go outside the yard unless I do. He is such an old mutt for us that he frets whenever he can not be right with us, guess I'll have to stay at camp next summer, so he can be with us.

"No there has not been much snow in the hill & only a few light frost here.

"I'll go now so the stage will get this today. Lots of love to all of you. Write often, come again, Stanley.

"Ma F."

Plainly it refers to the loan made by Mr. and Mrs. Friend and Mrs. Gaskill to the latter's uncle, to which she referred in her testimony. This letter refutes any inference of unsound mind and shows, on the contrary, that Mrs. Friend was attending to the business of the loan, and that she wanted to be entirely fair with her daughter and have the transaction fully understood by her.

The testimony of Musser, the mortician, about decedent's bringing a dress instead of her deceased husband's clothes was explained by Mrs. Lola Lutman, who, on that occasion, accompanied Mrs. Friend to the undertaker's. She testified that this incident occurred in connection with the funeral of Mr. Colby and not that of Mr. Friend; that Mrs. Colby asked Mrs. Friend to take clothes to the undertaker and gave them to her in a box; that Mrs. Friend had with her another box containing a dress she was taking to the cleaner, and by inadvertence gave the wrong box to Musser; that he immediately discovered the error and the boxes were exchanged.

Regarding the testimony of Mrs. Colby that she found her tires punctured, etc., it is to be noted that she did not testify that Mrs. Friend punctured her tires; she only intimated that she had done so.

[11-14] Much of the foregoing testimony of contestant's witnesses was remote in time, and little of it bore directly upon the time this will was executed or a period immediately before or after said date. On the other hand witnesses who had had almost daily contact with decedent up to the time of her death (including Mrs. Lola Lutman) uniformly testified to her soundness of mind and business ability. While it is true that testatrix committed suicide, the court said in Re Estate of Chevallier, 159 Cal. 161, 113 P. 130, 134, where it was held that the evidence fell far short of showing unsoundness of mind of the testator, that "The fact that the testator is a suicide may be given in evidence as tending to establish insanity, but there must be much more than the mere fact of suicide to show that the insanity was so complete as to destroy testamentary capacity, or that it was of such a nature as to have exercised a direct influence and bearing upon the testamentary act." Also see In re Estate of Dolbeer, 149 Cal. 227, 86 P. 695, 9 Ann.Cas. 795; In re Estate of Muller, 14 Cal.App.2d 129, 57 P.2d 994; In re Estate of Little, 46 Cal.App. 776, 189 P. 818. The testimony of contestant's witnesses also furnishes little or no ground for holding that testatrix was of unsound mind. The opinion of a lay witness as to mental capacity of a testatrix has no greater probative value than the facts given by him as the basis of his conclusions (In re Estate of Short, 7 Cal.App.2d 512, 47 P.2d 555; In re Estate of Sexton, 199 Cal. 759, 251 P. 778; In re Estate of Nolan, 25 Cal.App.2d 738, 78 P.2d 456), and the facts given by contestant's witnesses as the bases of their opinions are insufficient to show more than peculiarities of testatrix; and testamentary capacity cannot be destroyed by showing a few isolated acts, foibles, idiosyncrasies or mental departures from the normal unless they bear directly upon and have influenced the testamentary act. In re Estate of Wright, 7 Cal.2d 348, 60 P.2d 434. As to the answer of Dr. Kramer to the hypothetical question asked him, the court said in Re Estate of Collins, 174 Cal. 663, 164 P. 1110, 1113, that such testimony, based on a question "skilfully framed to call for an answer favorable to the party in whose behalf it is asked", is testimony the weakest and most unsatisfactory. Citing In re Estate of Dolbeer, 149 Cal. 227, 243, 86 P. 695, 9 Ann.Cas. 795.

[15, 16] It is well established that testamentary capacity is always presumed and that the burden is always upon a contestant to show affirmatively and by a preponderance of the evidence that the testator was of unsound mind at the time of the execution of the will. In re Estate of Perkins, 195 Cal. 699, 235 P. 45; In re Estate of Peterkin, 23 Cal.App.2d 597, 73 P.2d 897; In re Estate of Short, 7 Cal.App.2d 512, 47 P.2d 555; In re Estate of McDonnell, 109 Cal.App. 577, 293 P. 651; In re Estate of Garvey, 38 Cal.App.2d 449, 101 P.2d 551; In re Estate of Little, 46 Cal.App. 776, 189 P. 818. And a testator is of sound and disposing mind and memory if at the time of making his will he has sufficient mental capacity to be able to understand the nature of the act he is doing and to understand and recall the nature and situation of his property, and to remember and understand his relation to the persons who have claims on his bounty and whose interests are affected by the provisions of the instrument. In re Estate of Arnold, 16 Cal.2d 573, 107 P.2d 25, In re Estate of Finkler, 3 Cal.2d 584, 46 P.2d 149; In re Estate of Peterkin, 23 Cal.App.2d 597, 73 P.2d 897.

[17] Incompetency or unsoundness of mind sufficient to avoid a testamentary act must be either insanity of such a broad character as to establish mental incompetency generally, or some specific and narrower form of insanity under which the testator is the victim of some hallucination or delusion, and as to the latter the evidence must establish that the will itself was the creature or product of such hallucination or delusion and that it influenced the creation and terms of the will. In re Estate of Perkins, 195 Cal. 699, 235 P. 45; In re Estate of Wright, 7 Cal.2d 348, 60 P.2d 434; In re Estate of Collins, 174 Cal. 663, 164 P. 1110; In re Estate of Peterkin, 23 Cal.App.2d 597, 73 P.2d 897; In re Estate of Chevallier, 159 Cal. 161, 113 P. 130.

Cases in which evidence more abundant than in the case before us was held to be insufficient to show incompetency are: In re Estate of Little, 46 Cal.App. 776, 189 P. 818 (where the testator had often threatened suicide and did commit suicide about thirty days after executing his will); In re Estate of Collins, 174 Cal. 663, 164 P. 1110 (where testatrix had paralysis, and evidenced idiosyncrasies, pecularities, and weakness); In re Estate of Hopkins, 136 Cal.App. 590, 29 P.2d 249 (where testator had a cancer phobia, was affected with melancholia, and may have committed suicide); In re Estate of Wright, 7 Cal.2d 348, 60 P.2d 434 (where testator drank to excess, picked up articles from garbage cans, pinned paper flowers on shrubs, and gave a friend a fish which he had soaked in kerosene); In re Estate of Peterkin, 23 Cal.App.2d 597, 73 P.2d 897 (where testator threatened suicide, had progressive senile dementia, was given to fits of rage, and exhibited peculiarities); In re Estate of Arnold, 16 Cal.2d 573, 107 P.2d 25 (where testator had chronic alcoholism, had suffered several attacks of delirium tremens, was irrational and suffered from several diseases); In re Redfield's Estate, 116 Cal. 637, 48 P. 794 (where testatrix had delusions and irrational fears, and there was insanity in the family); In re Estate of Sexton, 199 Cal. 759, 251 P. 778 (where testatrix suffered from arteriosclerosis, had several paralytic strokes—cerebral hemorrhages); In re Estate of Perkins, 195 Cal. 699, 235 P. 45 (where decedent had hallucinations, loss of memory, and suffered from chronic Bright's disease); In re Estate of Nolan, 25 Cal.App.2d 738, 78 P.2d 456 (where testator suffered lapses of memory, fainting spells, and had had a severe head injury); In re Estate of Chevallier, 159 Cal. 161, 113 P. 130 (where testatrix committed suicide); and In re Estate of Putman, 1 Cal.2d 162, 34 P.2d 148 (where testator was about 80 years old, used liquor habitually, and had arteriosclerosis).

The judgment is reversed and the trial court is directed to admit the will to probate.

PEEK, J., concurs.

THOMPSON, Justice (dissenting).

I dissent. It is my opinion the record contains an abundance of evidence to sustain the verdict of the jury and the judgment of the court to the effect that the will of Irene L. Teel is void for lack of testamentary capacity and on account of the undue influence of John L. Teel. I am in accord with the principles of law announced in the majority opinion. But I believe they do not fit the facts of this case. It is not the province of a reviewing court to weigh the evidence or to pass upon the credibility of witnesses in a will contest. The findings of a jury are entitled to just as much credence in a will contest as in any other civil action. It is the uniform rule in this class of cases that when a reviewing court has ascertained that there is substantial evidence to support the essential findings of a jury, its province is exhausted and a judgment in accordance therewith must be affirmed, regardless of the presence of conflicting testimony. In re Estate of Barr, 69 Cal. App. 16, 230 P. 181; In re Estate of Hansen, 38 Cal.App.2d 99, 100 P.2d 776; 26 Cal.Jur. 1101, § 356.

In the present case a unanimous verdict of the jury determined that the will was the product of an unsound mind and of the undue influence of Mr. Teel. The trial judge denied the proponent's motions for a directed verdict, a judgment notwithstanding the verdict and a motion for new trial. A careful reading of the record convinces me that the testatrix was of unsound mind; that she lacked testamentary capacity; and that her will was the product of the undue influence of John L. Teel. To my mind the evidence in this case adequately meets the requirements of even a strained construction of the law with respect to the issues involved.

We are confronted with the fact that the testatrix actually took the lives of herself and her pet dog in a tragic suicide within eighteen days from the time when she executed her will. By the terms of that will she disinherited her only living child by a former husband. That tragedy was the fulfillment of a suicidal mania which she possessed for many years. Some seventeen years previously she attempted to commit suicide by jumping into a river. Several witnesses testified to numerous threats to take her own life. She appears to have had the symptoms of paranoia, which is a fixed and progressive type of insanity. She had delusions, habitual melancholy, violent headaches and uncontrollable animosities against those who were her best friends; she had weird fancies, eccentricities in dress and in her conduct toward other persons, and she possessed a fixed suicidal mania.

Mrs. Teel was despondent and she often complained of severe headaches. She said she was unable to think or act reasonably. She implied that her mind was deranged when she once said she intended to go to a physician and have the wheels taken out of her head. She had a fixed delusion that she was afflicted with a cancer of the stomach. Her own physician testified that she possessed a "cancer phobia". After he examined her and took X-ray pictures and informed her that she had neither tumors nor a cancer and that she did not have any other stomach ailment, she did not appear to believe his statement. The delusion still remained. Her physician, Doctor Kramer, was the only medical expert who testified regarding her mental capacity. He had known her for about seven years. She consulted him four years before her death about her fancied stomach trouble. He was unable to disabuse her mind of that delusion of the presence of a cancer. He saw her in July prior to her death, and said she then appeared quite a bit older and emaciated. Although she was very slender she had lost considerable weight. He said she was generally melancholy. While he did say, "I saw no evidence of insanity", in response to the question as to whether her mind seemed clear, he replied, "With the possible exception of that [cancer] phobia." When he was asked if he considered suicide to be a normal act, he replied, "It certainly is an abnormal act." Finally in response to a very fair hypothetical question including the strange conduct and characteristics of Mrs. Teel, and her final act of suicide, when asked if he would consider such a person to be of sound mind, he replied, "I would strongly suspect she was of unsound mind."

Among a number of strange incidents which appear in evidence, a business transaction which Mrs. Teel had with a neighbor regarding the joint ownership of a home indicates that she had no real appreciation of the transaction or the ownership of the property. When her first husband, Andrew J. Friend, the father of Mrs. Teel's only living child, the contestant, died in 1936, and the proprietor of the mortuary where his body lay requested her to provide appropriate clothing for the burial she brought a box containing a dress.

It is not the province of the reviewing court to attempt to explain these numerous irrational and eccentric acts and statements of the testatrix on the theory that she must have been sane. That was the exclusive province of the jury. On appeal the tables are turned. If these acts and her conduct may reasonably be said to support the findings of the jury, then their conclusions should be upheld.

On the subject of undue influence it appears that the proponent, John E. Teel, married the testatrix June 29, 1940, five months after the death of his first wife. April 20, 1939, the testatrix executed a declaration of trust conveying to John E. Teel, as trustee, all of the property she possessed, including a $1,000 bond and real property valued at about $24,000, giving him absolute power to sell, lease, mortgage or hypothecate any and all of said property without her approval or consent. Prior to their marriage Mr. Teel and the testatrix agreed to execute mutual wills devising and bequeathing to each other all of their property. The value of his property was only about $1,000. After their marriage the spouses went together and consulted two different lawyers with the object of procuring the mutual wills and joint tenancy deeds to her real property. For some reason, these attorneys did not draw those instruments. November 7, 1940, they visited together the office of H. L. Ricks, an attorney at law in Eureka, for the same purpose of executing the mutual wills and the joint tenancy deeds. In several interviews with Ricks both of the spouses were present and both participated in the discussions. Mrs. Teel declared her intention to disinherit her daughter, but gave no satisfactory reason therefor. Ricks tried to persuade her that was unjust and wrong. They left but subsequently returned to his office and he drew three joint tenancy deeds to all of her real property, and the mutual wills. The wills were executed November 14, 1940, and the deeds on November 19th. By the terms of her will the testatrix devised and bequeathed all of her property to her husband, and in the event of his death to his son Roy Teel, with whom she was only slightly acquainted. John E. Teel was named as executor without bond, and in case of his death his son Roy was to act as executor without bond. Her daughter, Rilma K. Gaskill, the contestant, is not mentioned in the will. There is evidence that the bulk of the estate of testatrix consisted of community property acquired while she lived with her first husband, who was the father of the contestant. There is also evidence that Mrs. Gaskill was always very considerate of her mother, and that no sufficient reason for her disinheritance existed. The wills were left in the possession of the attorney, but John E. Teel returned several times and took possession of the deeds and other instruments and recorded them.

There is ample evidence of Mr. Teel's activity in procuring the execution of the will and the other documents. He unduly profited by the transaction. He was always present when they visited the lawyers to procure the execution of the documents. He took part in the conversations. A confidential relationship existed between the spouses.

Under the circumstances of this case the jury was warranted in assuming that the will was unnatural, since the testatrix disinherited her only living daughter by her first husband with whom she had been on good terms, without even mentioning her in the will. While it is true that one has a legal right to make an unnatural will, or even to disinherit those who would ordinarily be entitled to his bounty, where the question of testamentary capacity and undue influence are involved, such injustice and unnatural terms of the will may become persuasive evidence of the invalidity of the will. In re Estate of Johnson, 72 Cal.App. 663, 237 P. 816; 26 Cal.Jur. 633, § 7. In the text last cited it is said in that regard: "When accompanied by the fact that the provisions of the will are 'unnatural', evidence tending to show that the deceased was suffering from mental derangement or disorder will require a rejection of the propounded instrument."

The testimony of the attorney who drew the will or of the witnesses to a will with respect to the mental capacity of the testatrix is entitled to weight, but it is not controlling on that issue. In re Estate of Hansen, 38 Cal.App.2d 99, 100 P.2d 776; In re Estate of Pessagno, 58 Cal.App.2d 390, 136 P.2d 644. In the last mentioned cases judgments denying probate to the wills on the grounds of undue influence and unsound mind were affirmed on appeal. Hearings by the Supreme Court were denied. The present case appears to me to be much more conclusive than the previously cited cases of the fact that the testatrix was afflicted with settled insanity, and that she did not possess testamentary capacity. The case of In re Estate of Bucher, 48 Cal.App.2d 465, 120 P.2d 44, involved the questions of unsound mind as a result of habitual intoxication, and undue influence. After a verdict had been rendered in favor of the contestant the trial court rendered judgment notwithstanding the verdict, and admitted the will to probate. On appeal that judgment was reversed. The Supreme Court denied a hearing. That case is enlightening on the issues which are involved in this case on the subject of the province of a reviewing court to weigh the evidence and reverse the findings of a jury. It also announces the well established rule that the contestant is entitled to the benefit of all evidence adduced and of "all inferences which may legitimately be derived by the jury from the facts as established." 28 R.C.L. § 97.

While it is true that evidence of an unsound mind or of undue influence which will warrant the refusal to admit a will to probate on those grounds must be shown to have actually affected the execution of the instrument, it is not necessary to establish that result from direct evidence. They may be shown by circumstances which naturally lead to that conclusion. The contestant in this case is entitled to the full force of all the evidence adduced in support of the findings of the jury and the judgment of the court, including every natural inference which may be drawn therefrom.

I am persuaded there is ample evidence in this record to support the findings of the jury and the judgment of the court, and that the judgment should therefore be affirmed.

Pen. Code, § 1111.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County.

Delphine Slattery was convicted of forgery of fictitious name, and she appeals.

Affirmed.

Robert E. Ford, of Hollywood, for appellant.

Robert W. Kenny, Atty. Gen., and Alberta Belford, Deputy Atty. Gen., for respondent.

PARKER WOOD, Justice.

Defendant Slattery and one Charles Peck were accused jointly, in two counts, of the crime of forgery of fictitious name. In a trial without a jury they were convicted. Defendant Slattery was granted probation upon condition that she pay a fine of $200. She appeals from the order denying her motion for a new trial.

Appellant asserts that the evidence was insufficient to support the judgment because there was no evidence, other than the testimony of her co-defendant Peck, an admitted accomplice, that the checks were fictitious or that she knew they were fictitious.

On July 7, 1942, appellant, a guest registered as H. L. Hunt at the Beverly-Wilshire Hotel, made a purchase at the W. & J. Sloane Furniture Company and delivered to that company a check in the sum of $30 drawn on a bank in Fresno, dated July 7, 1942, payable to H. L. Hunt, and bearing the name Geo. McCormick as drawer. She wrote the name "H. L. Hunt" on the back of the check. The difference between the purchase price, approximately $7, and the amount of the check was paid to her in cash by the furniture company.

On July 12, 1942, appellant delivered to the Beverly-Wilshire Hotel, in payment of her hotel bill of approximately $20, a check in the sum of $65, drawn on the same bank in Fresno, dated July 12, 1942, payable to H. L. Hunt, and bearing the same name as drawer. She wrote the name "H. L. Hunt" on the back of the check. The difference between the amounts of her bill and the check was paid to her in cash by the hotel.

There was no account in the Fresno bank in the name of Geo. McCormick, and there was no credit arrangement by which the bank would honor checks drawn under the name of Geo. McCormick. The checks were not paid by the bank and were returned to the payees. It was stipulated that "the bank manager's knowledge of the people in and surrounding Fresno County did not include a George McCormick." It was stipulated further that a handwriting expert would testify that the handwriting on the fronts of the two checks was identical with an exemplar of Peck's handwriting, and that Peck wrote the two checks. Peck had been convicted previously of grand theft as a result of borrowing money and giving as security therefor the furniture of appellant upon which there was a mortgage. Appellant was accused and tried jointly with him, but was acquitted.

Appellant told the assistant manager of the Beverly-Wilshire Hotel, when she delivered the check to him for approval as she was checking out of the hotel about 8:30 p. m. on July 12, 1942, that she knew George McCormick, that she had had checks from him before and the check was "perfectly all right"; that she had to leave hurriedly because she had just received word that her father was very ill in Santa Monica and she was rushing there to be with him. When she made that statement she knew that her father had been dead two years.

A police officer testified that appellant told him, when Peck was not present, that Peck and a man whom he introduced to her as George McCormick, a millionaire, were in her hotel room betting on horse races, and Peck gave her the checks to cash. He testified further that Peck told him, in the presence of appellant, that Peck had written the checks at the suggestion of appellant; that she told him to make them in the name of H. L. Hunt and sign the name "George McCormick"; that she told Peck the checks were to be given to bookmakers; that appellant and Peck were the only ones present in her hotel room when Peck wrote the checks and gave them to her; that he (the officer) then asked her to tell what part she took in passing the checks, and she said she had never seen Peck write a check and that she had been advised by her counsel not to discuss anything.

When she was arrested on August 14, 1942, she was at the railroad station preparatory to leaving for the East. Approximately two weeks before the trial she repaid the money she received upon the checks.

Appellant testified in substance as follows: She used the name, Mrs. H. L. Hunt, at the hotel because she had been there under that name about twelve years ago when she was married to H. L. Hunt. At other places she was known under the names of Lovejoy, Smith, Davenport, and Slattery. On July 7, 1942, she saw Peck in the hotel lobby with a man whom he introduced to her as George McCormick, a very wealthy man from San Francisco. Peck asked if she knew where they could get a bookmaker and, when she said she did not know, he asked if they could use the telephone in her room. She took them to her room, remained there about 5 minutes, and left them in her room while she went to a beauty parlor. She returned to her room within ½ hour and, as she entered her room, Peck had a check for $30 in his hand, told her they were going to play the races and asked if she would cash a check for McCormick at Sloane's when she made a purchase there. McCormick apologized for being short of money, but said the check was all right, and then she went to Sloane's, made a purchase and cashed the check. She returned about 11 a. m. and handed the money to McCormick. She saw Peck and McCormick again on July 12, 1942, in the hotel lobby and she permitted them to use her telephone again, but she remained away from her room. When she returned to her room they said they had been playing the races and that McCormick had lost considerable money. McCormick asked her if she could get a check cashed for him and she took the check for $65, went to the lobby, did not cash the check, returned and handed $65 to him from her own money. She left them again in her room, went to the lobby again, and when she returned they had gone. She cashed the $65 check at the hotel about 8:30 o'clock that evening and then left the hotel. She registered as Delphine Slattery at an apartment house that night, and the next day she registered at the Miramar Hotel under the name of Davenport. She left the Beverly-Wilshire Hotel to get away from Peck who had been bothering her by asking her to "raise money for him." He had also "hounded" her for money when she was at the Huntington Hotel. She had tried to help him several times by raising money for him when he was in trouble. When she was living at the Beverly Hills Hotel (not Beverly-Wilshire) prior to cashing the two checks above mentioned, she cashed a check for $35 at that hotel on July 5, 1942, drawn on a bank at Santa Barbara, payable to "L. H. Hunt" (not H. L.) and signed "Albert McKay," which check Peck gave to her as her winnings from a bet on a horse race. The hotel owner did not notify her the check came back. The night she left the Beverly-Wilshire Hotel, after cashing the $65 check, she and Peck left in a taxicab, stopped in front of the Beverly Hills Hotel, and Peck went in and paid to the hotel the $35 which it had paid to appellant when she cashed the "Albert McKay" check. She became acquainted with Peck about 2 years previously when she obtained race information from him. She knew when she cashed the checks that he was a race track tout.

Peck testified in substance as follows: He had known appellant 4 years. On July 7, 1942, he was with her in her room at the Beverly-Wilshire Hotel and she had a book of blank checks from the Fresno bank. She said she wanted to go East to see her daughter who was about to give birth to a child and that, although she could get the money for the trip by a loan on her furniture, she wanted Peck to write a check on the Fresno bank in order that she might show the out-of-town check to a bookmaker and thereby obtain credit to make a bet on the races. She said she would not cash the check. He wrote the check for $30 and left. He saw her again on July 12th at the hotel, although he had been trying to avoid her. After she asked him to write another check on the Fresno bank for $65 in the name of George McCormick in order that she might show it to a bookmaker, he wrote the $65 check and left. There was no George McCormick and he did not know anyone by that name. His (Peck's) only income was what his children gave him. He also wrote the check for $35, signed "Albert McKay," which she cashed at the Beverly Hills Hotel. She lived at 15 of the finest hotels and used different names at those places.

[1] The testimony of Peck, the accomplice, shows the the checks were fictitious and that appellant knew they were fictitious. A conviction cannot be had, however, upon the testimony of an accomplice unless it be corroborated by such other evidence as shall tend to connect the defendant with the commission of the offense. Penal Code, sec. 1111. The evidence that there was no account in the bank in the name of Geo. McCormick and no arrangement for credit whereby the bank would honor checks drawn under that name was prima facie evidence that the name, Geo. McCormick, was fictitious. People v. Eppinger, 1894, 105 Cal. 36, 41, 38 P. 538; People v. Cohen, 1931, 113 Cal. App. 260, 262, 298 P. 240. The handwriting expert said Peck wrote the checks. In addition to the prima facie evidence, and the handwriting expert's evidence, of the fictitious character of the checks, there were circumstances other than those included in the testimony of the accomplice which showed appellant's consciousness of guilt. The name of the payee, H. L. Hunt, was not the name she regarded as her true name. At the time she cashed the $65 check she left the hotel hurriedly and stated falsely that she was leaving hurriedly to be with her very sick father. Then she went directly to the Beverly Hills Hotel and repaid to that hotel money she had received from it one week previously upon the Santa Barbara bank check, given to her by Peck, and which check she said she did not know had been dishonored. That same night she registered at an apartment house under the name of Slattery, and the next day she moved to another place and registered under the name of Davenport. She had several aliases.

There were further circumstances, other than those shown by Peck's testimony, from which the trial judge could draw inferences of appellant's culpability. She knew that Peck, who handed her the first check of the alleged McCormick with the request that she cash it at Sloane's, had no money, credit, or income, and was entirely unreliable financially, that he could not be relied upon for truth, that he was a race track tout all of the time she had known him, and a convicted felon as a result of obtaining money by false pretenses in a transaction in which she also was involved. He had always "hounded" her for money, and she had "raised" money for him several times when he was in trouble. She had known the alleged McCormick, who apologized for being short of money and who was then gambling in the races, only a few minutes before she accepted his check upon the recommendation of the unreliable Peck. She was anxious to obtain money in order to go East to see her daughter.

[2, 3] The evidence other than the testimony of the accomplice tended to connect the appellant with the commission of the offenses alleged, and included sufficient corroboration of the testimony of the accomplice that she knew the checks were fictitious. If the circumstances shown in evidence reasonably justify the finding of guilt by the trial court, a reviewing court is not warranted in disturbing the finding. People v. Newland, 1940, 15 Cal.2d 678, 681, 104 P.2d 778. The evidence was sufficient.

Appellant refers to a statement by the trial judge, made to Peck while Peck was testifying, as follows: "I haven't believed a word you have said today * * *", and asserts that such expression evinces a reasonable doubt as to the guilt of appellant. Preceding that statement the judge and witness had been discussing at some length (6 or 7 statements by each) what was said by another judge at the time he sentenced Peck on the grand theft conviction, and what the general behavior of Peck had been. The record as to what was said at the time of that sentence was before the trial judge in the present case. The following excerpt from the transcript herein shows the full statement that was made regarding disbelief and the statements immediately preceding and succeeding it:

"The court: Then it did amount to something. Well, that has been your means of livelihood ever since you were born, trying to trick somebody.

"The witness: Well, your Honor, I never tried to—

"The court: Well, of course, I don't know. I haven't believed a single word you have said today, so don't tell what you have been trying to do. You are on probation now?

"The witness: Yes.

"The court: With a San Quentin sentence over your head?

"The witness: I know it; I know it. * * * Well, I didn't get any money. She admitted she didn't give me any money. She said she gave it to a man by the name of McCormick, and there was no such McCormick in existence. There was no such man in existence. She says she gave him the money, your Honor; she says she gave the money to him. Then she says I introduced the friend. I never introduced him to anybody. I told the truth. She made me write out the checks that she was going to show to the bookmaker."

[4] The statement that the judge did not believe a single word that Peck had said should not be adopted literally in view of the fact that some of Peck's statements were unquestionably true—for example, that he had been convicted of grand theft, was on probation, and he knew appellant. Furthermore, it appears from the above excerpt that, after said statement by the court had been made, Peck gave testimony implicating appellant. It may be that the court believed some of the testimony given by Peck after that statement by the court. It is to be noted, however, that thereafter the court said, concerning the testimony of both Peck and appellant, as follows: "Well, each one of them has certainly been crossing the other. So I can't believe either one." The judgment of the trial court that appellant was guilty was in accord with its statement that it did not believe appellant, and that judgment was consistent with the statements of Peck implicating appellant. In view of the judgment as to appellant it may be the court changed its mind at least in some respects as to its belief in the statements of Peck, therefore it should not be concluded that the court did not believe some of Peck's testimony implicating appellant.

The case of People v. Hidalgo, 1933, 128 Cal.App. 703, 18 P.2d 391, cited by appellant, is distinguishable from the present case. In that case stolen blank checks bearing the printed name of a corporation were used in the alleged forgery. The corporation was a bona fide entity, but no qualified representative of the corporation testified as to who were authorized to sign as drawers of the checks, and it was not shown that the alleged forged checks were not drawn by persons authorized to draw them. In the present case a prima facie case was established by showing there was no account in the bank in the name of Geo. McCormick, and there were other circumstances from which the fictitious character of the checks could be inferred.

The order denying the motion for a new trial is affirmed.

Ex parte DE LEON.

Cr. 3712.

1. Habeas corpus 🔑83

On habeas corpus to secure custody of minor child, where petitioner's only attempt to controvert allegations in original and amended return was his request, acceded to by respondent, that petition should be deemed a traverse thereto, findings of superior court judge who was appointed as referee on allegations contained in original and amended return were established by petitioner's failure to deny them. Pen. Code, § 1484.

2. Habeas corpus 🔑90

On habeas corpus by father to secure custody of ten-year-old child from maternal grandmother, where District Court of Appeal appointed as referee the superior court judge who was about to determine grandmother's application for letters of guardianship, referee's findings as to care child was receiving in custody of grandmother, as to whether father was a fit or proper person to have child's custody, and as to child's preference between father and grandmother, were properly received.

3. Habeas corpus 🔑99(3)

On habeas corpus by father to secure custody of ten-year-old child from maternal grandmother, where mother was dead and child had always made her home with grandmother, District Court of Appeal would consider best interests of the child passing on father's application.

4. Parent and child 🔑2(4)

Evidence established that best interests of ten-year-old child would be served by permitting child to remain with her maternal grandmother with whom she had always lived, her mother being dead, instead of granting custody of child to father.

5. Habeas corpus 🔑25(2)

Where original letters of guardianship of ten-year-old child granted to maternal grandmother had been revoked by superior court on father's application, but appeal from such judgment was pending, and thereafter a subsequent judgment was entered by superior court again issuing letters of guardianship to grandmother, the action in superior court did not compel issuance of writ of habeas corpus awarding father custody of child. Probate Code, §§ 1406, 1440.

6. Parent and child 🔑2(2)

Since the adoption of the Probate Code in 1931, the father as such does not have right to custody of minor child, no matter what child's wishes or best interests may be. Probate Code, § 1406.

BISHOP, Justice pro tem.

By this proceeding, initiated by a petition for a writ of habeas corpus, the father of Tillie De Leon, a ten year old girl of Mexican parentage, born in California, seeks a coercive order of this court taking Tillie from her maternal grandmother and giving her into the custody of petitioner. We have concluded that the order sought should not be made.

Tillie first became the subject of court action in 1939 when her maternal grandmother was made guardian of her person. By a judgment entered on the eleventh day of March of this year, the 1939 letters of guardianship were revoked, upon the petition of Tillie's father. The judgment of revocation also provided that "the care, custody and control of said minor, Tillie De Leon is hereby awarded to Miguel De Leon, the father of said minor." An appeal was taken from this judgment by the grandmother, May 8. Before this, however, on April 20, 1943, she had filed a new petition that she be appointed Tillie's guardian. Two days later, April 22, a petition for a writ of habeas corpus was filed by Tillie's father with the clerk of the Supreme Court, and a writ was issued, returnable before this court.

Desirous of ascertaining certain facts deemed pertinent to the problems involved in the proceeding thus placed before us, we appointed the judge of the superior court who was about to conduct a hearing in order to determine whether or not to issue letters of guardianship to Tillie's grandmother, as a referee, so that the evidence which he was to take should serve both his purposes and ours. As a result of the hearing the superior court entered its judgment that Tillie's grandmother be appointed guardian of her person, and letters of guardianship were issued on the third day of June. The findings of fact, filed in the guardianship proceeding, are made the findings of the referee and as such forwarded to us, together with a transscript of the evidence taken at the hearing. We had these before us when this matter came on for hearing, June 11, and although opportunity was given no objection was made that the evidence was not sufficient to support the findings.

Looking to the findings, then, we discover that Tillie was born in April, 1933, in the home of her grandmother and that home is the only one she has ever known. (Her mother is dead.) Tillie's father has never contributed anything in excess of fifty dollars toward her support, nor has he at any time [since she was six or seven months old] visited or communicated with her during her lifetime, and he is not a fit or proper person to have her custody. From her grandmother, however, Tillie has received "excellent care, treatment, secular and religious training." It also was found that Tillie "is of sufficient age and mentality to form an intelligent preference between her father and [her grandmother]" and that during the last two months Tillie's physical and mental health has changed; "that she is now mentally and physically sick, and that such illness is due to fear, worry, and a dread that she might be separated from her grandmother."

[1] Petitioner objected to our receiving the referee's report and the transcript of evidence, not because of any irregularity in their procurement, but on the broad basis that the matters there gone into were not problems for us to weigh and determine, because they were not within the issues. Petitioner's objection has a better foundation than he suspects. The grandmother, to whom the writ was directed, made a return in which she alleged, among other things, that she had continuously provided Tillie with a comfortable home, food, clothing, education and religious training for over nine years and that the petitioner had neither seen nor attempted to contact his daughter since she was six months old, nor had he provided her with the necessities of life nor with any gifts, attention or affection. In an amended return she added to these averments that Tillie's health had been adversely affected by the threat of separation from her; "That said child is of sufficient age and mentality to form an intelligent preference and wishes to remain with the grandmother" and "That to separate said child from her grandmother and take her away from the only home said child has ever known will seriously impair the child's physical and mental health." The only attempt to deny or controvert these allegations, as section 1484, Penal Code, contemplates may be done, was petitioner's request, acceded to by the grandmother, that his petition should be deemed a traverse to the original and the amended return. As the petition was entirely silent respecting the allegations to which we have referred, its contents consisting of affirmative allegations concerning the revocation of the original letters of guardianship and concerning prior petitions for writs of habeas corpus, the subject matters of the referee's Findings appear in the main to be established by petitioner's failure to deny them as they appear in the original and amended return. See In re Delgado, 1930, 107 Cal.App. 688, 290 P. 589; In re O'Leary, 1932, 127 Cal. App. 183, 15 P.2d 761; In re Larabee, 1933, 131 Cal.App. 261, 21 P.2d 132; In re Gutierrez, 1934, 1 Cal.App.2d 281, 36 P.2d 712.

[2] Should we, however, give a most liberal interpretation to the stipulation that the petition should be deemed a traverse to the returns, by construing it as providing that the allegations of the returns should be deemed denied, then the referee's findings should be received, approved and affirmed (In re Matusow, 1933, 129 Cal.App. 76, 18 P.2d 72), for the matters there covered are pertinent to our inquiry on petitioner's theory of the present status of affairs. Petitioner contends that the judgment revoking the original letters of guardianship is self-executing, with the result that notwithstanding the appeal the guardianship is at an end; that the father then, as the natural guardian is entitled to Tillie's custody without reliance upon the provision, in the judgment revoking the original letters of guardianship, that awarded her custody to the father, a provision which petitioner calls surplusage and concedes was improperly included in that judgment, for the father was not seeking to be appointed as Tillie's guardian. A further element in petitioner's position is that because of the pendency of the appeal, the superior court had no jurisdiction to entertain the second petition by Tillie's grandmother for letters of guardianship, so that the judgment that letters should issue is void on its face.

[3,4] We are not passing upon the validity of petitioner's theory, but, for the moment, are accepting it. Under his theory, as affairs now stand it is as though no guardian had been appointed for Tillie and petitioner, solely by virtue of the fact that he is her father, seeks an order of this court that she be taken from the only home which she has ever known, her home with her grandmother. Contrary to the holding in the case upon which petitioner relies, In re Hart, 1913, 21 Cal.App. 30, 32, 130 P. 704, that "In this proceeding this court is not called upon, nor, in our opinion, has its jurisdiction or authority to hear evidence with reference to the best interests of the child," it has been held that under such circumstances as those petitioner sees existing here, the child's best interest is involved, and governs the discretion vested in us respecting the making of the order petitioner seeks. The Hart case was, in effect though not expressly, disowned by the court which gave it birth, in Re McDaniel, 1928, 90 Cal.App. 307, 309, 265 P. 884. The distinction between the situation where a parent has, by an appropriate proceeding in the superior court, been appointed guardian of a child and that where a petitioner relies upon the mere status of parenthood for an order that the child be surrendered, is pointed out in the case of In re Britt, 1917, 176 Cal. 177, 181, 182, 167 P. 863. In the Britt case, as in two cases upon which it relied, In re Gates, 1892, 95 Cal. 461, 30 P. 596, and Matter of Application of Bell, 1915, 28 Cal.App. 547, 549, 153 P. 240, the facts that the petitioner had shown himself unfit as a parent by a marked lack of interest in or affection for his young child, over a period of years, and that the child had grown up with the tendrils of her infant affections firmly attached to the one in whose custody she was, were held good reasons for the denial of an order tearing the child from her only known home. The facts in the three cases last referred to are paralleled in the case before us. Petitioner has not been appointed guardian of Tillie. Since her birth he has shown scant interest in and no affection for her, none at all during the past nine and a half of her ten years of life. Her home has been with her grandmother whom she loves, naturally and deservedly. Inevitably her preference is to remain with her grandmother rather than to take up life with a stranger. Borrowing the words of Mr. Chief Justice Beatty, appearing in In re Gates, supra, 95 Cal. 461, 462, 30 P. 596, we "do not feel called upon to make any coercive order by which the mere legal right of the petitioner may be enforced against the child's manifest inclination and reasonable choice to remain where she is."

[5] We have considered this matter up to this point as though there were no superior court adjudication determining who should be Tillie's guardian. It is the fact, however, that even though the original guardianship letters have been revoked, an appeal is pending from the judgment of revocation whose outcome we do not wish to anticipate, and letters of guardianship have been issued to Tillie's grandmother by a judgment which is not void on its face. The tribunal vested by law with the duty of determining who shall be Tillie's guardian is the superior court. Probate Code, sec. 1440. While no action thus far taken has become final, such action as has been taken does not compel us to disturb the status in quo, and we are convinced that Tillie should be allowed, by us, to remain where she wishes to be, that is, with her grandmother. In re Green, 1924, 67 Cal.App. 504, 505, 506, 226 P. 76.

[6] Fundamentally, petitioner's position is that he is Tillie's father and as such has the right to her custody, no matter what her wishes or best interests may be. Support is found for his position in such cases as Guardianship of Salter, 1904, 142 Cal. 412, 76 P. 51, where a conscious disregard of the child's welfare was justified upon the ground that section 1751, Code of Civil Procedure, required it. This section has been supplanted by the sections of the Probate Code having to do with the appointment of guardians for minors. Section 1406, of the Probate Code, opens with this sentence: "In appointing a general guardian of a minor, the court is to be guided by what appears to be for the best interest of the child in respect to its temporal and mental and moral welfare; and if the child is of sufficient age to form an intelligent preference, the court may consider that preference in determining the question." The philosophy of this sentence is not new, having been given expression, before the adoption of the Probate Code, in section 246, Civil Code, but it was not known in such cases as that last cited, and there were a number of them decided before the adoption of the Probate Code in 1931. These cases do not give us the law for today; section 1406, Probate Code, does that.

The objections to the introduction of evidence are overruled. The prayer of the petitioner is denied and the writ is discharged.

Appeal from Superior Court, Sacramento County; Malcolm C. Glenn, Judge.

Action by Nathaniel Leftridge and another against City of Sacramento and others for a writ of mandate, wherein a preliminary writ was issued. From an order discharging the writ, petitioners appeal.

Affirmed.

See, also, 48 Cal.App. 589, 119 P.2d 390.

Albert E. Sheets, Anthony J. Kennedy, and Carl Kuchman, all of Sacramento, for appellant.

Hugh B. Bradford, City Atty., of Sacramento, for respondent.

THOMPSON, Justice.

The petitioners have appealed from an order of court discharging the preliminary writ of mandamus which was issued directing the Civil Service Board of the City of Sacramento to hear, determine and report to the City Council the prevailing wages which were paid in that vicinity to employees who were engaged in the performance of services similar to those of petitioners who were a garbageman and a collector of refuse from the city streets, and when said prevailing wages had been ascertained that the city should pay petitioners at those rates. After notice and hearing by the Civil Service Board, findings were adopted to the effect that no divergence existed in that vicinity with respect to prevailing wages of employees engaged in such similar occupations. The proceedings and conclusions of the Board at that hearing were transcribed and filed in the Superior Court, both as a return to the petition and as a transcript of evidence for consideration of the court. That record on appeal, consisting of 320 pages, was certified to this court by the trial judge. Further oral and documentary evidence was taken by the trial court in the mandate proceeding on the subject of the prevailing rate of wages paid for similar services in the vicinity of Sacramento. Thereupon the respondents were exonerated from failure to perform their respective duties, and the writ was discharged. From that order the petitioners have appealed.

The principal questions to be determined are whether the Civil Service Board was warranted in classifying the services of the petitioners as "garbageman" and "pick-up man" as distinguished from "truckmen" or "dump-truck drivers", and if so, whether there was a divergence in the prevailing scale of wages in the vicinity of Sacramento between those classifications of employment. The further problem involved is whether the court may by means of mandamus try the question de novo regarding the divergence of prevailing wages.

The amended petition for a writ of mandamus was filed in the Superior Court of Sacramento County, October 30, 1939. It contains four separate causes of action. The first one alleges that Nathaniel Leftridge was employed by the City of Sacramento "driving and operating a dump truck and with the use of such dump truck collecting, removing, transporting, dumping and disposing of garbage"; that he was paid $131.30 per month of 26 days, or $5.05 per day, for his services, and that the prevailing wages in that vicinity which were paid to "garbage dump truck" men was the sum of eighty-five cents per hour. It is alleged the Civil Service Board of that city failed and neglected to ascertain the prevailing wages which were paid to employees in that vicinity, engaged in the classes of work which are performed by the petitioners, and failed to report those rates to the City Council as required by Section 52 of the Charter of Sacramento, St.1921, pp. 1919, 1938, and that the City Council has refused to allow or pay said employees the prevailing wages to which they are entitled.

The second cause of action further alleges that said Nathaniel Leftridge is entitled to the unpaid portion of the prevailing wages of his class of employment, from April 17, 1939, at the rate of eighty-five cents per hour, aggregating the sum of $110.25, the payment of which was refused.

The third cause of action alleges that the petitioner, Chris Jacobsen, was employed by said city "driving and operating a dump truck, performing miscellaneous labor such as shoveling, cleaning up wreckage and debris from the streets" of Sacramento; that he was paid for said services $125.58 per month of 21 days, or $5.98 per day, and that the prevailing wages paid to "Waste Removal Dump Truck" men in that vicinity was the sum of eighty-five cents per hour.

The fourth cause of action further alleges that said Chris Jacobsen presented for payment to the treasurer of said city his claim for the unpaid difference between his paid wages and the prevailing rate for such services in that vicinity, amounting to $42.09, which was refused.

The prayer asks for a writ of mandamus requiring the Civil Service Board of the City of Sacramento to "hold investigations to ascertain the prevailing scale of wages" in that vicinity which was paid to employees of the same classes of services in which the petitioners are engaged, and to report to the City Council the result thereof, and that the City Council shall thereupon fix, allow and pay to petitioners the prevailing wages so ascertained, as required by Section 52 of the Charter of Sacramento. The petition further prays that the auditor and treasurer of said city be required to allow and pay petitioners the respective unpaid amounts of their wages thus ascertained and allowed.

A demurrer to the petition was overruled. The respondents answered the pleading, denying the material allegations of the petition. After a partial hearing the court issued a preliminary writ of mandamus directing the Civil Service Board of the City of Sacramento to forthwith hold an investigation to ascertain the prevailing scale of wages paid in that vicinity to men employed in performing services similar to those classes in which the petitioners were engaged, and to report the result of its investigation to the City Council. The council was then directed to adjust, allow and pay the petitioners wages in accordance with such prevailing scales. The hearing of the petition was then continued and the respondents were directed to appear before the court on or before a specified date and file their return showing the result of their investigation. In response to that order the Civil Service Board fixed October 10, 1940, and the City Hall in Sacramento as the time and place of conducting that investigation. Notice of that hearing was duly served on all interested persons, including the petitioners and their attorneys. At that hearing oral and documentary evidence was adduced in behalf of both parties. Numerous reports and signed questionnaires regarding the subject of prevailing wages were filed by scores of individuals and many firms who were engaged in and about Sacramento in trucking and in services similar to those which were performed by the petitioners.

Several letters were also received and filed with the board from officers of other cities regarding the scale of wages paid to garbagemen, dump-truck drivers and other employees of similar classes. The information was received chiefly from individuals and firms within the County of Sacramento who were engaged in collecting garbage, cleaning streets, hauling refuse, merchandise, materials, milk and products of various kinds, by means of trucks, drays, dump-trucks, and other vehicles. It appears that other than the city there was but one garbage firm which was engaged in that business in Sacramento County. The hearing before the board lasted for several days. At the conclusion of the evidence the matter was elaborately argued before the board and submitted for determination. The evidence and proceedings, together with the findings of the board on the subject of prevailing wages of similar classes of employees were transcribed and filed. In effect, the board determined that the classes of employment in which the petitioners were engaged were separate and distinct from those of "truck-drivers", or "dump-truck operators", and that there was no discrepancy in that vicinity between the wages which were paid to the petitioners and the compensation which was paid to workmen in other similar classes of employment, and that the petitioners were therefore not entitled to an increase of wages. The result of that hearing and investigation was transcribed and certified to the trial court and filed in this proceeding as a return to the petition and as an exhibit for the consideration of the court. That transcript, consisting of 320 pages, was authenticated by the trial judge as a part of the record on appeal. It contains specifications of the duties and qualifications, required by the Civil Service Board, of employees of the city with respect to several classifications, including "garbagemen", "pick-up men", "dump-truck drivers" and "truckmen". The duties of these several classes differ materially. Several obvious distinctions, with respect to the duties and qualifications of these employees, exist between the classes to which the petitioners belong and those of a dump-truck driver or a drayman. For instance, the record shows that garbagemen are accompanied by helpers in canvassing their respective districts for the purpose of collecting garbage. They operate trucks equipped with automatic hoisting devices. They are required to travel from door to door, and to carry by hand the garbage cans from the rear of the premises to the trucks stationed on the streets, and to then dump the contents in the trucks. The helpers then drive the vehicles to the adjoining house, while the garbagemen proceed to visit that back yard for other garbage receptacles. This process is repeated until the load is completed. The trucks are then driven to the point of disposal and the load dumped. The garbage cans weigh from fifty to ninety pounds. Sixty-five per cent of the working time of these men is consumed in procuring, carrying and dumping the cans. Only about thirty-five per cent of their time is consumed in driving the trucks for collecting and disposing of the garbage. In other words, the majority of their working time is employed in manual labor, and not in driving the trucks. Apparently no unusual skill in operating a motor vehicle is required. No mechanical skill in caring for their machines is required. On the contrary, truck drivers, according to the duties required by the city, are engaged chiefly in driving their vehicles. They are required to possess enough mechanical skill to "clean, lubricate, and make minor operating repairs on their motor trucks." Their business is to drive the trucks and to haul materials, equipment, supplies and laborers for the benefit of the city. The specifications for that classification also require the truckman to possess an education equivalent to completion of the eighth grade, and to have had at least two years of successful experience in driving two-ton trucks. No reason is suggested why these classifications and the distinct duties and qualifications of each are not reasonable. They appear to be reasonable.

A similar situation exists with relation to the class of "pick-up men". Their chief duty is to collect grass and debris from the streets within prescribed districts. The driving of their trucks is unimportant compared with the manual labor required to collect and load the refuse matter. There appears to be satisfactory reason for separately classifying "pick-up men" for their line of duty.

[1-3] Section 43 of the charter confers upon the Civil Service Board the authority to adopt rules for the selection and promotion of employees of the city. This provision authorizes that board to make reasonable classifications of workmen for the purpose of employment and promotion. The business of collecting and disposing of garbage within the boundaries of a city is certainly within the province of the municipality. It is a well-established principle that authority may be delegated by the legislature to administrative boards or officers to adopt and enforce reasonable rules and terms to carry out the general purpose of a statute, even though the delegated power confers a discretion or the necessity of determining terms, qualifications or conditions under which the board may act, so long as they come within the scope of the statute. Fillmore Union High School Dist. v. Cobb, 5 Cal.2d 26, 33, 53 P.2d 349; 5 Cal.Jur. 683, § 97; Mitchell v. McKevitt, 128 Cal.App. 458, 461, 17 P.2d 789. In 1 Cooley's Const.Lim., 8th Ed., p. 231, it is said in that regard:

"Boards and commissions play an important part in the administration of our laws. The great social and industrial evolution of the past century, and the many demands made upon our legislatures by the increasing complexity of human activities, have made essential the creation of these administrative bodies and the delegation to them of certain powers. Though legislative power cannot be delegated to boards and commissions, the legislature may delegate to them administrative functions in carrying out the purpose of a statute and various governmental powers for the more efficient administration of the laws."

In the case of Gaylord v. City of Pasadena, 175 Cal. 433, at page 436, 166 P. 348, 349, it is further said in that regard: "It has become increasingly imperative that many quasilegislative and quasijudicial functions, which in smaller communities and under more primitive conditions were performed by the legislative or judicial branches of the government, are intrusted to departments, boards, commissions, and agents. No sound objection can longer be successfully advanced to this growing method of transacting public business. These things must be done in this way or they cannot be done at all, and their doing, in a very real sense, makes for the safety of the republic and is thus sanctioned by the highest law. For, as the Supreme Court of the United States declares: 'Indeed, it is not too much to say that a denial to Congress of the right, under the Constitution, to delegate the power to determine some fact or the state of things upon which the enforcement of its enactment depends, would be "to stop the wheels of government" and bring about confusion, if not paralysis, in the conduct of the public business.' Union Bridge Co. v. United States, 204 U.S. 364, 27 S.Ct. 367, 51 L.Ed. 523."

[4, 5] It is true that rules which are thus adopted and enforced must be reasonable in their application to the purpose for which the statute is enacted, and they must not be arbitrary or discriminatory. Martin v. Superior Court, 194 Cal. 93, 227 P. 762; 5 Cal.Jur. 823, §§ 188–193. A determined classification is presumed to be reasonable and valid, and will be upheld unless it appears to be palpably arbitrary. Sequoia National Park Stages Co. v. Sequoia & General Grant National Parks Co., 210 Cal. 156, 162, 291 P. 208; In re Weisberg, 215 Cal. 624, 12 P.2d 446.

[6] In the present case the prescribed qualifications and duties of a garbageman and a pick-up man do not appear to be unreasonable or arbitrary. The distinctions between such occupations and that of an ordinary dump-truck driver are apparent and important. In the latter pursuit it is ordinarily essentially and almost exclusively the duty of the drivers of trucks to operate their machines in transporting goods and materials. In the occupations of garbagemen and pick-up men it appears that their chief duties and the majority of their time is required to procure the garbage, carry the containers to their vehicles and to dump their contents or to shovel up and transfer the grass and debris from the streets to their machine. The reason for adopting the distinctions between the duties and qualifications of ordinary truck or dump-truck drivers and garbagemen or pick-up men is clearly within the purpose and spirit of Section 43 of the Charter which authorizes the Civil Service Board to adopt reasonable rules governing the selection and promotion of the employees of the city.

It is true that it was the duty of the Civil Service Board to familiarize itself with the scale of wages paid for the classes of work performed by the employees of the city, and for that purpose to hold investigations to ascertain the prevailing wages in that vicinity paid for similar employment, when it was deemed necessary to do so. It is also true that when a divergence between the wages paid to city employees and the prevailing wages paid to other workmen in similar occupations in that vicinity was found to exist, it was the duty of the board to inform the City Council of that fact, in which event it was the duty of the Council to adjust its employees' wages to that prevailing scale. Section 52 of the charter so provides. It reads:

> "It shall be the duty of the Civil Service Board to familiarize itself with the scale of wages paid to all classes of employees both in and out of the City service, and for that purpose it shall, whenever it may be deemed necessary, hold investigations to ascertain the prevailing scale of wages. Whenever it shall be found that the City has diverged from such scale, the Board shall transmit, in writing, to the City Council notice of such divergence and it shall be the duty of the Council to adjust the wages paid to said prevailing scale."

[7] In view of the allegations of the petition in this proceeding it was entirely proper that the trial court should have issued the preliminary writ, as it did, directing the Civil Service Board to hold an investigation pursuant to the preceding section of the charter to ascertain and report to the court its findings regarding the prevailing wages which were paid in that vicinity for services similar to those which were performed by the petitioners.

[8] After due notice to the interested parties, that investigation was held. As a result of that hearing the board determined that no prevailing scale of wages existed in that vicinity which was at variance with the wages paid to the petitioners for the same class of work which they performed. It was therefore unnecessary for the board to make that report to the City Council. The proceedings and findings of the board upon that hearing were transcribed and filed in the mandamus proceeding as a return to the petition. Upon that return, and upon further hearing before the trial court, it was determined that the petitioners had no valid cause of action, and the writ was therefore discharged and the respondents were exonerated from all alleged dereliction of their respective official duties.

[9-11] Mandamus is a proper remedy to compel a city council or a city civil service board to perform its mandatory duties prescribed by the charter. McAlpine v. Baumgartner, 10 Cal.2d 409, 74 P.2d 753. In the present case the writ was properly issued to require the Civil Service Board to ascertain the prevailing scale of wages paid in the vicinity of Sacramento to employees performing the duties of the class of workmen to which the petitioners belong, pursuant to the provisions of Section 52 of the Charter. The writ, however, may not compel an officer or a board to perform the duties in a particular way. It will issue only to require the performance of ministerial duties. The exercise of discretion on the part of such officer or board will not be interfered with in that proceeding except for arbitrary disregard of the law or for flagrant abuse of discretion. Mosesian v. Parker, 44 Cal.App.2d 544, 548, 112 P.2d 321; Morales v. Ingels, 30 Cal.App.2d 182, 85 P.2d 907; 16 Cal.Jur. 809, § 28; 34 Am.Jur. 859, § 70. A discretion was conferred upon the Civil Service Board of Sacramento by Section 43 of the Charter to classify its employees for the purpose of "selection and promotion". In so doing it had a right to prescribe reasonable duties and qualifications for employees in such classifications.

[12, 13] Numerous cases hold, and the rule is firmly established that mandamus may not serve the purpose of a writ of error even though no appeal or writ of error is granted by law. J. & W. C. Shull, Inc., v. Merced Irrigation Dist., 90 Cal.App. 270, 265 P. 965; 16 Cal.Jur. 811, § 29; 34 Am. Jur. 842, § 50. The right of appeal is statutory. None exists unless the legislature sees fit to grant it. It is true that in the cases of Standard Oil Co. of California v. State Board of Equalization, 6 Cal.2d 557, 59 P.2d 119; Drummey v. State Board of Funeral Directors etc., 13 Cal.2d 75, 87 P. 2d 848; Laisne v. Calif. State Board of Optometry, 19 Cal.2d 831, 123 P.2d 457, and some other California cases, the office of extraordinary writs, such as certiorari and mandamus, appear to have been greatly extended contrary to the former prevailing rule. These cases hold that the trial court may hear de novo the proceedings which occur before inferior tribunals or boards with state-wide jurisdiction. This proceeding in mandamus does not involve proceedings of a state-wide board. The modification of the former rule in that respect appears to be a radical departure from the former well established principle. It has led to much confusion. The effect of this change upon a vast, increasing bulk of litigation affecting the duties imposed by law upon inferior tribunals and boards is suggested in able articles appearing in 15 Southern California Law Review at page 391 and in 25 California Law Review at page 275. Three justices dissented from the majority opinion in the Laisne case. The case of Bodinson Mfg. Co. v. California Employment Comm., 17 Cal.2d 321, 109 P.2d 935, which involved a state-wide board, is distinguished from the previously mentioned cases, on the ground that it was concerned with a question of law only and not with a review of the discretionary conclusions of a board regarding the facts considered. The Bodinson case involved the construction of the statute to determine whether the board was legally authorized to pay unemployment wages to certain employees of an industry who were engaged in a sympathetic strike. At page 330 of 17 Cal.2d, at page 941 of 109 P.2d of that report the court said:

> "The writ of mandamus may therefore be used in this state, not only to compel the performance of a ministerial act, but also in a proper case for the purpose of reviewing the final acts and decisions of statewide administrative agencies which do not exercise judicial power."

We do not understand the preceding language authorizes a trial de novo upon all questions in the Supreme Court or in a trial court upon a proceeding in mandamus. A trial of the facts of that case was not involved. The facts were settled by the pleadings. The court said in that regard: "The question presented is one of law. We are not concerned here with the degree of finality which the legislature may have intended to confer upon the Commission's determinations of fact."

In the present case the court in the mandamus proceeding tried de novo the question of prevailing wages. In addition to the transcript of proceedings before the Civil Service Board which was filed in the trial court, additional oral evidence was adduced. Upon the record before the trial court it held there was no discrepancy between the prevailing wages paid in the vicinity of Sacramento to employees who were engaged in similar occupations and those received by the petitioners. The writ was therefore discharged.

[14] The appellants, however, contend there is no conflict of evidence for the reason that it appears without dispute that dump-truck drivers received approximately ninety cents per hour for their services. That is true, but that fact is not conclusive of this proceeding. We may concede that the character of the vehicles used by the respective drivers was the same. But neither the duties nor the qualifications of such operators were the same, as we have previously stated. Sixty-five per cent of the working time of the petitioners was devoted to manual labor. They were not required to possess or exercise the same mechanical skill of ordinary dump-truck drivers. The court did not err in sustaining objections to evidence of the prevailing wages which were paid in that vicinity to dump-truck drivers, for the reason that they belonged to a different class of employees.

[15] The findings and judgment are supported by substantial evidence.

The order discharging the writ is affirmed.

PEOPLE v. DARCY.

Cr. 2212.

District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California.

June 25, 1943.

Hearing Denied July 22, 1943.

1. Criminal law ⇨1023(10, 13)

Where pronouncement of judgment was suspended and accused placed on probation, his appeal need not be considered as applying to a judgment or verdict, though appeal from order denying a new trial remained unaffected. Pen.Code, § 1237.

2. Criminal law ⇨1134(8)

An attack upon an indictment or alleged irregularities occurring before issue of fact joined by plea are not properly matters to be determined on appeal from order denying a new trial.

3. Criminal law 🔑105

Lack of jurisdiction, if disclosed by the pleadings, may be raised at any time.

4. Criminal law 🔑1134(8)

On appeal from order denying a new trial, objections relating to extradition proceedings and to sufficiency of indictment charging perjury upon ground that certain alleged false statements were immaterial could not be considered as an attack upon the indictment.

5. Perjury 🔑34(1)

The falsity of evidence upon which it is sought to establish perjury must be proved by two witnesses, or by one witness and corroborating circumstances. Pen. Code, § 1103a.

6. Perjury 🔑34(4)

Naturalization papers of accused's father and applications for passports made by accused giving a different name and place of birth from those contained in accused's affidavit of registration as a voter and statements made by accused to immigration inspector inconsistent with registration affidavit satisfied statutory requirement that perjury may be proved by one witness and corroborating circumstances. Pen.Code, § 1103a.

7. Perjury 🔑11(1), 12

To constitute "perjury", a false statement must be material to the matter at issue and must be made willfully. Pen.Code, § 118.

See Words and Phrases, Permanent Edition, for all other definitions of "Perjury".

8. Perjury 🔑12

The statutory definition of perjury requiring the false statement to be made "willfully" uses quoted word in sense of knowingly or intentionally so that it must be differentiated from the same word when used in an indictment charging a fraudulent purpose. Pen.Code, § 118.

See Words and Phrases, Permanent Edition, for all other definitions of "Willfully".

9. Perjury 🔑1

A false statement need not be made for the purpose of injuring another in order to constitute "perjury". Pen.Code, § 118.

Evidence warranted conclusion that false statements as to name and place of birth contained in affidavit of registration as a voter were "willfully" made within meaning of statutory definition of perjury. Pen.Code, § 118.

11. Perjury 🔑36

Whether a false statement was made willfully or as the result of an honest mistake is a question of fact for the jury. Pen.Code, § 118.

12. Perjury 🔑11(2)

False statements as to name and place of birth contained in affidavit of registration as a voter were "material to the matter at issue" within meaning of statutory definition of perjury, though affiant could have established his citizenship and right to vote had he given true name and place of birth. Pen.Code, § 118.

See Words and Phrases, Permanent Edition, for all other definitions of "Material to Matter at Issue".

13. Elections 🔑59

There is a difference in meaning between the words "elector" and "voter", an elector being one who has the qualifications to vote but may not have complied with legal requirements as conditions precedent to exercise of the right to vote.

See Words and Phrases, Permanent Edition, for all other definitions of "Elector" and "Voter".

14. Officers 🔑18

An elector possessed of necessary constitutional and statutory qualifications is entitled to hold office though his name is not on the great register of voters.

15. Perjury 🔑11(2)

The test of whether a false statement was "material to the matter at issue" within statutory definition of perjury is not that injury actually occurred as a result of statement but that falsehood could have influenced or changed the status of subject of statement to benefit of falsifier or detriment of others and it is sufficiently material if it might have affected the proceeding in or for which it was made. Pen. Code, §§ 118, 123.

That oath under which false statement was made was administered in an irregular manner is no defense to prosecution for perjury. Pen.Code, § 121.

One who, being required by law to make a statement under oath, willfully and knowingly falsifies such statement, purportedly made under oath, in any particular, is guilty of "perjury" as a matter of law, regardless of whether oath was in fact taken or whether maker knew the materiality of the falsehood, the offense being completed upon delivery of affidavit to another person, with intent that it be uttered or published as true. Pen.Code, §§ 118, 121, 123, 124, 129.

18. Names 🔑20

Though a change of name may be effected by usage without a legal proceeding, the change should be with reference to all affairs.

19. Elections 🔑106

In registering as a voter, the full name must be given and where last name has been changed by order of court or by marriage, a notation of such fact should be made upon re-registration. Pol.Code, § 1097.

20. Perjury 🔑12

An "assumed name" given in affidavit of registration as a voter is in fact a "false name" within meaning of statutory definition of perjury. Pen.Code, § 118; Pol. Code, § 1097.

See Words and Phrases, Permanent Edition, for all other definitions of "Assumed Name" and "False Name".

21. Perjury 🔑32(2)

In prosecution for perjury for giving false name and place of birth in affidavit of registration as a voter, affidavits showing birth at a place other than that stated in registration affidavit were relevant on the issue of willfulness. Pen.Code, § 118.

22. Perjury 🔑32(2)

In prosecution for perjury for giving false name and place of birth in affidavit of registration as a voter, other registration affidavits containing similar false statements were admissible to show intent. Pen.Code, § 118.

23. Criminal law 🔑662(4)

The rule that accused has a right to be "confronted by witnesses" against him has no application to documentary evidence.

See Words and Phrases, Permanent Edition, for all other definitions of "Confronted by Witnesses".

24. Criminal law 🔑1165(1)

In prosecution for perjury for making false statements in affidavit of registration as a voter, failure to produce as a witness the deceased deputy registrar of voters before whom allegedly false affidavit was made was not prejudicial error.

25. Criminal law 🔑1165(1)

Failure to produce accused's father as a witness to prove falsity of name and place of birth given in accused's affidavit of registration as a voter was not prejudicial error, where father's naturalization papers were introduced to prove accused's true name and place of birth and accused had previously made method of father's naturalization a part of application for passport. Pen.Code, § 118.

26. Criminal law 🔑15

Amendment to Political Code providing for "cancellation for all purposes" of all affidavits of registration meant only cancellation for purposes pertaining to future voting, and in view of statute providing that repeal of any law creating a criminal offense does not bar prosecution for previous violation of repealed law unless repealing act expressly declared such intention, amendment did not bar subsequent prosecution for perjury for false statements contained in registration affidavits thus canceled. Pen.Code, § 118; Pol.Code, §§ 329, 1094.

See Words and Phrases, Permanent Edition, for all other definitions of "Cancellation For All Purposes".

27. Constitutional law 🔑250
Perjury 🔑15

Contention that hundreds of other similar untruths appeared in city and county records and that accused was singled out for prosecution because he was a communist presented no defense to prosecution for perjury for giving false statements in affidavit of registration as a voter and did not tend to establish that accused was deprived of constitutional right to "equal protection of the laws". Pen.Code, § 118.

See Words and Phrases, Permanent Edition, for all other definitions of "Equal Protection of the Law".

Where prosecution for perjury was by indictment, offer to prove that despite existence of hundreds of other similar untruths in city and county records accused alone was singled out for prosecution because he was a communist was insufficient in absence of offer of proof that grand jury had singled out accused because of his political affiliation or that any member of police department or district attorney had persuaded or instigated investigation by grand jury or return of indictment. Pen. Code, § 118.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Francisco County; George W. Schonfeld, Judge.

Samuel Adams Darcy was convicted of perjury and upon motion for probation, pronouncement of judgment was suspended. From judgment and order denying his motion for new trial, defendant appeals.

Purported appeal from judgment dismissed and order denying motion for new trial affirmed.

Andersen & Resner, George R. Andersen, and Herbert Resner, all of San Francisco, and Charles J. Katz, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Robert W. Kenny, Atty. Gen., David K. Lener, Atty. Gen., John F. Hassler, Deputy Atty. Gen., and Matthew Brady, Dist. Atty., and Leslie C. Gillen, Asst. Dist. Atty., both of San Francisco, for respondent.

WARD, Justice.

Appellant was indicted, tried by a jury and convicted of perjury. The indictment contains one count which alleges in substance that on March 27, 1934 in an affidavit of registration as an elector he stated under oath before a deputy registrar of voters authorized to administer oaths in the department of elections at San Fransciso that his name was "Sam Darcy" and his place of birth "New York", whereas his true name is Samuel Dardeck or Samuel Adams Dardeck and his place of birth Ukraine, Russia.

A demurrer and supplement to demurrer to the indictment were overruled; a motion to dismiss the indictment and a motion to quash the same were dismissed, and a challenge to the jury panel was disallowed. Upon the return of the verdict, motions in arrest of judgment and for a new trial were made and denied, whereupon a motion for probation was made and granted, and the pronouncement of judgment suspended.

Appellant did not testify in his own behalf. However, as appears from testimony given by him before the Immigration and Naturalization Service at Ellis Island, New York, he was born in Orinion, Russia, and given the name of Srool Adam Dardeck. With his brothers and sisters he was brought to the United States by his mother, his father having emigrated to this country a year earlier. The latter secured naturalization and it is by reason of this fact that appellant as a minor child acquired his citizenship. He was married in New York in 1926 under the name of Samuel Adams Darcy; in 1927 he remarried his wife in Chicago under the name of Samuel Adams Dardeck. In the same year, he applied for passports to Europe for himself and his wife whom he stated he "married on May 13, 1927," his application stating under oath that his name was Samuel Adams Dardeck and that he had been born in Russia. In 1932 in connection with an interview with an inspector of the police department of Long Beach to establish his identity, he signed the name of Sam Darcy to a written statement that he was born in New York. Affidavits, also, made by him in 1931, 1932 and 1934 before the registrar of voters in San Francisco gave his name as Samuel Adams Darcy, Samuel Darcy and Sam Darcy, respectively, and his birthplace as New York. In 1934, also, he filed under oath a declaration of candidacy for the office of governor of this state. Among other things he stated in the declaration that he had been a resident of this state for eight and a half years. In 1935, he again applied for a passport to Europe, his application referring to the 1927 passport and giving his birthplace as Ukraine, Russia. Also, in 1935, he testified before the naturalization and immigration service that his name was Samuel Adams Darcy; that he was known in California as Sam Darcy and Samuel Adams Darcy; that his address at the time was Jersey City and that he had used this address for several years for personal business, but that he was a registered voter in San Francisco. At this time he again gave his birthplace as Ukraine, Russia.

At about the time of the filing of the indictment against appellant by the grand jury, he left this state and went to the state of Pennsylvania, where, on September 19, 1939, he was apprehended and extradition proceedings instituted against him. He resisted these proceedings by resort to the federal courts, without success, and was returned to this state to stand trial.

At his trial he exercised his legal right not to testify. Evidence offered and received on his behalf tended to prove that during his several years residence in this state he commonly used and was known by the name of Sam Darcy; that he followed the calling of journalist and political writer, advocating the principles of the communist party, and was on one occasion the candidate of that party for the office of mayor of San Francisco, and on another, as stated, for that of governor of the state. It is not contended that he used that name for any fraudulent purpose.

Appellant urges various grounds for reversal, namely (1) that the indictment fails to charge the offense of perjury inasmuch as the alleged false statements were immaterial to the proceeding in which they were made; (2) that the making of them was not legally proven, since the record disclosed no willfulness or criminal intent, and was not established by the testimony of two witnesses, or of one witness and proof of corroborating circumstances; (3) that the prosecution failed to confront the appellant with necessary witnesses, namely, his father (whose record of naturalization was used to establish appellant's birth in Russia), and the deputy registrar in San Francisco (before whom the alleged false statements were made—and who at the time of the trial was no longer living); (4) the erroneous admission or exclusion of evidence, and (5) that by his prosecution and conviction he was denied the equal protection of the law.

[1-4] The appeal purports to be taken from the judgment and the order denying the motion for a new trial; it is treated and referred to in the briefs of appellant as an appeal from the verdict. It is not in fact such. People v. Allen, 19 Cal.App.2d 301, 65 P.2d 382; People v. Boles, 35 Cal.App.2d 461, 95 P.2d 949; People v. Richardson, 23 Cal.App.2d 428, 73 P.2d 610; People v. Arrangoiz, 24 Cal.App.2d 116, 74 P.2d 789. Judgment was not pronounced; it was suspended, and the defendant on his motion placed on probation. Under such circumstances, it is not necessary to consider the appeal as applying to a judgment or verdict (In re Phillips, 17 Cal.2d 55, 109 P.2d 344, 132 A.L.R. 644; People v. Marconi, 118 Cal.App. 683, 5 P.2d 974); the appeal from the order denying appellant's motion for a new trial remains unaffected. Penal Code, sec. 1237; People v. Johnston, 37 Cal.App.2d 606, 100 P.2d 307. An attack upon an indictment, or alleged irregularities occurring before issue of fact joined by plea are not properly matters to be determined on an appeal from an order denying a motion for a new trial (People v. Duncan, 50 Cal.App.2d 184, 122 P.2d 587; People v. Turner, 39 Cal. 370), but lack of jurisdiction if disclosed by the pleadings may be raised at any time. The indictment on its face shows the jurisdiction of the court over the defendant for the alleged offense. Any objections relative to extradition proceedings or to the sufficiency of the indictment, upon the ground that certain alleged false statements were immaterial, etc., may not, in view of the necessity of dismissing the appeal from the purported judgment, be considered as an attack upon the indictment. However, the materiality of the alleged statements as presented in evidence will be considered.

[5] The falsity of evidence upon which it is sought to establish perjury must be proved by two witnesses, or by one witness and corroborating circumstances. Penal Code, sec. 1103a. The affidavit containing the perjurious matter was introduced through a deputy registrar of voters. The particular officer who administered the oath to appellant was no longer living at the time of the trial. The deputy witness testified to the official position, and to his familiarity with the signature, of the deceased deputy. Other documents containing the identified signature of "Sam Darcy", including a declaration of candidacy for governor, were also admitted in evidence.

[6] To prove the falsity of the statement in appellant's registration affidavit, the naturalization papers of his father, which had also been made a part of the applications for passports, and which showed the name of Dardeck and gave a place of birth different from the affidavit, were introduced. Several applications for passports, signed by appellant under oath and showing a different name and his place of birth as Russia instead of New York, were marked as exhibits. Statements made by him to an immigration inspector in the presence of a special agent of the department of state of the government of the United States contained the following:

"Q. Have you at any time registered in the State of California or elsewhere as having been born at New York? A. I don't think so. My recollection is that I didn't register as being born in New York, the fact is that I was not born there so why should I register that way.

"Q. Of what country are you a citizen? A. The United States.

"Q. How do you claim United States citizenship, on what grounds? A. Upon my father's citizenship papers."

The foregoing testimony standing alone more than fulfills the requirements of section 1103a, Penal Code, that perjury may be proved by one witness and corroborating circumstances. People v. Todd, 9 Cal.App.2d 237, 49 P.2d 611; People v. Curtis, 36 Cal.App.2d 306, 98 P.2d 228; People v. Tinnin, 136 Cal.App. 301, 28 P.2d 951; People v. Davis, 210 Cal. 540, 293 P. 32; People v. Gray, 52 Cal.App.2d 620, 127 P.2d 72; People v. Pustau, 39 Cal. App.2d 407, 103 P.2d 224.

[7-11] A false statement must be material to the matter at issue and must be made willfully. Penal Code, sec. 118. By this section defining perjury, the word "willfully" is used in the sense of knowingly or intentionally and should be differentiated from the same word when used in an indictment charging a fraudulent purpose. To sustain a perjury charge it is not necessary that the false statement be made for the purpose of injuring another. From the evidence as recounted the jury could easily conclude, to a moral certainty and beyond reasonable doubt, that the statements in the affidavit of registration were made "willfully." Whether a false statement has been made willfully or as the result of an honest mistake is a question of fact solely for the jury to decide. People v. Todd, supra.

[12-14] Contrary to the contention of appellant that he was an elector, entitled to vote irrespective of whether he was born in Russia or New York, the statements assigned as perjurious were material as a matter of law. The words "elector" and "voter" are often used interchangeably but there is a difference in meaning. An elector is one who has the qualifications to vote but may not have complied with the legal requirements, that is, the conditions precedent to the exercise of his right to vote. An elector possessed of the necessary constitutional and statutory qualifications is entitled to hold office though his name is not on the great register of voters. Bergevin v. Curtz, 127 Cal. 86, 59 P. 312. Appellant argues that if the holding in the Bergevin case is correct, it is immaterial whether he made false statements as to his name and place of birth since he could have accomplished the same result by registering under his real name and giving his correct place of birth.

[15] Under appellant's analysis, if the person who makes the affidavit actually has the qualifications to vote, it is immaterial whether or not his answers under oath be truthful. Following his theory a person could register under an assumed name and give a false place of birth, and not be subject to a charge of perjury. Information required in registration is material, its purpose being to make sure that only qualified persons register and vote. It is to effect this purpose that such information is required to be given under oath, and it serves as a basis for an investigation of qualifications of a person who registers. Citizenship is a material factor in the right to register, and subsequently to vote. If registrants were permitted to make false statements of the type herein with impunity, election frauds would be furthered. One person could register several times giving different names and places of birth, or varying statements of the basis of his right to vote. The test in a perjury charge is not that injury actually occurred as a result of the false statements, but that the falsehoods could have influenced or changed the status of the subject of the statement to the benefit of the falsifier or the detriment of others. It is sufficiently material if it might have affected the proceeding in or for which it was made. Penal Code, sec. 123; People v. Pustau, supra. In the present instance the registrar of the City and County of San Francisco was prevented from examining the father's naturalization papers for the purpose of verifying appellant's citizenship, and appellant was benefited at least to the extent of eliminating delay in the determination of that question, or trouble and possible embarrassment in explaining the names given or assumed by him.

[16, 17] The law views with abhorrence the use of falsehoods to such an extent that it is no defense to a prosecution for perjury that the oath was administered in an irregular manner. (Penal Code, sec. 121.) A person who, being required by law to make a statement under oath, willfully and knowingly falsifies such statement, purportedly made under oath, in any particular, is guilty of perjury as a matter of law whether or not the oath was in fact taken (sec. 129), and regardless of whether the maker knew the materiality of the falsehood (sec. 123), and the offense is complete upon delivery of the affidavit to another person, with the intent that it be uttered or published as true (sec. 124).

[18-20] It is conceded that appellant did not by legal proceeding change his name from Dardeck to Darcy. The name Darcy was a name particularly assumed by him when in California. Generally in Russia and in New York he went by the name of Dardeck. Appellant contends that a change of name does not necessarily involve a legal proceeding; that one may adopt a name by using it. This method seems to have been approved under certain conditions and stations in life but the change should be with reference to "all affairs." Ray v. American Photo Player Co., 46 Cal.App. 311, 189 P. 130; In re Useldinger, 35 Cal.App.2d 723, 96 P.2d 958. Usage has sanctioned an assumed business or so-called "stage" name. In some instances, such as in applications for passports the assumed name must be discarded for the original or true name. In registering in California, the "full name," including christian or given, and middle name, if any, is required. The place of birth or method of acquiring citizenship should be underlined in the affidavit. The necessity and materiality of giving the true name when registering as a voter has heretofore been considered. In addition it is required that when the last name has been changed by order of court or by marriage, a notation of such fact shall be made upon re-registration. Political Code, sec. 1097. An assumed name is in fact a false name. In requiring the name and place of birth it was never contemplated by the statute that false information should be given.

[21, 22] Since willfulness in the making of the statements was a material issue, affidavits showing birth in a place other than New York were relevant. Other registration affidavits were admissible to show intent.

[23-25] The rule of right of confrontation has no application to documentary evidence. The claim that prejudicial error was committed in failing to produce the deceased deputy registrar as a witness needs no comment. Perhaps it would have been well, if possible, to have produced the father of appellant, or to have made a showing of an effort to produce him. However, the method of the father's naturalization was made a part of appellant's application for passport. If there was error in this regard, it was trivial and not prejudicial.

[26] Appellant contends that the effect of an amendment to section 1094 of the Political Code was to declare a general amnesty for all perjurious statements in registration affidavits. In substance the amendment provides that on a specified date all affidavits of registration should be cancelled for all purposes. This section was adopted in connection with a permanent registration, the main purpose being to prevent old registrations being used for voting purposes. "Cancelled for all purposes" simply means for purposes pertaining to future voting; it certainly was not intended to forgive prior crimes of perjury. Kerr v. Russell, 4 Cal.2d 634, 51 P.2d 1095. Appellant's interpretation is answered by the provisions of Political Code section 329 as follows: "The repeal of any law creating a criminal offense does not constitute a bar to the indictment or information and punishment of an act already committed in violation of the law so repealed, unless the intention to bar such indictment or information and punishment is expressly declared in the repealing act." There is no express declaration in the amendment cancelling criminal liability. People v. Barton, 48 Cal.App.2d 565, 119 P.2d 952.

[27, 28] Finally it is contended that appellant's conviction constituted a denial of the equal protection of the laws of the United States and of the State of California in that he was singled out for prosecution for the sole reason that he is a communist. An offer was made to show, through certain county clerk assistants and deputy registrars, that hundreds of untruths pertaining to place of birth, etc., appeared in the records of the City and County of San Francisco and elsewhere in the state. At one time appellant offered to show "hundreds of thousands of similar and identical errors in registration" in San Francisco; that in many instances registrants voluntarily or upon notice had corrected the affidavits, and that the only prosecution instituted was against him. He further offered to prove that the police department and the district attorney of the City and County of San Francisco had singled him out because "he is a communist." The district attorney, under subpoena, was in the court room but was not sworn as a witness. The record does not disclose that any member in authority of the police department was called as a witness in respect to this matter, or that any one from that department with any knowledge upon the subject was ever subpoenaed. There is no evidence to show that any city and county or state official ever signed a complaint before a magistrate or otherwise alleging perjury against appellant. He was prosecuted by indictment. There was no offer to prove that the grand jury had singled him out because he is a communist, or that any member of the police department or the district attorney had persuaded or instigated the investigation by the grand jury or the return of the indictment. In those respects the offer of proof was insufficient.

Assuming that any part of the offer was sufficient to support appellant's contention, we will consider the case of Yick Wo v. Hopkins, 118 U.S. 356, 6 S.Ct. 1064, 30 L. Ed. 220, relied upon by him. In that case an ordinance of the City and County of San Francisco required persons operating laundries in wooden buildings to obtain licenses. The petitioner was convicted of operating such a business without one. It appeared that licenses had been refused to all Chinese but had been granted to Caucasians. The court released the petitioner upon the ground that the administration of the ordinance violated the provisions of the constitution in that it made an arbitrary and unjust discrimination, based solely on the question of race, between persons otherwise similarly situated.

The facts and the law are not analogous. If appellant herein, otherwise legally entitled to register, had been refused such privilege solely upon the ground that he was a member of a designated political party, or that he professed a certain creed, or that he was of another than the white race, and subsequently appellant voted or attempted to vote and was prosecuted and convicted therefor, the Yick Wo case might be of some assistance to him. If Yick Wo had made false statements in his application for a license to operate a laundry, and had been charged with perjury in connection therewith instead of with operating such business without a license, a holding that he could make such statements with impunity is inconceivable. The maladministration of the licensing power was the prime reason for the release of Yick Wo. In that case, referring to the ordinance, the court said (118 U.S. at page 373, 6 S.Ct. at page 1073, 30 L.Ed. 220): "For the cases present the ordinances in actual operation, and the facts shown establish an administration directed so exclusively against a particular class of persons as to warrant and require the conclusion, that, whatever may have been the intent of the ordinances as adopted, they are applied by the public authorities charged with their administration, and thus representing the state itself, with a mind so unequal and oppressive as to amount to a practical denial by the state of that equal protection of the laws which is secured to the petitioners, as to all other persons, by the broad and benign provisions of the fourteenth amendment to the constitution of the United States." In Ah Sin v. Wittman, 198 U.S. 500, 25 S.Ct. 756, 49 L.Ed. 1142, a gambling case, the court refused to follow the ruling in the Yick Wo case, taking care to differentiate the facts.

Appellant sought to inject a false issue into the trial of the charge, which, if approved, could easily lead to a rule that if some guilty persons escape, others who are apprehended should not be prosecuted. There was no denial of the use of the assumed name and the false designation of place of nativity. Among other defenses appellant sought, by way of offer of proof, an acquittal upon the claim that others equally guilty had not been prosecuted and that he had been prosecuted because he is a communist. The first claim would be equally meritorious if presented in connection with a traffic violation, and the second would establish a precedent that nationality, race or creed might be used in all criminal cases as a defense. Both claims would simply cloud the real issue. The basis of the claim in the Yick Wo case was not that petitioner therein had been arrested because he was Chinese, but that he had been refused a license on account of his nationality. There was an apparent scheme or plan to keep Chinese from operating laundries. Attention has not been called to any offer of proof indicating that there was a scheme to prohibit communists from registering. California has recently been presented with a similar theory as developed by the appellants in People v. Montgomery, 47 Cal.App.2d 1, 117 P.2d 437. In that case it was held that the decision in the Yick Wo case does not endorse the proposition that one charged with crime may justly complain because others who have committed the same offense, and are known to the authorities, are not brought to trial. The court said there was an obvious distinction between extending protection to persons of Chinese nationality, in pursuit of the harmless and somewhat necessary business of laundering, and the extension of a like protection to those engaged in the vicious social evil of pandering. Whatever may be said relative to the proposed defense in a pandering charge may certainly with equal propriety be said of the offense of perjury, a crime per se.

The purported appeal from the judgment is dismissed. The order denying the motion for a new trial is affirmed.

KNIGHT, J., concurs.

PETERS, Presiding Justice.

I dissent.

This appellant has been found guilty of perjury. The alleged perjury consists in the charge that in his affidavit of registration he gave his name as Sam Darcy when his true name is alleged to be Samuel Dardeck, and that he gave his place of birth as New York, when, in fact, it was Russia. This, the lower court held to be perjury, although the evidence admittedly shows that appellant possessed all of the requirements of an elector, and was legally entitled to register as a voter. In other words, the statements found to have been false in no way impaired the purity of the ballot, in no way qualified an otherwise incompetent elector, and in no way gave the franchise to a person not entitled to it. For this offense appellant has been found guilty of perjury for which he could have been subjected to imprisonment for a maximum period of fourteen years. Penal Code, § 126. It is my opinion that the evidence, as a matter of law, is insufficient to support the conviction.

The evidence, on the name issue, showed the following: At birth appellant was named Srool Adam Dardeck. From his earliest youth he was called Samuel or Sam, and sometimes used the middle name of Adams. For many years, in California and elsewhere, he was known as Sam Darcy. He married under that name in 1926 and the next year was remarried under the name Dardeck. Several applications for passports were secured under the name Dardeck. In California, where he took an active part in political affairs, he was always known as Sam Darcy. He was a candidate for mayor of San Francisco in 1931, and was the Communist candidate for Governor in this state in 1934. Both candidacies were under the name Sam Darcy. He wrote political pamphlets and lectured under that name. The evidence is undisputed that in this state he was always known as Sam Darcy, but that in his dealings with the Federal government in connection with passports he used his birth name of Dardeck.

It seems to be the theory of the majority opinion that the use of other than a birth name in registering, unless a change in name is confirmed by court decree, as a matter of law, constitutes the crime of perjury. That is not the law. Under the common-law rule, where it is not done for a fraudulent purpose, a person may lawfully change his name without resort to legal proceedings. See cases collected 45 Cor.Jur. p. 381, § 15; 38 Am.Jur. p. 610, § 28. A statute such as exists in this state providing a statutory proceeding for securing court approval of a change of name, as long as the statute does not provide that the statutory method is exclusive (and the statute of this state does not so provide), in no way affects this rule. Such statute is in aid of the common-law rule. As long as it is not done for a fraudulent purpose, a man may change his name without resort to the courts, and the name so assumed becomes his legal name. In re Ross, 8 Cal.2d 608, 67 P.2d 94; Emery v. Kipp, 154 Cal. 83, 97 P. 17, 19 L.R.A.,N.S., 983, 129 Am.St.Rep. 141, 16 Ann.Cas. 792; In re Useldinger, 35 Cal.App.2d 723, 96 P.2d 958; Ray v. American Photo Player Co., 46 Cal. App. 311, 189 P. 130; Everett v. Standard Acc. Ins. Co., 45 Cal.App. 332, 187 P. 996; for cases from other states see 45 Cor.Jur. p. 382, fn. 86; 38 Am.Jur. p. 610, § 28; annotations 110 A.L.R. 219; 2 L.R.A.,N.S., 1089; L.R.A.1915D, 982; 14 L.R.A. 692.

In the instant case there was neither charge nor evidence that appellant used the name Darcy for any false, fraudulent or criminal purpose. This is admitted by respondent. The evidence is uncontradicted that in this state he had never been known by any other name. The fact that he occasionally used his birth name of Dardeck in his passport applications in no way detracts from the fact that he was generally known as Darcy. In view of the fact that his citizenship was dependent upon the naturalization of his father, it is obvious he had to use such name in such applications, because, otherwise, there would have been no record of his citizenship. In this state appellant's name was legally Darcy, and no crime was committed by registering under that name.

The second charge is that appellant falsely averred he was born in New York, when, in fact, he was born in Russia. It may be conceded that the evidence supports the finding that this statement was wilfully false. This, however, does not make it perjurious. In order to be perjury the false statement must be material. § 118, Penal Code. The material issue in an affidavit of registration is whether the registrant has the right to vote. Under the Constitution and laws of this state, citizenship, age and residence are the three main requisites for an elector. Electors possessing those qualifications may lawfully register, and, if registered, may vote. The object of registration laws is to prevent unqualified persons from voting. Bergevin v. Curtz, 127 Cal. 86, 59 P. 312; Welch v. Williams, 96 Cal. 365, 31 P. 222. Such laws are aimed at preserving the purity of the ballot box and are not aimed at preventing a qualified elector from voting. They are for the purpose of preventing fraudulent voting. Attorney General v. Common Council of City of Detroit, 78 Mich. 545, 44 N.W. 388, 7 L.R.A. 99, 18 Am.St.Rep. 458. The registration laws are not intended to act as a trap for a qualified elector, so that for minor discrepancies he is either to be deprived of the right to vote or subjected to a trial for perjury. Neither in the majority opinion nor in the brief of the Attorney General is one case cited (and I have found none) where a conviction for perjury has been sustained for a misstatement in an affidavit of registration where, in fact, the registrant was qualified to vote. Darcy was admittedly a qualified elector. He was lawfully entitled to register. He was a citizen. At most, his registration was a faulty one that could have been canceled or corrected. § 300, Elections Code, St.1939, p. 69, superseding § 1109, Pol.Code. The election law provides sufficient penalties for faulty registration. Under § 300 of the Elections Code any person may proceed by action to cancel an illegal registration, while under § 139 of that code, St.1939, p. 58 (old § 42a, Pen.Code), every person who allows himself to be registered "knowing himself * * * not to be entitled to registration" is subject to imprisonment for a maximum of three years. It is inconceivable that the legislature intended that a faulty registration of a qualified person should constitute perjury with a maximum punishment of fourteen years when a deliberate illegal registration by an unqualified person should only be punished by three years maximum. It was never the purpose of the perjury statute to permit prosecutions on matters not material to the purpose of the affidavit. The affidavit signed by appellant required him, among other things, to answer as to his occupation and his height. If he had incorrectly designated his occupation, or his height, being qualified to register, could he be subjected to the penalties of perjury? Obviously, it was never the intent or purpose of the perjury statute to include such immaterial misstatements. The only material misstatements that could constitute perjury are those in relation to the qualifications set forth for a qualified elector in § 1, Art. II of the Constitution. That section requires that the registrant be twenty-one years of age, a citizen for at least ninety days, a resident of the state for one year and of the county for ninety days, and of the precinct forty days. There was no false statement as to any of these matters. Darcy was a citizen and had the necessary residential requirements. The material fact was that Darcy was a citizen, not how he acquired citizenship. See Leavine v. State, 101 Fla. 1370, 133 So. 870. The cases in this state properly have been very strict in requiring the false statement to be material to the specific inquiry before a conviction for perjury will be sustained. Thus, although testimony in an action may be false and wilfully false, it is not perjurious if it relates to collateral matters. People v. Ah Sing, 95 Cal. 657, 30 P. 797; People v. Jones, 123 Cal. 299, 55 P. 992; People v. Perazzo, 64 Cal. 106, 28 P. 62; People v. McDermott, 8 Cal. 288; People v. Planer, 23 Cal.App.2d 251, 72 P.2d 767.

The Attorney General argues that false statements as to place of birth could be used for a fraudulent purpose by an unqualified person to qualify himself as a voter. That is not the test. The test is whether this false statement was material

ALLEN et al. v. CALIFORNIA MUT. BUILDING & LOAN ASS'N et al.

S. F. 16873.

Supreme Court of California.
July 8, 1943.

As Modified Aug. 2, 1943.

1. Appeal and error 🔑1097(1)

It is a rule of general application that all questions and issues adjudicated on a prior appeal are the "law of the case" upon all subsequent appeals, and will not be reconsidered.

See Words and Phrases, Permanent Edition, for all other definitions of "Law of the Case".

2. Appeal and error 🔑1097(1)

The rule that all questions and issues adjudicated on prior appeal are the "law of the case" upon all subsequent appeals, applies to decisions of District Court of Appeal after they have become final.

3. Appeal and error 🔑1097(2)

The doctrine of "law of the case" applies even though appellate court may consider its former decision erroneous, in absence of unusual circumstances leading to injustice or unfairness.

4. Appeal and error 🔑1099(7)

If plaintiffs' evidence does not prove allegations of complaint, which was considered and held sufficient on former appeal, the doctrine of "law of the case" does not apply.

5. Appeal and error 🔑1097(6)

In action based on alleged fraud of building and loan association who induced plaintiffs to exchange their investments in association for shares of stock in another corporation, a decision of District Court of Appeal, on prior appeal, that complaint was not insufficient for failure to allege that plaintiffs' claims were presented to commissioner in control of association for purpose of liquidation, was "law of the case" on subsequent appeal presenting same issue, in view of fact that Supreme Court had denied petition for hearing as to first appeal.

6. Appeal and error 🔑1099(7)

Where District Court of Appeal on appeal in action based on alleged fraud of agents of building and loan association in inducing plaintiffs to exchange their investments in association for shares of stock in another corporation, held that complaint sufficient, evidence on subsequent trial that corporation was organized to purchase the stock of association, and that in accordance with such plan association and corporation fraudulently induced plaintiffs to exchange their investments in association for stock of corporation, and showing means by which this was carried out, sufficiently proved case within the law of the case established on prior appeal.

7. Building and loan associations 🔑42(17)

Under Building and Loan Association Act, Legislature intended to liberalize statutory requirements for filing of claim in favor of one who, as admitted by books of association, was an investor of association at time it was taken over by commissioner for liquidation, so that, if books of association show indebtedness, investor should not be required to present a claim duplicating data on its own records. St. 1935, p. 1500, § 13.16.

8. Building and loan associations 🔑42(17)

An investor in a building and loan association whose withdrawal order or assignment of certificate evidencing his deposit of money has been recorded on books of association has ceased to be an "investor" according to those books for purposes of his rights in filing claim against association in liquidation. St.1935, p. 1500, § 13.16.

See Words and Phrases, Permanent Edition, for all other definitions of "Investor".

9. Building and loan associations 🔑42(17)

The purpose of a claim against building and loan association in liquidation by commissioner is to give commissioner information concerning indebtedness of the association. St.1935, p. 1500, § 13.16.

10. Appeal and error 🔑1097(2)

The doctrine of the "law of the case" should not be adhered to when application thereof results in unjust decision.

11. Building and loan associations 🔑42(16, 17)

Investors and mutual shareholders in building and loan association, fraudulently induced to convert shares into mutual stock of another corporation which was agent of association, were entitled to restoration of their respective interests as holders of investment certificates and as mutual shareholders of association, and also to dividends declared in liquidation proceedings against association. St.1935, p. 1500, § 13.16.

As general rule, all questions presented by record must be raised upon first appeal from adverse ruling, as thereafter all matters within scope of action and relevant to issues will be deemed to have been concluded by the judgment.

13. Appeal and error ⟹1097(1)

In any later consideration of same controversy, it will be held that prior judgment by implication, if not directly, has determined all issues related to subject matter and raised by proper pleadings.

14. Appeal and error ⟹1097(8)

Where amended complaint filed in February, 1936, charged that during 1929 to 1931 inclusive, by reason of fraudulent representations of building and loan association, plaintiffs were induced to exchange their investments in association for stock of another corporation was held to be insufficient, and judgment was rendered for plaintiffs on pleadings, but subsequently a motion for new trial was granted and on appeal the order was affirmed by District Court of Appeal and Supreme Court denied petition for hearing, complaint was not subject to attack as not stating cause of action on subsequent appeal, under doctrine of "law of the case" even if corporation's records placed its stockholders upon notice so as to bar action under three-year statute of limitations. St.1935, p. 1500, § 13.16; Code Civ.Proc. § 338, subd. 4.

15. Limitation of actions ⟹201

Where it appears on face of complaint that cause of action is barred by limitations and statute is pleaded, a judgment may be rendered for defendant if case is submitted upon pleadings.

16. Appeal and error ⟹1099(3)

Where answer pleaded three-year statute of limitations as barring cause of action for fraud in inducing investors in building and loan association to exchange their investments for stock in another corporation, and trial court granted new trial after entering judgment for defendants on the pleadings, and such decision was affirmed on appeal by District Court of Appeal, and Supreme Court denied petition for hearing, the holding that cause of action was not barred by limitations was implicit in order granting new trial, affirmed on appeal, within "law of the case" doctrine. St.1935, p. 1500, § 13.16; Code Civ.Proc. § 338, subd. 4.

17. Limitation of actions ⟹100(12)

Where plaintiffs were induced to exchange their investments in building and loan association for shares of stock in another corporation by alleged fraudulent representations of association's agents, even if plaintiffs were chargeable with knowledge of fraudulent misrepresentations on their receipt of stock certificates of corporation because of absence therefrom of the express language required by statute that stockholder might withdraw his investment in corporation, so as to bar their right to maintain action for fraud under three-year statute of limitations, the discovery of falsity of alleged statement concerning right to withdraw did not give plaintiffs notice that other representations concerning corporation were untrue, as respects limitations. St.1935, p. 1500, § 13.16; Code Civ. Proc. § 338, subd. 4.

18. Limitation of actions ⟹100(12)

In action on alleged fraud of building and loan association in inducing plaintiffs to exchange their investments in association for shares of stock in another corporation, the fact that after no dividend was declared in December, 1931, plaintiffs endeavored to obtain from corporation's officers the amount of their investment, and that some of them joined stockholders' committee which employed attorney to protect their interests did not compel holding that three-year statute of limitations commenced to run as of that date, where officers of association and corporation countered plaintiffs' complaints with explanations and promises of prospective earnings, which warranted trial court's finding that plaintiffs continued to rely on good faith wisdom and advice of officers and directors of association and corporation, and they did not learn that stock was valueless until corporation's adjudication in bankruptcy in 1933. St.1935, p. 1500, § 13.16; Code Civ. Proc. § 338, subd. 4.

In action based on alleged fraud of building and loan association in inducing plaintiffs to exchange their investments in association for shares of stock in another corporation which was association's agent, wherein complaint showed facts upon which plaintiffs' contention was based, and defendants' answer pleaded three-year statute of limitations as defense, and statute providing that statute of limitations shall be deemed to have commenced to run from beginning of process of liquidation of insolvent building and loan association, issue of limitations was before trial court when it ruled on pleadings by granting judgment for defendants on pleadings, and was concluded by affirmance of order granting new trial under doctrine of "law of the case". St.1935, p. 1500, § 13.16; Code Civ.Proc. § 338, subd. 4; § 348.

20. Action ⚷63

Delay alone does not constitute "laches" unless it is accompanied by circumstances from which prejudice may result.

See Words and Phrases, Permanent Edition, for all other definitions of "Laches".

21. Building and loan associations ⚷42(16)

Claims of fraud by investors against building and loan association were not barred by "laches" because of delay of over three years in bringing action, where no injury to association or inequity was caused by delay. St.1935, p. 1500, § 13.16.

22. Building and loan associations ⚷42(17)

The provision of statute that any investor in building and loan association without presenting a claim shall be entitled to any dividends "hereafter" declared, even if presented after statutory time, was intended to protect investor whose creditor relation to association appears without contradiction on books of association from losing his right to share in liquidation of insolvent organization's assets through negligence or inadvertence in failing to file claim within prescribed period; the use of the word "hereafter" expressing legislative intention that 1935 amendment should apply to dividends declared after September 15, 1935, its effective date, in assets of association then in process of liquidation. St.1935, p. 1500, § 13.16.

See Words and Phrases, Permanent Edition, for all other definitions of "Hereafter".

23. Building and loan associations ⚷42(17)

Where first dividend of building and loan association in liquidation was declared on December 2, 1935, each of investors and mutual shareholders in association was entitled to share in first and all subsequent dividends though none of them filed claim under 1935 amendment to statute authorizing any investor in building and loan association in liquidation without presenting a claim to be entitled to any dividend "hereafter" declared. St.1935, p. 1500, § 13.16.

The doctrine of "law of the case" does not require Supreme Court to follow an interpretation of statute by District Court of Appeal in a decision as to which Supreme Court denied petition for hearing, when decision is clearly "obiter dictum".

See Words and Phrases, Permanent Edition, for all other definitions of "Obiter Dictum."

25. Building and loan associations ⚷42(6)

When Building and Loan Commissioner takes possession of property, business, and assets of building and loan association which he deems to be in an insolvent or unsafe financial condition, his future action is not limited to liquidation and distribution of its assets, but he may administer association's affairs so as to restore, if possible, its economic stability and then consent to association's resumption of business on conditions approved by him. St.1931, p. 539, § 13.11.

26. Building and loan associations ⚷40

If Building and Loan Commissioner after taking possession of building and loan association's assets on ground of unsafe financial condition allows association to resume business as going concern, association should assume its continuing obligation to pay interest on deposits of its investors, even as to period during which its assets were in temporary control of Commissioner. St.1931, p. 539, § 13.11.

27. Building and loan associations ⚷42(17)

If Building and Loan Commissioner after taking possession of assets of building and loan association which he deems to be in insolvent or unsafe financial condition instead of restoring property, business, and assets to association determines to liquidate them, the right of association's investors to interest should be subject to usual equitable principles governing liquidation which is equality among creditors. St.1931, p. 539, § 13.11.

28. Building and loan associations ⚿42(17)

In absence of express statutory provision on matter, an investor in building and loan association in process of liquidation by commissioner is not entitled to payment of interest on his claim after commencement of liquidation proceedings, where assets are insufficient to pay principal of all claims in full.

29. Building and loan associations ⚿42(17)

A determination of Building and Loan Commissioner to liquidate building and loan association after taking possession of its property, business, and assets is evidenced by filing of inventory of its assets and publication of notice to all persons having claims against it, whether creditors, or investors, or otherwise, to present them within a specified period. St.1935, p. 1500, § 13.16.

TRAYNOR and SCHAUER, JJ., dissenting.

In Bank.

Appeal from Superior Court, Santa Clara County; Maurice T. Dooling, Judge assigned.

Action by Mrs. W. A. Allen and others against California Mutual Building & Loan Association, a corporation, and another to establish claims against the Building & Loan Association in liquidation. Judgment for plaintiffs, and defendants appeal.

Modified and affirmed.

For prior opinion, see 129 P.2d 703.

D. T. Jenkins, of San Jose, and Patrick J. Kearns, of San Francisco, for appellants.

F. W. Sawyer, of Los Angeles, and Wm. R. Biaggi, of San Jose, for respondents.

EDMONDS, Justice.

So far as the merits of the controversy are concerned, Allen and those who in the superior court established their right to share in the assets of California Mutual Building and Loan Association, are in the same position as the investors whose judgment against that now insolvent corporation was affirmed in Alexander v. State Capital Co., 9 Cal.2d 304, 70 P.2d 619. The association and the Building and Loan Commissioner, in appealing from the judgment rendered against them, do not deny that, by fraudulent representations, the respondents were induced to exchange their investment certificates for stock of the State Capital Company, but they contend that (1) the failure to file a claim against the insolvent corporation; (2) the statute of limitations; and (3) laches, bar any recovery by them.

In their second amended complaint, the respondents alleged that prior to January 23, 1933, each of them became, and still is, an investor in the association by the purchase of an investment certificate and a deposit of money which is recorded in a pass book account and deposit book. On that date the association was taken over by the Building and Loan Commissioner for the purpose of liquidation. Four years previously, State Capital Company was organized as an agency of and for the purpose of assisting the association in the transaction of its business. By fraudulent representations of the association's agents during the period from 1929 to 1931, the respondents were induced to exchange their "investments" for shares of stock of State Capital Company, to their damage in the amount of their respective deposits in the association.

The complaint refers to the respondents not only as the owners of building and loan investment certificates but also as "investors" having "investments" or "holdings" in the association. The record is not specific in identifying the status of each one of them, but from the findings it may be inferred that some of the respondents held withdrawable, mutual membership shares and others owned investment certificates. See Martin v. California Mut. B. & L. Ass'n, 18 Cal.2d 478, 116 P.2d 71.

When the case was called for trial, before the first witness was sworn, the appellants objected to the taking of any evidence upon the ground that the complaint does not state a cause of action. This objection was sustained, and judgment rendered for the appellants upon the pleadings. Later, the court granted a motion for a new trial and, upon appeal, its order was affirmed. Allen v. California Mut. B. & L. Ass'n, 40 Cal.App.2d 374, 104 P.2d 851, 853. This court denied a petition for a hearing.

By its decision, the District Court of Appeal held that Allen and his associates sued to assert rights as investors, hence "They were entitled to plead an action to quiet title. That they have done and more too." Also, said the court, "The plaintiffs alleged that by the fraudulent misrepresentations of the defendant corporation they were induced to exchange securities, issued by the defendant corporation, for securities of State Capital Company, an agent of said defendant; that such exchange was not based on any consideration moving from plaintiffs to defendant; that the defendant corporation still holds the securities which the plaintiffs delivered to it; and that all of said facts appear on the books and records of said defendant. In other words they alleged in effect that there was merely an exchange in form but not in fact, and that the transaction was a mere change in the form of accounts between the plaintiffs and the corporate defendant. Manifestly if these allegations are true, and the defendants' motions admitted the truth thereof, it is clear the plaintiffs are and at all times have been 'investors' in the defendant corporation."

Following this decision, there was a trial upon the merits. The trial court found that, in 1929, the association and the company launched a campaign for the purpose of obtaining investments of the one in exchange for the capital stock of the other. Permits were issued by the Corporation Commissioner for the sale of the company's stock but these were conditioned upon the requirements that each sale be for cash and that a copy of the permit be shown to each purchaser. The respondents would not have exchanged their investments in the association for capital stock of the company but for the false representations made by the agents of the company and the association. Each of the exchanges and conversions of investments for the capital stock was void because the stock was not issued or sold for cash and, for the further reason, that no copy of the permit for the sale of stock was exhibited to the investor. The court also found that the first cause of action is not barred by any statute of limitation nor are the respondents' rights barred by laches.

From these facts, the court concluded that investors who are the respondents upon this appeal are entitled to a judgment decreeing the respective transfers made by them to be void, and restoring them to their respective status either as the holder of a pass book investment certificate or as a mutual shareholder in the amount and as of the date of each exchange appearing upon the books of the association and the company. Each of those persons, the court continued, has established a valid claim, as such investor, against the appellants for the amount of his investment, the claim to be paid out of the special trust account and reserve fund of the association's assets established by the commissioner and in the due course of the administration of the liquidation proceedings by him. Judgment was entered accordingly.

The appellants now urge that as the facts found by the trial court clearly establish that the respondents did not appear upon the books of the association as investors at the time the commissioner took over the association and, under the applicable statute, only such investors are excused from filing claims, the trial court erred in rendering judgment for the respondents. But, in making this contention, say the respondents, the appellants are rearguing a question now res judicata by the decision upon the former appeal.

[1-3] It is a rule of general application that all questions and issues adjudicated on a prior appeal are the law of the case upon all subsequent appeals and will not be reconsidered. Wells v. Lloyd, 21 Cal.2d 452, 454-458, 132 P.2d 471; Blanton v. Curry, 20 Cal.2d 793, 801, 129 P.2d 1; Gore v. Bingaman, 20 Cal.2d 118, 121-123, 124 P.2d 17; Security-First Nat. Bank v. Marxen, 19 Cal.2d 100, 119 P.2d 131; Clayton v. Schultz, 18 Cal.2d 328, 115 P.2d 446; Penziner v. West American Finance Co., 10 Cal.2d 160, 74 P.2d 252. This doctrine applies to decisions of the District Courts of Appeal after they have become final. Wells v. Lloyd, supra, 21 Cal.2d at page 483, 132 P.2d 471; Gore v. Bingaman, supra, 20 Cal. 2d at page 122, 124 P.2d 17; United Dredging Co. v. Industrial Acc. Comm., 208 Cal. 705, 284 P. 922; Otten v. Spreckels, 183 Cal. 252, 191 P. 11; Hill v. Maryland Casualty Co., 28 Cal.App. 422, 152 P. 953. And even when, upon the second appeal, a court is convinced that the prior decision of a question of law was erroneous, it will refuse to reexamine that issue in the absence of unusual circumstances leading to injustice or unfairness. Wells v. Lloyd, supra, 21 Cal.2d at page 484, 132 P.2d 471; Gore v. Bingaman, supra, 20 Cal.2d at page 121, 124 P.2d 17; Penziner v. West American Finance Co., supra; Hoffman v. Southern Pac. Co., 215 Cal. 454, 11 P.2d 387; Newport v. Hatton, 207 Cal. 515, 279 P. 134; McEwen v. New York Life Ins. Co., 187

Cal. 144, 201 P. 577; Tally v. Ganahl, 151 Cal. 418, 90 P. 1049; see England v. Hospital of Good Samaritan, 14 Cal.2d 791, 795, 97 P.2d 813.

[4, 5] Considering the decision of the District Court of Appeal for the purpose of determining the extent to which the law of the case controls a determination of the present controversy, it appears that upon the first appeal, as here, the association and the commissioner attacked the respondents' complaint as insufficient to state a cause of action. Since the respondents alleged that they had exchanged their interests in the association for shares of the capital stock in the company, said the appellants, they no longer appeared upon the books of the association as investors, and consequently their claims were, by the express provisions of section 13.16, of the Building and Loan Act, supra, barred because of the failure to file the required claims with the commissioner. In ruling against this contention, the District Court of Appeal not only held that the complaint states a cause of action but that although they demand damages, "their complaint was answered and they may be awarded such relief as comes within the issues. Sec. 580, Code Civ.Proc. If they establish their claim as alleged, the trial court may find they are still the owners of their original certificates and, if so, they will then be entitled to present them to the defendant commissioner and share in subsequent dividends as provided in Act 986, supra. Section 13.16, paragraph 3, contains this sentence: 'Any investor, without presenting a claim, shall be entitled, as to any dividends hereafter declared, to share in such dividends to the extent, and in the proper relative order of priority, of any claim shown by the books of the association to exist in his favor against the association.'" Allen v. California Mut. B. & L. Ass'n, supra, 40 Cal.App.2d at page 379, 104 P.2d at page 854.

It is true, of course, that if the respondents' evidence does not prove the allegations of the complaint which was considered upon the former appeal, the doctrine of the law of the case does not apply. Archer v. City of Los Angeles, 19 Cal.2d 19, 29, 119 P.2d 1. And the appellants charge that although the findings of the trial court, in terms relate facts which the District Court of Appeal said were, in effect, pleaded by the respondents, they are not supported by the evidence.

It is not necessary to question the appellants' assertion that the withdrawals of the respondents' investments appeared by appropriate entries in the books of the association at the time the commissioner took over the association for the purpose of liquidation because the former decision clearly contemplates this situation. Under such circumstances, said the District Court of Appeal, if the respondents were defrauded, they are entitled to a decree declaring them still to be investors in the association, such restoration being effective as of the date of the exchange.

[6] And considering other evidence which is admitted by the appellants to be true, it is clear that the respondents have proved a case within the decision upon the prior appeal. Thus it is conceded that the company was organized to purchase the guarantee stock of the association then outstanding. In accordance with this plan, the association and the company fraudulently induced the respondents to agree to exchange their investments in the association for the capital stock of the company. To consummate the transaction, the respondents were induced to sign orders on the association for the withdrawal of their deposits. These they delivered to the stock salesmen together with their pass books. By appropriate entries the orders were subsequently credited to the purchase by the company of the guarantee stock of the association. And findings that the company did not receive any cash for the sale of its stock other than by means of the credits upon the purchase of the association's guarantee shares, or that the permits were not exhibited to the respondents as required by their terms, stand unquestioned.

The District Court of Appeal concluded that an order sustaining an objection to the introduction of any evidence upon the ground that the complaint does not state a cause of action is, in effect, the same as one granting a nonsuit. This holding places an order which is based upon the construction of a pleading in the same category as one predicated upon an evaluation of evidence. But eliminating thta procedural question from present consideration, the court held that thoe investors who, by reason of fraudulent representations, made transfers of their certificates, or amounts represented thereby, which appear upon the books of the association, continue to be "the owners of their original certificates." As such owners they are entitled to share in subsequent dividends declared by the commissioner.

It is difficult to follow that reasoning. Until 1935, the Building and Loan Association Act, supra, provided that "the claim of any investor, appearing upon the books of the association to be a valid claim," might be presented later than those of creditors or investors generally. Stats. 1933, p. 2719; Deering's Gen. Laws, 1933 Supp., Act 986, § 13.16. Effective September 15, 1935, "Any investor, without presenting a claim, shall be entitled, as to any dividends hereafter declared, to share in such dividends to the extent, and in the proper relative order of priority, of any claim shown by the books of the association to exist in his favor * * *." Stats. 1935, p. 1500; Deering's Gen. Laws, 1935 Supp., Act 986, § 13.16. If the District Court of Appeal correctly construed the statute, a commissioner endeavoring to liquidate an association will encounter many practical difficulties. How may he know whether any particular person whose name appears on the books of the association as having been, at one time, an investor, assigned his certificate by reason of fraudulent representations, or in a transaction in which there was a failure of consideration, or under other circumstances which enables him to later attack the transfer? And how far back in time must the commissioner go in scrutinizing the record of transfers?

[7-9] A fuller consideration of the question than could be given in connection with the petition for a hearing in this court of the prior appeal leads to the conclusion that the Legislature in 1935, and also by the prior enactment, intended to liberalize the statutory requirements for the filing of a claim in favor of one who, as admitted by the books of the association, was an investor of the institution at the time it was taken over by the commissioner. The purpose of a claim is to give the commissioner information concerning an indebtedness of the institution. If the books of the association show the indebtedness, said the Legislature, the investor should not be required to present a claim which duplicates the data on its own records. But to say that an investor whose withdrawal order or assignment of the certificate which evidenced his deposit of money has been recorded on the books of the association is still an investor according to those books, ignores the meaning of the statute and the obvious purpose of its enactment.

[10, 11] However, although the District Court of Appeal erroneously construed and applied these provisions of the Building and Loan Act, supra, the trial court's determination of the rights of the respondents, by following the law of the case, leads to no such result as is contemplated by the rule which allows an exception to that doctrine when an application of it would bring about an injustice. See England v. Hospital of Good Samaritan, supra, 14 Cal.2d at p. 791, 97 P.2d 813. On the merits, the respondents have the same rights to share in the proceeds of the liquidation as the plaintiffs in the Alexander case, who similarly exchanged investment certificates or mutual shares in the association for the capital stock of the company, and it appears that the commissioner has set aside an amount sufficient to pay their demands, on a pro rata basis, with those of the judgment creditors in the earlier litigation. Under these circumstances, as, by the law of the case, the evidence fully supports the judgment, the respondents are entitled to restoration to their respective interests as holders of investment certificates and as mutual shareholders in the association, and also to the dividends declared in the liquidation proceedings. Alexander v. State Capital Co., supra.

A second point which is urged as a ground for the reversal of the judgment is the trial court's ruling that the cause of action is not barred by the statute of limitations relied upon by the appellants, nor by laches. Assuming that the claim of each of the respondents appears upon the books of the company, say the appellants, that record shows him to be only a former investor, who, because of the alleged fraud has a cause of action either for damages or for restoration to his former status as an investor. In either case, they insist, the gravamen of the action is fraud. And, as a stockholder, each respondent is charged with notice of what was spread upon the records of the company; therefore, his cause of action is barred by the provisions of subdivision 4 of section 338 of the Code of Civil Procedure establishing a three year period of limitation for the commencement of an action for relief upon the ground of fraud.

[12-14] As a general rule, all questions presented by the record must be raised upon the first appeal from an adverse ruling, as thereafter all matters within the scope of the action and relevant to the issues will be deemed to have been concluded by the judgment. Moreover, in any later consideration of the controversy, it will be held that the judgment, by implication, if not directly, has determined all issues related to the subject matter and raised by proper pleadings. McCandless v. City of Los Angeles, 10 Cal.App.2d 407, 413, 52 P.2d 545; Texas Co. v. Moynier, 137 Cal.App. 112, 113, 29 P.2d 873; 5 C.J.S., Appeal and Error, § 1825, n. 97, p. 1279; and see Sutphin v. Speik, 15 Cal.2d 195, 202, 99 P.2d 652, 101 P.2d 497; Barrow v. Santa Monica B. Sup. Co., 9 Cal.2d 601, 606, 71 P.2d 1108; Andrews v. Reidy, 7 Cal.2d 366, 370, 371, 60 P.2d 832; Lanktree v. Lanktree, 6 Cal.2d 120, 122, 56 P.2d 943; Price v. Sixth Dist. Agricultural Ass'n, 201 Cal. 502, 511-513, 258 P. 387. The sufficiency of the second amended complaint, filed in February, 1936, was the substantial issue raised in the prior appeal. It charges that during the years 1929 to 1931 inclusive, by reason of the fraudulent representations of the association, the respondents exchanged their investments in it for stock of the State Capital Company. If it be assumed that the records of a corporation place its stockholders upon notice to the extent claimed by the appellants, the complaint does not state a cause of action but it is not now subject to attack.

[15, 16] Where it appears upon the face of the complaint that a cause of action is barred by the statute of limitations, and the statute is pleaded, a judgment may be rendered for the defendant if the case is submitted upon the pleadings. Wormouth v. Hatch, 33 Cal. 121; 16 Cal.Jur., Limitation of Actions, § 212, p. 618. The appellants, in their answer, have pleaded the provisions of section 338, subdivision 4 of the Code of Civil Procedure as barring the cause of action stated in the second amended complaint. If, therefore, the appellants' contention as to the notice given by the corporation's books is sound, the trial court properly entered judgment for them upon the pleadings. Implicit, therefore, in the order granting the respondents' motion for a new trial, which was affirmed upon appeal, is the holding that the cause of action is not barred by the statute of limitations. McCowen v. Pew, 18 Cal.App. 302, 123 P. 191, Reclamation Dist. No. 3 v. Goldman, 65 Cal. 635, 4 P. 676, and see 2 Cal.Jur., Appeal and Error, § 568, pp. 966, 967.

[17] Another reason which is urged as a ground for the reversal of the judgment, is that the respondents were notified of the fraudulent misrepresentations upon the receipt in December, 1931, of certificates of stock of the State Capital Company. Immediately upon receiving a certificate of stock, say the appellants, those who claim to have acted upon the representations of the association were put on notice that they had no right to withdraw their money from the company, for any such preference would have to be stated in the stock certificate. This argument admits the absence from the stock certificate of any express language that a stockholder might withdraw his investment in the State Capital Company. But even if he could be charged with knowledge based upon the statutory requirements, as to form, of a stock certificate, the discovery of the falsity of the statement concerning a right to withdraw did not give him notice that other representations concerning the Company were untrue.

[18] Nor does the fact that, after no dividend was declared in December, 1931, some of the respondents admittedly endeavored to obtain from the company's officers the amount of their investments, or that some of them joined a stockholders' committee which employed an attorney to protect their interests, necessarily compel a holding that the statute of limitations commenced to run as of that date. For the record shows that the officers of the association and the company countered the complaints of the respondents with explanations based upon the then current economic depression and promises of prospective earnings. This and other testimony in the record adequately supports the finding of the trial court that the respondents continued to rely upon the good faith, wisdom, and advice of the officers and directors respecting the two corporations and did not learn that the stock was valueless until the adjudication in bankruptcy of the company in March, 1933, and the publication two months later by the commissioner of the notice to creditors of the association.

[19] The appellants also rely upon the provision of section 348 of the Code of Civil Procedure that, when a building and loan association has become insolvent and is in the process of liquidation, "the statute of limitations shall be deemed to have commenced to run from the beginning of the process of liquidation." Since the Building and Loan Commissioner took over the assets of the California Building and Loan Association in January, 1933, they assert, this action, filed more than three years after that date, is barred by subdivision 4 of section 338 of the Code of Civil Procedure. But assuming, without deciding, that the process of liquidation, within the meaning of section 348, supra, commenced upon the date of the take-over by the commissioner, the appellants may not now raise the issue that the action is for that reason barred. For, the complaint shows the facts upon which the appellants' contention is based, and by their answer the statute now relied upon was pleaded as a defense. The issue was therefore before the trial court when it ruled upon the pleadings and is concluded by the affirmance of the order granting a new trial.

[20, 21] Concerning the equitable defense, it is well settled that delay alone does not constitute laches unless it is accompanied by circumstances from which prejudice may result. Alexander v. State Capital Co., 9 Cal.2d 304, 313, 70 P.2d 619, Gibson v. Mitchell, 9 Cal.2d 718, 725, 726, 72 P.2d 740, Security T. & S. Bank v. Southern Pac. R. R. Co., 214 Cal. 81, 88, 3 P.2d 1015, Wolpert v. Gripton, 213 Cal. 474, 483, 2 P.2d 767, Silver Burdett Co. v. State Board of Education, 36 Cal.App.2d 714, 719, 98 P.2d 533. Here, as was said in Alexander v. State Capital Co., supra [9 Cal.2d 304, 70 P.2d 623], "There is no suggestion * * * that the lapse of time resulted in any injury to the Building & Loan Association, nor has it been made to appear that by reason of lapse of time it is inequitable to enforce the demands of the respondents." And the unchallenged finding of the trial court is that the commissioner has created a special trust and reserve fund for the purpose of paying the respondents' claims should they be declared valid by the court.

[22, 23] In 1935, the provision which allowed "the claim of any investor, appearing upon the books of the association to be a valid claim, presented after the expiration of the" statutory time, to share in any subsequently declared dividend was relaxed to allow an investor, without filing a claim, to share in any dividend declared after the effective date of the amendment. The obvious purpose of the statute is to protect the investor whose creditor relation appears without contradiction upon the books of the association from losing his right to share in the liquidation of the insolvent organization's assets through negligence or inadvertence in failing to file a claim within the prescribed period. The use of the word "hereafter" expresses the legislative intention that the amendment should apply to dividends declared after September 15, 1935, its effective date, in the assets of associations then in the process of liquidation. As the first dividend of the California Building and Loan Association was declared on December 2, 1935, although none of the respondents filed a claim, each of them is entitled to share in the first and all subsequent dividends.

But the appellants assert that, under the decision upon the prior appeal, the respondents are not entitled to share in any liquidating dividends declared prior to the judgment establishing their claims. In support of their contention, they refer to the concluding paragraph of the opinion, which reads: "As the action must go back to the trial court for further proceedings, it should be stated that we notice the use of the word 'hereafter' in the statute we have just quoted. It is evidently a misprint for 'thereafter'. Any other construction would lead to absurd results. To illustrate, let us assume that since September 1, 1935, dividends have been declared and paid as provided in Act 986, supra. The sentence we have quoted took effect on the date last mentioned. According to the meaning of said sentence as it is written, all sums so paid would have to be recalled, reapportioned, and these plaintiffs included. As stated above that would be an absurdity. Construing the word as thereafter instead of hereafter, the sentence has a reasonable meaning. Those who delay in presenting their claims lose their rights to participate in dividends theretofore declared and paid, but after their claims have been presented, as in said sentence provided, they are then entitled to the rights provided therein."

[24] This discussion is obviously based upon the erroneous assumption that the presentation of a claim by the investor was still required under the 1935 amendment, and this in spite of the inclusion of the words "without presenting a claim" in the statute. And the doctrine of the law of the case does not require this court to follow an interpretation which is clearly obiter dictum. The statement of facts in the discussion, assumed for the purpose of illustrating the necessity of the court's construction of the statute, presupposed a situation where the commissioner paid out all of the liquidating dividends accruing subsequent to September 1, 1935, without establishing a reserve or trust account for the benefit of the investors who had not filed claims with him, and, consequently, to allow such investors to share in dividends already apportioned and paid in their entirety to the other creditors would have required the amounts paid to be recalled and reapportioned. But upon trial, the court found that the commissioner had created a trust account, for the benefit of the respondents, and had placed in it a ratable amount of each of the dividends he had theretofore declared from the proceeds on liquidation.

After decreeing that the respondents be restored as holders of passbook investment certificates in the appellant association, the judgment orders that each of them recover the amount of such investment certificate account and for costs, "with interests provided by his, or her, or their, respective investment certificate to date of payment." The appellants assert that interest is only payable up to the time of insolvency.

[25-28] When the Building and Loan Commissioner takes possession of the property, business and assets of a building and loan association which he deems to be in an insolvent or unsafe financial condition, his future action is not limited to the liquidation and distribution of its assets, but he may administer the affairs of the company so as to restore, if possible, its economic stability and then, consent to the association's resumption of business upon conditions approved by him. Stats.1931, ch. 269, pp. 539, 540; Deering's Gen. Laws, Act 986, § 13.11. If the association is allowed to resume business as a going concern, it should assume its continuing obligation to pay interest upon the deposits of its investors, even as to the period during which its assets were in the temporary control of the commissioner. But, if instead of restoring the property, business and assets to the association, the commissioner determines to liquidate them, the right of the investors to interest should be subject to the usual equitable principle governing liquidation, namely, equality among creditors. In the absence of an express statutory provision upon the matter, an investor in a building and loan association in the process of liquidation by the commissioner is not entitled to the payment of interest on his claim after the commencement of the liquidation proceeding, where the assets are insufficient to pay the principal of all claims in full. In re Pacific Coast Bldg.-Loan Ass'n, 15 Cal.2d 134, 147, 99 P.2d 251. Under this rule, as the respondents alleged and the court found that the assets and property of the association upon liquidation will enable its creditors and investors to receive approximately 65 cents on each dollar owed them, the determination concerning interest is erroneous.

[29] The determination of the commissioner to liquidate an association, after taking possession of its property, business, and assets, is evidenced by the filing of an inventory of its assets and the publication of notice to all persons having claims against it, whether as creditors or investors or otherwise, to present them within a specified period. Sec. 13.16. But by stipulation of the parties, they have agreed that liquidation of the association commenced on January 23, 1933. Accordingly, the judgment is modified by striking therefrom the words "to date of payment" (par. 3) and inserting in lieu thereof "to January 23, 1933," and as so modified, the judgment is affirmed, respondents to recover costs upon appeal.

GIBSON, C. J., and SHENK, CURTIS, and CARTER, JJ., concurred.

TRAYNOR, Justice (dissenting).

I dissent. The majority opinion concedes not only that plaintiffs failed to present a claim to the Building and Loan Commissioner pursuant to section 13.16 of the Building and Loan Association Act (Deering's Gen. Laws, Supp., Act 986) but that under a proper construction of the act they could not be regarded as investors excused from presenting claims since their claims did not appear on the books of the association. Plaintiffs are thus allowed to recover without complying with the statutory conditions to recovery. I do not agree that this paradox is compelled by the doctrine of the law of the case.

The first appeal in this action involved the sufficiency of the allegations of plaintiffs' second amended complaint. The present appeal involves the sufficiency of the evidence to support the findings and judgment. The opinion of the District Court of Appeal on the first appeal sets forth that paragraph III of the second amended complaint alleged that plaintiffs were investors within the meaning of section 13.16 of the Building and Loan Association Act (Deering's Gen. Laws, Supp., Act 986). It appears that defendants contended that there was an inconsistency between the specific allegation of paragraph X of the second amended complaint that plaintiffs exchanged their interests for shares of stock in the State Capital Company, and the general allegations of paragraph III, and that the specific allegation was controlling. Little v. Union Oil Co., 73 Cal.App. 612, 238 P. 1066; Aitken v. Stewart, 129 Cal.App. 38, 18 P.2d 988. The court declared that this contention would be persuasive if there were no other facts involved. "But there are many other allegations. The plaintiffs alleged that by the fraudulent misrepresentations of the defendant corporation they were induced to exchange securities, issued by the defendant corporation, for securities of State Capital Company, an agent of said defendant; that such exchange was not based on any consideration moving from plaintiffs to defendant; that the defendant corporation still holds the securities which the plaintiffs delivered to it; and that all of said facts appear on the books and records of said defendant. [Italics added.] In other words they alleged in effect that there was merely an exchange in form but not in fact, and that the transaction was a mere change in the form of accounts between the plaintiffs and the corporate defendant. Manifestly if these allegations are true, and the defendants' motions admitted the truth thereof, it is clear the plaintiffs are and at all times have been 'investors' in the defendant corporation. We are unable to say, therefore, that the plaintiffs' complaint did not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action." Allen v. California Mut. B. & L. Ass'n, 40 Cal.App.2d 374, 378, 379, 104 P.2d 851, 853.

It is clear from the foregoing that the second amended complaint was held to state a cause of action not simply because of the alleged fraud, but because all the facts showing the fraud and showing the exchange to be without consideration and merely an exchange in form, appeared on the books and records of the defendant. This allegation that all such facts appeared on the books and records of defendant relates to the terms of section 13.16 that an investor need not present a claim with respect to "any claim shown by the books of the association to exist in his favor against the association." Nothing in the record, however indicates that such facts appeared on defendant's books and records. The books of the defendant association showed that plaintiffs ceased to be certificate holders in the association between 1929 and 1931. The books of the State Capital Company showed that at about the same time plaintiffs became stockholders in that company. Plaintiffs do not state the nature of their action, but whether it is an action for rescission, for damages, or to quiet title, the claims asserted did not appear upon the books and records of the association. They are therefore barred by the provisions of the Building and Loan Association Act relating to the presentation of claims in liquidation.

The majority opinion does not rest with its interpretation of the opinion of the District Court of Appeal but extends the doctrine of the law of the case to issues that were not considered in that opinion. In the present appeal defendants contend that plaintiffs' rights are barred by the statute of limitations. The majority opinion holds that since the availability of this defense was established by the pleadings, the District Court of Appeal determined that the statute was inapplicable by holding the pleadings sufficient even though it does not mention the statute. It has long been settled in this state, however, that only issues considered in the earlier opinion become the law of the case. Trower v. City and County of San Francisco, 157 Cal. 762, 765, 109 P. 617; Tally v. Ganahl, 151 Cal. 418, 421, 90 P. 1049; Central Nat. Bank v. Peck, 15 Cal.App.2d 512, 59 P.2d 599; see Moore v. Trott, 162 Cal. 268, 273, 122 P. 462; Mattingly v. Pennie, 105 Cal. 514, 39 P. 200, 45 Am.St.Rep. 87; Cowell v. Snyder, 171 Cal. 291, 297, 152 P. 920; Klauber v. San Diego Street Car Co., 98 Cal. 105, 107, 32 P. 876. With two exceptions, the cases relied upon in the majority opinion involved res judicata, and the rule announced in relation to that doctrine has no application to the doctrine of the law of the case. The first of the two cases not concerned with res judicata, Texas Co. v. Moynier, 137 Cal.App. 112, 29 P.2d 873, holds merely that when a judgment is reversed with directions, the trial court must follow the directions. In the second, People v. Walton, 10 Cal.App.2d 413, 51 P.2d 1117, the court disposed of a question on the merits, noting that the opinion on a previous appeal had reached the same result. The doctrine of res judicata does not require a court to decide a case on an erroneous basis, as the law of the case does, and is therefore not so narrowly applied. Allen v. Bryant, 155 Cal. 256, 258, 100 P. 704; see England v. Hospital of Good Samaritan, 14 Cal.2d 791, 795, 97 P.2d 813; 2 Cal.Jur. 947. It is designed to make a judgment the final determination of a lawsuit by precluding the parties from presenting the same cause anew even when they have additional arguments. The decision that is the law of the case, however, is made in anticipation of further litigation, and is intended not as a final determination of the rights of the parties but as a guide upon retrial. It does not foreclose the consideration of new legal issues arising from changes in the evidence or pleadings (Cowell v. Snyder, supra; Bayer v. Barrett, 127 Cal.App. 305, 15 P.2d 801; 5 C.J.S., Appeal and Error, § 1964, p. 1508; 2 Cal.Jur. 951), and there is no reason why it should foreclose the presentation of issues not previously considered.

Where plaintiffs alleged ownership of land by adverse possession, defendant's specific allegation of ownership of water and water rights was directly contrary to plaintiffs' allegation of ownership and therefore was sufficient denial and placed both questions in issue. Code Civ.Proc. § 452.

4. Adverse possession 🔑114(1)

Plea of adverse possession must be sustained by the clearest and most satisfactory proof.

5. Adverse possession 🔑112

Plaintiffs who claimed land by adverse possession had burden of proving all elements necessary to establish such possession in manner and for time prescribed by law.

6. Adverse possession 🔑106(1)

The measure of a prescriptive right is the extent and manner of its use at time it accrued.

7. Adverse possession 🔑33, 85(1)

Plaintiffs who claimed land by adverse possession had burden of clearly proving open and notorious use, hostile and adverse to the original owner's title.

8. Adverse possession 🔑85(1)

Unless use by adverse possessors was so open and notorious and of such a nature as to impute knowledge and unless shown to have been adverse and not permissive, such use was "permissive" in absence of proof to the contrary.

See Words and Phrases, Permanent Edition, for all other definitions of "Permissive Use".

9. Quieting title 🔑47(2)

Where action to quiet title involved two parcels of property, and bond for deed, under which defendant claimed easement to water, covered only one parcel, findings that defendant was owner of water on one parcel and plaintiffs were owners of water on other were not inconsistent.

10. Trial 🔑397(1)

Generally, unless waived, full findings are required on all material issues. Code Civ.Proc. § 632.

11. Appeal and error 🔑1071(6)

A party cannot complain of failure to make findings when, if made, they must necessarily be adverse to him. Code Civ. Proc. § 632.

12. Appeal and error 🔑1071(6)

Where plaintiffs in action to quiet title failed to sustain burden of establishing elements necessary to establish ownership of water rights by adverse possession, plaintiffs could not complain of lack of finding on the question, since a finding, of necessity, would have had to be against plaintiffs. Code Civ.Proc. § 632.

One who has burden of proof on issue and who offers either no evidence or only slight evidence is not prejudiced by failure of trial court to find on such issue. Code Civ.Proc. § 632.

14. Judgment 🔑681

Where predecessors in interest of plaintiffs who claimed title to land, and of defendant who claimed right of easement for water, were parties to prior foreclosure action, there was "privity" of interest and the parties were bound by determination in foreclosure action that defendant's predecessors had certain water rights. Code Civ.Proc. § 1908.

See Words and Phrases, Permanent Edition, for all other definitions of "Privity".

In action to quiet title, judgment entered in favor of defendant's predecessors in interest for easement for water, in a prior foreclosure proceeding, was admissible under defendant's general allegation of ownership even though defendant did not specifically plead the judgment. Code Civ.Proc. § 1908.

A judgment necessarily affirming the existence of any fact is conclusive on the parties or their privies whenever existence of that fact is again at issue between them.

17. Judgment 🔑712

In action to quiet title wherein plaintiffs claimed title under sheriff's deed resulting from mortgage foreclosure and defendant claimed easement for water, decree in prior foreclosure action which found that defendant's predecessors were owners of water rights was admissible as evidence of defendant's title, even if decree were not conclusive. Code Civ.Proc. § 1908.

Appeal from Superior Court, Humboldt County; Harry W. Falk, Judge.

Action by Wilson E. Elliott and others against Clarence F. Bertsch to quiet title to land. From judgment quieting plaintiffs' title subject to certain easement to water in favor of the defendant, plaintiffs appeal.

Affirmed.

Hill & Hill, of Eureka, for appellant.

John F. Quinn, of Eureka, for respondent.

PEEK, Justice.

Plaintiffs appeal from a judgment quieting their title to certain real property subject to defendant's easement to the water on said land, and the further right to lay and maintain water pipes in connection with the use thereof.

Plaintiffs acquired title to the property by virtue of a sheriff's deed dated October 15, 1928, resulting from the foreclosure of a mortgage on the property in question. The right of easement claimed by the defendant had its source in a conditional sales agreement entitled "Bond for Deed", dated September 11, 1907. Plaintiffs' immediate predecessors in interest, the mortgagors under said mortgage, were the successors in interest of H. Johansen, who also was the grantor of the water and water rights to F. H. Bertsch and wife, the predecessors in interest of their son, the defendant herein.

The plaintiffs' complaint contained two causes of action, the first, following the usual quiet title procedure, alleged ownership and possession, while the second was based upon an allegation of adverse possession. The defendant's answer which denied plaintiffs' first cause of action made neither reference to nor denial of plaintiffs' allegation of adverse possession but affirmatively alleged ownership of certain water and water rights on the land.

At the conclusion of the hearing the court made its decree as previously mentioned. The plaintiffs thereupon proposed certain findings of fact and conclusions of law to the effect that the allegations in their complaint relative to their ownership and possession were true; that upon receipt of the sheriff's deed they had entered into possession of the premises and ever since have been in "actual, continuous, open, notorious, exclusive and adverse possession thereof, and used the waters thereon for the ordinary purposes of husbandry and paid all the taxes thereon."

Such proposed findings were rejected by the trial court with a statement in a memorandum of opinion particularly addressed to the question of adverse possession that: "I do not believe the evidence warrants such a finding. * * * In the present case the court has already found the easement of water rights was acquired by deed and there has been no use by the plaintiffs, the owner of the premises, which is adverse to the defendant's enjoyment of such right. * * *."

The Findings of Fact and Conclusions of Law, as signed by the court, in effect were as follows:

That the plaintiffs were the owners of certain real property described in the complaint except that the defendant was the owner of certain water rights and easements in relation thereto, and that the ownership of plaintiffs was subject to the rights of defendant. There was no finding on the question of adverse possession. The court then found as a conclusion of law that plaintiffs were entitled to a decree quieting their title to the real property subject to defendant Bertsch's interest in the water and water rights, and gave judgment accordingly.

Numerous questions are raised by plaintiffs in this appeal, (1) that the finding that defendant was the owner of all water rights on said property was not sustained, for by the failure to answer plaintiffs' second cause of action defendant admitted the adverse possession of plaintiffs; (2) that even if that were not the law, the adverse possession of plaintiffs was established by uncontradicted evidence; (3) that the findings are inconsistent in that both parties are found to be the owners of the water and water rights; (4) that the trial court refused to make a finding on the issue of adverse possession which was a material issue in plaintiffs' complaint; (5) that the admission of the judgment roll in the previous foreclosure proceedings was error and prejudicial to plaintiffs; (6) indefiniteness of the interest of defendant in the property included in the original contract of sale to support a finding that defendant had any interest therein, and (7) a lack of evidence that the terms of said agreement had been fulfilled.

[1-3] Defendant answers plaintiffs' first contention by stating that the affirmative allegation contained in his answer as regards the water is directly contrary to plaintiffs' allegation of adverse possession and therefore such affirmative defense placed in issue the entire question. Though defendant's allegation is more of an argument than a denial it is contrary to plaintiffs' allegation and is the equivalent of a direct denial. It is not essential that a traverse should be expressed in negative words, since in the construction of a pleading, for the purpose of determining its effect, its allegations must be liberally construed with a view to substantial justice between the parties. Section 452, C.C.P; Perkins v. Brock, 80 Cal. 320, 22 P. 194. "It may be said, generally, that any allegation in an answer which, if found to be true, necessarily shows that the allegation of the complaint as to the same matter is untrue, is a good traverse and sufficient as a denial." Burris v. People's Ditch Co., 104 Cal. 248, 37 P. 922, 923. The defendant pleaded specifically his ownership of the water and water rights. Such allegation was directly contrary to plaintiffs' allegation of ownership, and therefore, according to the above rule, was a sufficient denial and placed both questions in issue.

[4-8] Plaintiffs insist that regardless of the pleadings the evidence of their adverse possession is uncontradicted. It must be admitted that no one should be deprived of his property upon a plea of adverse possession unless such plea is sustained by the clearest and most satisfactory proof. That burden was upon the plaintiffs to prove all of the elements necessary to establish adverse possession in the manner and for the time prescribed by law. An examination of the record in the present case discloses that the plaintiffs' case consisted of the testimony of the plaintiff, Wilson E. Elliott, that they had been in possession of the property since the date of the sheriff's deed; that they had paid all of the taxes, and upon such proof they rested their case. Upon cross-examination Elliott admitted he had dug a well and erected a windmill, had placed a trough where water seeped in, and dug a ditch. No showing was made as to the amount of water used, nor the beneficial purposes and the reasonable necessity therefor, if any, for which it was used, nor if the use was continuous or seasonal, all of which was essential to his case. The measure of a prescriptive right is the extent and manner of its use at the time it accrued. 25 Cal.Jur. 1152, 1155, 1161. The plaintiffs had the further burden of clearly proving all of the other essential elements necessary to establish their title by adverse possession, i. e. actual, open and notorious use, hostile and adverse to the original owner's title. 25 Cal.Jur. 1157, 1158; Crain v. Hoefling, 56 Cal.App.2d 437, 132 P.2d 882. Unless the use by plaintiffs was so open and notorious and of such a nature as to impute knowledge, and unless shown to have been adverse and not permissive, such use must be held to be permissive in the absence of proof to the contrary. Crain v. Hoefling, supra.

[9] Plaintiffs further complain that the findings are inconsistent in that the court finds both plaintiffs and defendant are entitled to the water in question. From our examination of the record we understand it to be that two parcels of property are involved, and that the "Bond for Deed" covered only one parcel; therefore, a finding that the defendant was the owner of the water on the one parcel and that plaintiffs were the owners of the water on the other, cannot be considered as inconsistent.

[10-13] Plaintiffs also contend that their allegation of adverse possession presented a material issue within the contemplation of Section 632 of the Code of Civil Procedure, and therefore it was mandatory upon the trial court to make a finding thereon. It is generally true that unless waived, full findings are required on all material issues, the exception being that a party cannot complain of a failure to make findings when, if made, they must necessarily be adverse to him. The evidence produced by plaintiffs failed to prove the elements necessary to establish ownership of the water by adverse possession. As the plaintiffs failed to sustain the burden which the law placed upon them of establishing each element of their case by satisfactory proof it is obvious that had the trial court found on this question such finding of necessity would have had to be against them, and therefore plaintiff cannot complain of the lack of such finding. Moore v. Hoar, 27 Cal.App.2d 269, 81 P.2d 226. It is also true that the one who has the burden of proof upon an issue and who offers either no evidence or only slight evidence is not prejudiced by a failure of the trial court to find on such issue. Pinheiro v. Bettencourt, 17 Cal.App. 111, 118 P. 941.

[14, 15] Nor does this court find merit in appellant's further contention as regards the introduction of certain evidence alleged to have been improper, to wit, the judgment roll in the foreclosure proceedings out of which the plaintiffs received their deed from the sheriff. The disposition made of this issue makes it unnecessary to discuss the remaining questions raised by plaintiffs. It would seem that the findings and decree in the foreclosure proceedings were properly introduced in evidence. The titles claimed to the property in dispute were hostile to each other. The predecessors in interest of both parties herein were parties to the antecedent foreclosure action and thereby established a definite privity of interest. Therefore they were bound by the determination of the court in the previous foreclosure action which found "that the defendants F. H. Bertsch and Elida Bertsch are the owners of a certain water right * * *." Section 1908, C.C.P. In alleging his cause of action in the present case defendant did not specifically plead the judgment entered in favor of his predecessors in interest in the 1927 foreclosure proceedings. He did, however, offer the earlier judgment in evidence, and it was accepted over plaintiffs' objection. Under defendant's general allegation of ownership it was properly admitted by the trial court. McKinley Bros. v. McCauley, 215 Cal. 229, 9 P.2d 298.

[16, 17] It is well settled that a judgment or decree necessarily affirming the existence of any fact is conclusive upon the parties or their privies whenever the existence of that fact is again at issue between them. In re Clark's Estate, 190 Cal. 354, 212 P. 622; Freeman on Judgments, Sections 249, 253. Even though this fact were not true, nevertheless the foreclosure proceedings would be competent evidence of defendant's title and therefore were properly admitted by the trial court. Chapman v. Moore, 151 Cal. 509, 91 P. 324, 121 Am.St.Rep. 130; Scott v. Warden, 111 Cal.

App. 587, 296 P. 95; Alamenda County Title Insurance v. United States F. & G. Co., 121 Cal.App. 73, 8 P.2d 912.

MANNON v. PESULA et al.

STANDISH et al. v. YORKVILLE LUMBER CO., Ltd.

Civ. 12411.

District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California.

July 8, 1943.

Hearing Denied Sept. 1, 1943.

1. Corporations ⚷298(1), 398(3)

Where corporation, by its president and secretary, who were majority stockholders, consented to sale of machinery in which corporation claimed an interest, sale was authorized, notwithstanding that no formal meeting authorizing sale was conducted.

2. Corporations ⚷426(9)

A corporation, by seeking to recover proceeds of sale of machinery in which it claimed an interest "ratified" the sale, even if sale was originally unauthorized.

See Words and Phrases, Permanent Edition, for all other definitions of "Ratify".

3. Liens ⚷7

Equity courts look with favor upon equitable liens, and frequently such liens are employed to do justice and to prevent unfair result.

4. Liens ⚷7

Where conditional sales contract whereby machinery, cutting rights and timber were to be sold provided that buyers should pay to bank certain amount for each 1,000 feet of lumber sold, the payments to be applied to extinguishment of certain debts of seller, contract impliedly gave seller's creditors whose debts were to be extinguished out of payments under contract an "interest" in machinery for security purposes in event buyers defaulted.

See Words and Phrases, Permanent Edition, for all other definitions of "Interest".

5. Contracts ⚷187(3)

Where conditional sales contract whereby machinery, cutting rights and timber were to be sold provided that buyers should pay to bank certain amount for each 1,000 feet of lumber sold, the payments to be applied to extinguishment of certain debts of seller, seller's creditors whose debts were to be extinguished out of payments under contract were "third party creditor beneficiaries" of the contract, and contract could be enforced by them. Civ. Code, § 1559.

See Words and Phrases, Permanent Edition, for all other definitions of "Third Party Creditor Beneficiary".

6. Sales ⚷479(2)

A default in terms of conditional sales contract by conditional buyer and repossession by conditional seller is not a "rescission" of the contract.

See Words and Phrases, Permanent Edition, for all other definitions of "Rescission".

7. Contracts ⚷272

Even if parties to conditional sales contract in which certain creditors of conditional seller were third party creditor beneficiaries could rescind contract at any time before creditor beneficiaries brought suit, evidence of buyer's default did not establish a "rescission" precluding third party creditor beneficiaries from enforcing the contract. Civ.Code, § 1559.

8. Contracts ⚷274

Where agreement was entered into by conditional seller of machinery, cutting rights and timber with certain creditors of seller whose debts would be extinguished out of payments under conditional sales contract, that in event of buyer's default, creditors should have a security interest in repossessed property, even a formal rescission of contract would not affect creditors' right to security interest in property.

9. Judgment ⚷251(1)

Fact that a party pleads an erroneous theory does not bar him from recovering, if he also pleads facts to support a proper theory of recovery.

Appeal from Superior Court, Mendocino County; W. D. L. Held, Judge.

Action in interpleader by Charles M. Mannon against Anna Pesula and others, wherein cross-complaints were filed by Yorkville Lumber Company, Ltd., Allan Standish, Henry B. Hickey, and Emma R. Hickey, as executor and executrix of the estate of H. B. Hickey, deceased. From a judgment in favor of Yorkville Lumber Company, Ltd., Allan Standish and Henry B. Hickey and Emma R. Hickey, as executor and executrix of the estate of H. B. Hickey, deceased, appeal.

Reversed.

R. Clarence Ogden, of San Francisco, for appellants.

Harry W. Falk, Jr., and Charles Kasch, both of Ukiah, for respondent.

PETERS, Presiding Justice.

Charles M. Mannon brought this action in interpleader to determine conflicting claims to the sum of $1,975.31, the proceeds from the sale by Mannon of certain sawmill machinery and equipment. The conflicting claimants, each of whom filed cross complaints, are Yorkville Lumber Company, Ltd., in whose favor the trial court found, and H. B. Hickey and Allan Standish, the appellants. Hickey has since died and his executors have been substituted. Others were named as defendants but were either never served or have defaulted.

The facts are as follows: In 1932 C. J. Pesula and N. P. Burgess entered into a partnership for the purpose of cutting and manufacturing into lumber certain timber growing on lands then owned by Miles Standish. Miles Standish died and Allan Standish and H. B. Hickey became the owners of the timberland. In May of 1932 Standish and Hickey entered into a written agreement with Pesula, who was acting on behalf of the partnership, under which Pesula was to harvest timber on the Standish and Hickey lands and to manufacture it into lumber there. It was contemplated that Pesula and Burgess would construct a sawmill on the premises. The agreement provided that from the proceeds of the sale of the lumber Standish and Hickey were to be paid $1 per thousand feet of lumber sold; Pesula was to receive $1 per thousand feet to amortize the cost of the sawmill; operating expenses were to be paid, the balance divided equally between the contracting parties.

Pesula and Burgess did not have sufficient capital to purchase and install the sawmill. The construction of the mill and the purchase of the required machinery were almost entirely financed through loans from the Savings Bank of Mendocino County. The first loan from the bank was secured in July of 1932. The bank was unwilling to lend the money without security. Standish and Hickey agreed to and did give the bank as security a deed to the timberland, intending it as a mortgage. This was in accordance with an oral arrangement between Pesula and Burgess, and Standish and Hickey. When Pesula and Burgess needed more money the bank was unwilling to make further loans without more security. In August, 1932, Hickey pledged with the bank his personal collateral of a value of $10,000 as additional security for the Pesula-Burgess loans. Further loans were made until in November, 1932, Pesula and Burgess owed the bank $9,000.

The payment of these loans was admittedly the primary obligation of Pesula and Burgess. A large portion of the money secured from the bank was used to install and build the sawmill, and to make payments thereon to the sellers. Burgess testified that some portion of the purchase price had been advanced by him and Pesula, but he was unable to remember or estimate the amount that had been so contributed. The only reasonable inference from the evidence is that the borrowed funds paid for the major portion of purchase price and installation of the machinery and equipment, the proceeds from the sale of which are the subject of the present action.

The construction of the sawmill was completed in November, 1932, and operations began. At about this time Pesula and Burgess organized a corporation, the respondent Yorkville Lumber Company, Ltd., to take over operations. It was intended that this corporation should issue 250 shares. A permit was secured from the Corporation Commissioner which provided for the issue of 247 shares to be divided equally between Pesula and Burgess in exchange for a transfer by them of their cutting rights to the timber and interest in the machinery and equipment. The other three shares were to be issued for $100 per share. Certificates for one share each in the names of Pesula, Burgess and Mannon (plaintiff herein) were prepared and detached from the stock book, and thereafter retained in the law office of Mannon who had handled the incorporation. The three men constituted the board of directors and officers of the corporation. Mannon was also president of the bank that had made the loans above described. The $100 a share required by the permit was not paid for these three shares. What was done about the other 247 shares is not shown by the record. It is admitted that Pesula and Burgess at no time formally executed a transfer of the cutting rights to the timber or of their interest in the sawmill to the corporation. It is admitted by all here concerned, however, that after the corporation was organized it thereafter conducted operations on the lands, and both parties to this appeal discuss the rights of the parties as if Yorkville Lumber Company, Ltd., subsequent to its formation, owned the machinery in question. It is apparent that Pesula and Burgess were the beneficial owners of the corporation, and that the recovery by the Yorkville Company in the present action is, in effect, recovery by Pesula and Burgess.

In February, 1933, the Yorkville Company increased its loan from the bank to $12,000 for which the corporation executed two $6,000 notes, the old Pesula and Burgess notes being surrendered. Standish and Hickey had agreed with the bank that the deed, and the Hickey pledge of collateral, should be security for the indebtedness of the Yorkville Company to the bank.

In June of 1934 the Yorkville Company borrowed $5,000 from Standish, for which it gave Standish its promissory note. Thus, at this time, the land and timber of Standish and Hickey were mortgaged to secure the $12,000 indebtedness of the Yorkville Company to the bank. In addition, Hickey had pledged collateral of a value of $10,000 to secure that indebtedness, and Standish had loaned the company $5,000. Although the machinery and equipment had been largely, if not entirely, purchased and installed with these borrowed funds, title thereto was in the Yorkville Company, and Standish and Hickey and the bank had no written evidence of any lien thereon for security.

In the fall of 1934 the Yorkville Company ceased operating the mill, having found the operation not profitable. Nothing had ever been paid to Standish and Hickey under the agreement whereby they were to receive $1 per thousand feet of lumber manufactured and sold. All sums received from the sale of the lumber were paid to the bank to be applied on the loan or were used in paying for operations. After operations ceased in 1934 some lumber was thereafter sold and the proceeds paid to the bank. In March of 1936 the Yorkville Company's debt to the bank had been reduced to $9,200.

Prior to March of 1936 Standish and Hickey incorporated under the name of Standish & Hickey, Ltd., and apparently conveyed title to the timberlands to this company. No facts concerning this incorporation appear in the record, but it is apparent that Standish and Hickey were the beneficial owners of that company, and that it may be treated as the alter ego of those two men, and it is so treated by the parties here involved.

On March 31, 1936, a written agreement was entered into between the Yorkville Company and Standish & Hickey, Ltd., as first parties, and R. E. Williams and H. B. Hickey, Jr., as second parties. H. B. Hickey, Jr., is the son of Hickey, who, with Standish, owned the land. This agreement is the basis of appellants' claim to the proceeds from the sale of the machinery. It recites that Standish & Hickey, Ltd., owns the timber on the lands in question subject to the cutting rights of the Yorkville Company, and that the last named company owns the cutting rights and the machinery located on the land, and that the Yorkville Company is indebted to the Savings Bank of Mendocino County. It provides that the first parties agree to sell and the second parties agree to buy the timber, sawmill, machinery, appliances, tools and accessories. The second parties agree to prosecute lumbering operations diligently and to pay the bank $3 for each thousand feet of lumber sold and shipped from the sawmill until 9,000,000 feet shall have been paid for, or all the timber manufactured and sold. If there are more than 9,000,000 feet, all footage over that figure is to be paid for at the rate of $1.00 per thousand feet. As to the disposition of the money paid to the bank the agreement provides:

"Said Savings Bank of Mendocino County shall apply all moneys received by it hereunder to the extinguishment of the debt owing to it by Yorkville Lumber Company, and the debt owing to Allan M. Standish by Yorkville Lumber Company and thereafter shall apply all moneys received hereunder as jointly directed by Yorkville Lumber Company, Ltd., and Standish & Hickey, Ltd."

It is then provided that "first parties [which includes Standish and Hickey as well as the Yorkville company] reserve title to all property covered by this contract" except that title to the lumber shall pass to second parties at the time of manufacture; that first parties agree that on the fulfillment of the contract they will execute a bill of sale to the personal property to second parties; that if second parties default, first parties shall be released from all obligations and second parties shall forfeit all right to the property, and all payments made by the second parties prior to such default shall be retained by the first parties as rent for the use of the premises and equipment and as compensation for the lumber. The agreement is signed by Standish & Hickey, Ltd., by H. B. Hickey, president, and A. M. Standish, Secretary; by Williams, and Hickey, Jr., and by the Yorkville Lumber Co., Ltd., by C. J. Pesula, President, and Charles M. Mannon, Secretary. Burgess did not approve this transaction, and did not sign the agreement.

Hickey, Jr. and Williams went into possession under this agreement and operated for some time. Pursuant to the agreement they paid to the bank several thousand dollars at the rate required in the agreement, which was applied by the bank to the loan due it. In May of 1937 Hickey, Jr., and Williams discontinued operations. The contract provided a formal means of default by which such default was to be "conclusively established." That means was not adopted by Hickey, Jr. and Williams. They simply ceased operations and moved off the premises. There can be no doubt but that they defaulted under the contract. They make no claim to any part of the proceeds from the sale of the equipment.

Early in June, 1937, a meeting was held at Mannon's office to determine what should be done. Mannon, Ogden, attorney for appellants, Pesula, Hickey, Sr., Hickey, Jr., one Peterson who represented Williams, and apparently Burgess, were present. At that time Hickey, Jr., and Williams (and the Yorkville Company) owed the bank $7,240.54. Mannon and Allan Standish testified that all parties present agreed that the mill equipment should be sold by Mannon for the best price he could get, and that he should be the judge of the price. It was further agreed, according to Mannon, that the proceeds from the sale shoud be applied to the debts of the Yorkville Company, to the bank and to Standish. Burgess participated in the discussion and "didn't protest" against the above agreement, according to Mannon. This testimony of Mannon was corroborated by several of the others then present. Burgess testified he could not remember the meeting of June, 1937, that he may or may not have been there. He further testified that he had an informal understanding with Mannon that the latter could attempt to find a purchaser, but that no price was set, and Mannon was to consult the stockholders if he got a buyer. Thereafter, Mannon took charge of the property and sent several prospective purchasers to look it over. He was unable to immediately find a purchaser. In October, 1938, the bank refused to wait longer for its money. It paid the debt owing to it by the Yorkville Company by the sale of the Hickey collateral, and the notes of the Yorkville Company were marked "paid" and delivered to Hickey, Sr.

Mannon finally found a purchaser for the machinery and equipment in April of 1940, and it was sold to him for slightly less than $2,000. Before he completed the sale Mannon communicated with Pesula's attorney and with Standish. He was not sure whether he communicated with Hickey, Jr., and Williams. He had also written to Burgess enclosing a form of consent. He received no reply from Burgess. On April 18, 1940, he completed the sale. A dispute having arisen over who was entitled to the money, he instituted this suit in May, 1941.

The trial court found that Mannon had no authority to sell the machinery, and that the sale constituted a conversion. The finding of conversion is immaterial. No personal judgment was sought against Mannon. During the trial a stipulation, signed by the attorneys for appellants and respondent, was introduced in evidence which provided that Mannon could deposit the sums received by him with the clerk of the court and "be discharged from all liability to all defendants herein."

The finding that Mannon had no authority to sell, insofar as it affects the rights of any of the litigants now before the court, is unsupported by the evidence. It is true that Burgess testified that he did not give his consent to the sale, but his personal consent was not required. Pesula and Mannon were two of the three directors of the Yorkville Company. They were also president and secretary of that company, and between them controlled a majority of the stock. They consented to the sale. Standish and Hickey, Sr., Williams and Hickey, Jr., also consented.

[1] The fact that Burgess may or may not have been present at the June, 1937, meeting, and the fact that he did or did not consent to the sale, are false issues. The Yorkville Company was present in the persons of its president and secretary. They consented. It is true that the meeting was not conducted formally as a meeting of the Yorkville Company, nor were minutes kept, but two directors, the majority stockholders, and the president and secretary consented. Burgess had opposed the decision of Pesula and Mannon to have the Yorkville Company enter into the Hickey, Jr.-Williams contract, but it is not contended that such agreement was not binding on the Yorkville Company by reason of the concurrence of the two other directors.

[2] There is another reason why Burgess' failure to consent is immaterial. This is a contest over the proceeds of the sale, with the Yorkville Company claiming on one hand, and Standish and Hickey claiming on the other. It is not an action for conversion nor to set aside the sale and recover the property. By seeking to recover the proceeds of the sale, the Yorkville Company has necessarily ratified that sale, even if it was unauthorized originally as to that company by reason of the absence of consent by Burgess. The classic example of ratification occurs where an agent has sold without authority, and the principal, instead of repudiating the sale, ratifies by suing for the purchase price. (See cases collected 1 Cal.Jur. p. 774, § 67.) The Yorkville Company, by laying claim to the proceeds of the sale, ratified the sale.

On the evidence above summarized the trial court found that the Yorkville Company on April 18, 1940, was the owner and entitled to possession of the sawmill, machinery and equipment, that Standish and Hickey had no interest therein, and that the Yorkville Company was entitled to the proceeds of the sale. It was the position of the trial court, and it is the position of the Yorkville Company on this appeal, that the situation is one where title to the machinery was in the Yorkville Company, and Standish and Hickey failed to protect themselves by taking a lien thereon.

[3] The facts present a somewhat unusual situation. The sawmill equipment was purchased and installed almost entirely with funds of Standish and Hickey. Pesula and Burgess may have contributed an undetermined amount and may have contributed their time, but the major portion of the cost was paid for by Standish and Hickey. The loans from the bank and the $5,000 loan from Standish were obtained with the express understanding that the funds should be invested in the sawmill. In addition, the timber belonging to Standish and Hickey has been cut and they have not received one cent therefor. Standish and Hickey, as well as the Yorkville Company, hoped to share in the profits of the venture. The funds were so invested, but did not yield the contemplated profit. All that is left of the venture is the proceeds from the sale of the machinery. Standish was never repaid, and the bank loans were satisfied through the sale of the Hickey collateral. The result is that the funds and property of Standish and Hickey have purchased the machinery. Even if the debts owed by the Yorkville Company to Standish and Hickey are barred by the statute of limitations, as respondent contends but did not prove, it would seem that under the circumstances the powers of equity are broad enough to create an equitable lien on the proceeds of the sale of the equipment. Those proceeds are far less than the total sum owing from the Yorkville Company to Standish and Hickey. The equity courts look with favor upon equitable liens, and frequently such liens are employed to do justice and equity and to prevent unfair results. Carter v. Holt, 28 Cal.App. 796, 154 P. 37; Hurley v. Atchison, Topeka & Santa Fe Ry., 213 U.S. 126, 29 S.Ct. 466, 53 L.Ed. 729; Red Bud Realty Co. v. South, 96 Ark. 281, 131 S.W. 340; Pacific Ready Cut Homes v. Title I. & T. Co., 216 Cal. 447,

[4] It is not necessary, however, to rely solely on the theory of an equitable lien in order to conclude that Standish and Hickey had an interest in the machinery. The contract of March 31, 1936, reasonably interpreted, gave them such an interest. That contract was between the Yorkville Company, Standish & Hickey, Ltd., which was the alter ego of Standish and Hickey, and Hickey, Jr., and Williams. This contract describes the Yorkville Company as the owner of the machinery and cutting rights, and Standish & Hickey, Ltd., as the owner of the timber. It was primarily a conditional sales contract whereby the machinery, cutting rights, and timber were to be sold to Hickey, Jr., and Williams. But the contract also conferred certain important rights on Standish and Hickey. It provided that the buyers should pay to the bank $3 for each thousand feet of lumber sold. This payment was the consideration for timber, as well as for the machinery. The payments made to the bank under this contract were to be applied to the extinguishment of the Yorkville Company's debt to the bank (to which Hickey has been subrogated) and to the $5,000 debt owing by the Yorkville Company to Standish. It must be remembered that the Yorkville Company had completely ceased operations in 1934. Obviously, Standish and Hickey were unwilling that the buyers under the conditional sales contract should go into possession of their timber or of the machinery that their money had purchased unless some provision was made for their protection. The provisions that the buyers should pay the bank, and the bank should apply the money to the Yorkville Company's debts, were patently designed to give Standish and Hickey the protection they needed. To that extent it was an agreement between the Yorkville Company and Standish & Hickey, Ltd., whereby Standish and Hickey were to have security for their respective claims. It is a clear implication from the agreement that the bank (and therefore Hickey) and Standish were given an interest in the machinery and equipment for security purposes in the event that the buyers defaulted. When the buyers did default the interest which the bank (and therefore Hickey) and Standish had in the consideration to be paid by the buyers, attached to the property which had been the subject of that contract. When the contract is considered as a whole, and in the light of its background, this construction is reasonable and fair and in no way strained. It is fortified by the agreement made in Mannon's office in 1937, to the effect that he should sell the machinery and apply the proceeds to the Yorkville Company's debts to the bank and to Standish.

The situation is simply, one where Standish and Hickey have entered into a contract with the Yorkville Company that the bank and they shall have an interest in the consideration to be paid by the conditional buyers for the lumber and machinery. By clear and reasonable implication the bank and Standish and Hickey were given an interest in the property for security purposes which attached when the conditional buyers defaulted. When Mannon sold the property, Standish, and Hickey as successor to the bank's interests, were entitled to the proceeds of the sale in payment of their claims. It is unnecessary to determine the relative rights of Standish and Hickey because they have agreed that judgment may be entered in their favor without such division.

[5] Appellants also contend that they were third party creditor beneficiaries of the 1936 contract. That is undoubtedly true. Williams and Hickey, Jr., instead of paying the Yorkville Company and Standish & Hickey, Ltd., for the lumber and machinery, were to pay the bank for the benefit of the bank and Standish, both being creditors of the Yorkville Company. The contract expressly provided that the bank (to whose rights Hickey has been subrogated) and Standish should be paid by Williams and Hickey, Jr. The contract was therefore expressly for their benefit and may be enforced by them. § 1559, Civil Code. But the contract was more than an ordinary third party creditor beneficiary contract. As already pointed out, there was a contract between Standish and Hickey and the Yorkville Company by which the latter expressly agreed, for the protection of the former, that the bank and Standish should have an interest for security purposes in the consideration to be paid by Hickey, Jr., and Williams, and by necessary implication agreed that such security interest should attach to the property in case of default by Hickey, Jr., and Williams.

[6-8] The respondent argues that if Standish and Hickey were third party beneficiaries of the 1936 contract, the contracting parties have rescinded, which they may legally do, without the consent of the third party. Section 1559 of the Civil Code does provide that a third party beneficiary may enforce the contract "at any time before the parties thereto rescind it." It is argued that this section recognizes the right of the contracting parties to rescind prior to attempted enforcement by the creditor beneficiary. The theory of respondent is that when Hickey, Jr., and Williams failed to complete the contract there was, in effect, a rescission, which terminated the rights of the bank and Standish as third party creditor beneficiaries. If it be assumed, as contended by respondent, that the contracting parties may rescind any time before the creditor beneficiary brings suit, there was no rescission in the instant case. A default by a conditional buyer and repossession by the seller is not a rescission. Moreover, for reasons already stated, this was not an ordinary creditor beneficiary contract. In addition, there was a contract between the Yorkville Company and Standish and Hickey that in the event of default the bank and Standish should have a security interest in the repossessed property. The default by Hickey, Jr., and Williams was the very event which brought this implied term of the contract into operation. Even a formal rescission would not affect that provision.

[9] Respondent also urges that under the allegations of their cross complaint appellants may not recover except on the theory of pledge, and that such theory is unsound. The theory of the cross complaint is that when the Yorkville Company ceased operations in 1934 Standish and Hickey went into possession of the land and equipment; that when the 1936 contract was made, Hickey, Jr. and Williams, besides being conditional buyers, were pledgeholders of the equipment as security for the debts of the Yorkville Company to the bank and Standish; that when Mannon went into possession in 1937 he did so as pledgeholder; that he sold the property as pledgeholder. This theory is quite artificial, and we agree with respondent that it was properly rejected by the trial court. It is not urged by appellants on this appeal. The fact that appellants pleaded an erroneous theory, however, does not bar them from recovery, if they also pleaded facts to support a proper theory of recovery. The answer and cross complaint of the Yorkville Company alleges that that company owns and is entitled to the possession of the machinery and the proceeds from its sale. In their answer to this cross complaint appellants deny these allegations. The contract of 1936 is pleaded as an exhibit to the pleading of appellants. Respondent was clearly informed that that contract formed the basis of appellants' claim. If, on any theory, that contract gives appellants any right to the proceeds of the sale (as we have already held it did), appellants are entitled to urge that theory.

The judgment appealed from is reversed.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; O. K. Morton, Judge.

Action by California Employment Commission, formerly Unemployment Reserves Commission, against Los Angeles Down Town Shopping News Corporation, for unemployment fund contributions. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals.

Affirmed.

Gibson, Dunn & Crutcher, Henry F. Prince, all of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Robert W. Kenny, Atty. Gen., and Clarence A. Linn, Deputy Atty. Gen. (Forrest M. Hill and Doris H. Maier, both of Sacramento, of counsel), for respondent.

W. J. WOOD, Justice.

Defendant has appealed from a judgment enterd in favor of California Employment Commission for the amount of contributions due to the unemploymen fund for the period from January 1, 1936, to and including December 31, 1938. The statute of limitations barred recovery for any earlier period. Defendant does not dispute the amount of the judgment, but it contends that its carrier boys were not in such "employment" as is defined by the California Unemployment Insurance Act, Chapter 352, Statutes of 1935, p. 1226, as amended. It contends that the carriers in question were independent contractors and not employees.

Since 1922 defendant corporation has been engaged in the publication and distribution of a paper known as Los Angeles Down Town Shopping News, devoted to the advertising of retail merchandise. The paper had no subscribers, free delivery being maintained throughout the city of Los Angeles, and approximately 1,000 carriers were employed by defendant at wages varying from $2 to $2.50 per week. Most of the carriers were persons under the age of 18 years who attended school and were required to obtain permits to do the work. The compensation of each carrier was based upon the number of papers he delivered and the character of his route. The papers were required to be delivered by 8 a. m. on Wednesday and by 9 a. m. on Saturday but at times "specials" were to be delivered and for this purpose the carriers were permitted to employ helpers. The carriers themselves were hired directly by defendant. They had no personal interest in their routes and could not sell them. The routes could be changed and realigned as the defendant saw fit.

The papers were delivered by a company truck to a specified place on the carrier's route usually his home, early in the morning of the delivery date or in the previous evening. The carriers placed the papers in bags furnished by defendant and started on their routes. Inspectors employed by the company checked on the time the carriers started and the number of papers received. Upon completion of their routes the carriers returned to the specified location and signed check-out sheets stating the number of papers brought back or the number short. The bags were then deposited. If complaints were made concerning delivery of the papers the carriers were required to remedy the situation.

Carriers received both oral and written instructions. They were required to fold the papers and leave one at each single dwelling. At flat buildings, double houses and bungalow courts a folded paper was required to be placed behind the door knob. Carriers were required to return unused papers to the inspector and to sign reports concerning their work. They were instructed not to deliver papers to vacant premises or at any house under construction or at premises which had signs requesting no advertising. They were not allowed to walk across lawns or flower beds and were prohibited from taking dogs with them. They were not allowed to use automobiles, motorcycles, bicycles or roller skates on the routes. Carriers were required to have social security numbers.

[1, 2] The important test by which to determine whether a person is acting as an independent contractor or as an employee involves an answer to the question whether the person is subject to the orders and control of another party. The important element is the right of control, whether that right be exercised or not. Baugh v. Rogers, 138 P.2d 757, filed in this court June 16, 1943; Chapman v. Edwards, 133 Cal.App. 72, 24 P.2d 211; Hillen v. Industrial A. C., 199 Cal. 577, 250 P. 570. In the instant case defendant had the right of control and in fact exercised control. Instructions were given by defendant and followed by its carriers as to how, when and where the papers were delivered. The carriers were required to check in and out, to make reports concerning their work and were subject to discharge if the instructions of the employer were disobeyed. The evidence is ample to sustain the finding of the trial court that defendant "had the right of potential and actual control over said carriers as to the manner and means of the performance of their work".

Defendant cites cases in which a number of those who are usually called "newsboys" were held to be independent contractors. But the facts in the cases cited are distinguishable from the facts of the present case, particularly in the circumstances that the newsboys bought the papers from the publishers and sold them for their own account. Bohanon v. James McClatchy Publishing Company, 16 Cal.App.2d 188, 60 P.2d 510; Batt v. San Diego Sun Publishing Co. Ltd. 21 Cal.App.2d 429, 69 P.2d 216. A case more nearly in point is Globe Indemnity Co. v. Industrial A. C., 208 Cal. 715, 284 P. 661, where the carrier was held to be an employee under circumstances which were more favorable to those contending for the relationship of independent contractor than are the circumstances in the instant case.

Plaintiff presents the additional contention that in determining whether the carriers were in "employment" under the provisions of the Unemployment Insurance Act the rules fixing the status of an employee and of an independent contractor as used in proceedings before the Industrial Accident Commission and in tort actions are not applicable. Reference is made to section 7 of the Act, as originally enacted, which provides: "An 'employment,' means any employment by an employer who is subject to this Act * * * under any contract of hire, express or implied, oral or written, * * *". Plaintiff points to the absence in the Act of the definitions of employee and independent contractor which appear in the Labor Code and argues that the question whether an employee was at a given time under the complete control of the employer is immaterial in view of the general purpose of the Act to promote the general welfare and alleviate the evils of unemployment. Since we are holding that the carriers were under the complete control of their employer, it is unnecessary to pass upon this additional contention.

[3, 4] To be entitled to unemployment benefits at the time involved in this action a person must have earned in the preceding year not less than $156. It is argued by defendant that the carriers did not come within the terms of the Act for the reason that they were not earning sufficient sums to enable them to obtain the benefits of the Act. Some of the employees were, however, earning sufficient sums from other work to make them eligible to receive present benefits under the Act. It is the duty of the state treasurer to conserve the funds collected for use as need might arise, which might be at some date far in the future. The Act makes no exceptions which would relieve defendant from making the payments, the only exception for minors being found in section 7 subd. (d) of the Act, which exempts from "employment" services performed by a child under the age of 21 in the employ of his father or mother. In effect defendant asks the court to read into the statute an exception which was not placed therein by the legislature. Although the courts in proper circumstances interpret doubtful expressions of the legislature they may not add to or alter the statute or depart from the manifest legislative intent.

The judgment is affirmed.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Goodwin J. Knight, Judge.

Action by Wiley J. Kerr against Horace J. Smith and others on behalf of corporations, in which plaintiff allegedly is a stockholder, to have various funds and properties returned to the corporation. From a judgment for defendants, plaintiff appeals.

Affirmed.

Joseph D. Taylor, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

A. L. Abrahams and Frank H. Love, both of Los Angeles, for respondents.

W. J. WOOD, Justice.

In his complaint plaintiff alleges that he is a stockholder in defendant corporations and that the corporations have been defrauded by the acts of the individual defendants. He alleges that "this action is brought by plaintiff for and on behalf of said corporations and its stockholders after demand was made upon the corporation to bring the action". He asks that various funds and properties be returned to the corporations and that he be allowed attorney fees in the sum of $20,000. He is prosecuting this appeal from a judgment in favor of defendants.

[1] The trial court found that plaintiff is not and was not at the time of the commencement of the action, the owner of any stock in the corporations. This finding is supported by substantial evidence.

A gas heater business which had been conducted by Eva A. Sproat was in 1930 purchased by one Henry H. Nelson, who is not a party to this action, for the sum of $75,000. Plaintiff had been employed in the business and continued as an employee after the purchase by Nelson. In July, 1930, plaintiff and Nelson entered into written contracts wherein it was provided that Nelson should pay to plaintiff the sum of $100 per week for his services for the period of three years. Provision was made for submission of differences to arbitration. The business was conducted under the name of Ward Heater Co., Ltd., a corporation. In one of the contracts between plaintiff and Nelson it was provided that Nelson should set aside 4,000 shares of the capital stock of the corporation, being 20% of the total shares, to be issued in the name of plaintiff and endorsed by him in blank and placed in escrow for delivery to plaintiff whenever Nelson should receive the sum of $75,000 with interest from the net profits of the business. It was also provided in the contracts that if Nelson desired to sell his stock, plaintiff should have the right to purchase it on the same terms as would be offered by any other party and that if plaintiff failed to purchase the stock, Nelson could at his election sell not only his own stock but the stock of plaintiff, provided the price and terms upon which plaintiff's stock be sold should be identical per share with the price and terms upon which Nelson's stock should be sold. Plaintiff agreed "not to sell his shares or transfer any interest therein or the right to receive said shares or any benefit thereof to any person whomsoever until said shares are released from the escrow and the party of the first part has been repaid the sum of Seventy-five Thousand Dollars ($75,000.00), with interest as hereinabove provided."

Nelson discharged plaintiff from the service of the corporation on January 13, 1931. The differences between plaintiff and Nelson were submitted to arbitration in accordance with the terms of their contract and thereafter plaintiff commenced an action in the superior court against Nelson for the enforcement of the award of the arbitrators. In the judgment in that action plaintiff was awarded a sum of money for his wrongful discharge. In its judgment the court ordered that the corporation stock mentioned in the contracts between plaintiff and Nelson be impounded with the clerk of the court and be "delivered to said plaintiff upon order of the court when said Henry H. Nelson shall have received from the net proceeds of the Ward Heater Company, Ltd., as provided in said contract, Exhibit A, the sum of * * * $75,000.00 * * * with interest at * * * 6% per annum from January 16, 1930, or until the dissolution of the Ward Heater Company, Ltd., and the cancellation of said stock, * * *". The court also enjoined Nelson from disposing of the stock "during said time". The judgment was dated July 7, 1932. An appeal having been taken, the judgment was affirmed. Kerr v. Nelson, 7 Cal.2d 85, 59 P.2d 821.

On the day this judgment was rendered Nelson sold all of his stock in the corporation to defendant Smith. On the following day Nelson and Smith entered into an agreement wherein the judgment of the superior court dated July 7, 1932, was mentioned. By this agreement Nelson transferred all of his right, title and interest in and to the 4,000 shares of stock that had been impounded, together with the right to receive delivery of the stock whenever it should be released by the court. When plaintiff became aware of the sale by Nelson to Smith, he commenced another action in the court in which he alleged that Nelson had breached his contract with the plaintiff and in which he sought damages in the sum of $60,000. This action came on for trial resulting in a finding by the court that the consideration given by Smith for the stock transferred was of the value of $6,000 and no more. The court held that the plaintiff had failed to establish any damages and rendered judgment in favor of Nelson. This judgment became final long before the filing of the present action.

The corporation became indebted to Horace J. Smith in the sum of $33,618.89, and in consideration of the cancellation by Smith of this indebtedness and the assumption by him of the liabilities of the corporation all of the business and assets of the corporation were in 1937 transferred to Smith. Ward Heater Company, Ltd., was then dissolved and a new corporation was organized. It was stated in the application for a permit to issue stock in the new corporation that the new corporation was in law and fact a reorganization of the old corporation. No stock in the new corporation was issued to plaintiff. It is conceded that Nelson did not receive the sum of $75,000 from either corporation or from any individual and that there is no possibility that he ever will receive it.

[2, 3] In his brief plaintiff states that he "was frozen out by acts of the majority stockholders, and directors and officers of the corporation". In this action he does not sue to be reinstated as a stockholder or to recover damages for himself because of the acts of the officers of the corporation. In the present litigation he has chosen to file an action in which it must be established that the corporation itself has suffered some legal wrong and in which the corporation, if it were plaintiff, could secure legal or equitable redress. If the corporation fails to proceed, upon demand the law permits a stockholder to begin and maintain such an action on behalf of the corporation. Turner v. Markham, 155 Cal. 562, 102 P. 272.

[4] The trial court made findings adverse to plaintiff's contention of fraud on the part of defendants. The court specifically found that the individual defendants "at all times acted in good faith, in a lawful manner and faithfully represented the interests of said corporation, its creditors and stockholders"; that the acts of which complaint is made were not fraudulent; and that the agreement between Smith and Ward Heater Co., Ltd., was made for a valuable, fair and adequate consideration and in the best interest of the corporation. Circumstances were shown in evidence which, with such inferences as the court could reasonably deduce therefrom, give support to these findings. Plaintiff complains in particular of the amount of the consideration paid by Smith for the assets of the corporation and of the fact that the board of directors had, prior to the transfer to Smith, authorized payments to certain employees in the aggregate sum of $15,000. Evidence was introduced, however, from which the court could reasonably conclude that the debts of the corporation, including the indebtedness to Smith, amounted to a sum greater than the value of the total assets of the corporation; and that the employees had returned to the corporation the sums which had been allowed them as bonus. It thus appears that even if it be assumed that plaintiff was a stockholder and in position to file the action, the judgment must nevertheless be affirmed.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Thomas C. Gould, Judge.

Proceeding in the matter of the estate of William Abdale, deceased, wherein applications for letters of administration were filed respectively by the Department of Institutions of the State of California and Ben H. Brown, Public Administrator of Los Angeles County. From an order appointing the public administrator, the Department of Institutions appeals.

Affirmed.

Robert E. Hatch, of San Francisco, for appellant.

J. H. O'Connor, Co. Counsel, and William E. Lamoreaux, Deputy Co. Counsel, both of Los Angeles, for respondent.

W. J. WOOD, Justice.

William Abdale died while a resident of the county of Los Angeles and was survived by Alfred Abdale, an incompetent, an inmate of the Sonoma State Hospital. The appellant, Department of Institutions of the State of California, is the guardian of the estate of Alfred Abdale under appointment by the superior court of the city and county of San Francisco. Ben H. Brown, the respondent, is the public administrator of Los Angeles county. Applications for letters of administration of the estate of William Abdale were filed respectively by the appellant and the respondent. The superior court ordered that letters of administration issue to the public administrator and from this order the department has appealed.

Appellant bases its claim to letters of administration upon section 426 of the Probate Code, which provides as follows: "If a person otherwise entitled to administer is a minor or an incompetent person, letters may be granted to his or her guardian, or any other person entitled to letters, in the discretion of the court". Appellant argues that since it has been appointed guardian of the estate of Alfred Abdale it has the right under the provisions of this section to letters of administration of the estate of the deceased uncle of its ward.

[1] The respondent public administrator is the official whose duty it is to administer the estates of deceased persons in cases where others are not given priority by law. This official should be appointed as administrator unless statutory authority is found for the appointment of the Department of Institutions. It is argued that this authority is found in section 6660 of the Welfare and Institutions Code of the State of California, St.1941, p. 2506.

[2-4] Article V of the Welfare and Institutions Code contains 15 sections numbered from 6650 to 6664, St.1937, pp. 1154–1159, as amended. All of these sections deal with the subject of the property and support of inmates of state institutions. Section 6660 provides that the Department of Institutions may apply to a court of competent jurisdiction to be appointed guardian of the estate of an incompetent person committed to the home for the feeble minded if such incompetent person has no guardian. The department is also authorized by this section to act as administrator of the estate of an incompetent who dies while an inmate of such institution, leaving an estate but having no relatives at the time residing within the State of California. It is apparent that the purpose of section 6660 is to place the state in position to reimburse itself from the property of its wards and for this reason the department is authorized to act, under given circumstances, as guardian of the estate of the ward or as administrator of the estate of a deceased ward. Nothing is contained in the section in question which gives the department the right to act as administrator of the estate of a deceased relative of one of its wards. Nor is such power implied in order to carry out the purposes of the section. Although section 426 of the Probate Code impowers the court to appoint the guardian of an incompetent person as administrator of an estate of a deceased relative, the court is not authorized to appoint any person or institution not having the legal capacity to act as administrator. Since the department did not have legal capacity to act as guardian of the deceased relative of an inmate it follows that the court did not err in denying its petition for letters of administration.

The order is affirmed.

2. Process 🔑83

Service of summons and complaint upon a defendant without the state is only an incident to "constructive service" and in lieu of the publication required by Section 413. Code Civ.Proc. §§ 413, 473a.

See Words and Phrases, Permanent Edition, for all other definitions of "Constructive Service".

3. Judgment 🔑138(3)

The right of a defendant who has not been personally served with summons and complaint, to have a default judgment against him set aside, is not an absolute right but the granting of such an order is committed to the sound discretion of the trial court. Code Civ.Proc. §§ 413, 473a.

4. Judgment 🔑138(3)

On motion of defendant not personally served with summons and complaint to set aside judgment, his opponent may show that movant had actual notice of action in time to have entered an appearance and presented a defense and that failure to do so was owing to his neglect or to his consent to the judgment, in which event a case arises for the exercise of discretion of the court, which must determine whether the laches is of such character as to preclude relief. Code Civ. Proc. §§ 413, 473a.

5. Divorce 🔑161

Denial of motion of dependent wife not personally served with process within state, to set aside interlocutory order of divorce entered almost a year before after personal service in State of Oklahoma, was not an abuse of discretion. Code Civ.Proc. §§ 413, 473a.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Frank G. Swain, Judge.

Action by Chaley Glen Tucker against Alice B. Tucker for divorce wherein an interlocutory judgment of divorce was entered on personal service without the state. From an order denying defendant's motion to vacate and set aside the default judgment, the defendant appeals.

Order affirmed.

Dailey S. Stafford, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Richard C. Fildew, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

DRAPEAU, Justice pro tem.

Plaintiff filed his complaint for divorce in the Superior Court of this state August 31, 1941. The defendant was a nonresident of California. Order for publication of summons was made August 19, 1941. The residence of the defendant being known, summons and complaint were personally served upon her in the State of Oklahoma August 28, 1941. By order of the court default of the defendant was entered December 23, 1941. On the same date, the case was tried as a default matter, and interlocutory judgment of divorce was made and entered.

December 9, 1942, the trial court denied a motion by the defendant to vacate and set aside the default judgment. This motion was presented in accordance with the provisions of section 473a of the Code of Civil Procedure. It was based upon the affidavit of the defendant, dated November 27, 1942, a proposed answer to be filed by the defendant, and the records, files and papers in the case. There was no counter-showing on the part of the plaintiff. Defendant has appealed from the order denying said motion.

Section 473a of the Code of Civil Procedure is short, and it is just as well to quote it in full: "(Answer of defendant not served). When from any cause the summons in an action has not been personally served on the defendant, the court may allow, on such terms as may be just, such defendant or his legal representatives, at any time within one year after the rendition of any judgment in such action, to answer to the merits of the original action."

The last part of section 413, Code of Civil Procedure, provides: "When publication is ordered, personal service of a copy of the summons and complaint out of the State is equivalent to publication and deposit in the post office, and in either case the service of the summons is complete at the expiration of the time prescribed by the order for publication."

The defendant was personally served in the State of Oklahoma with summons and complaint, in accordance with this provision of section 413, Code of Civ.Proc. Was she "personally served" so as to bring her within the purview of section 473a, Code of Civ.Proc., and entitled to an order vacating and setting aside the default judgment?

To attempt to reason logically from the premise that defendant knew of the pendency of the action and was therefore personally served would not be proper because in such cases as Palmer v. Lantz, 215 Cal. 320, 9 P.2d 821, and Lilly-Brackett Co. v. Sonnemann, 157 Cal. 192, 106 P. 715, 21 Ann.Cas. 1279, mailing a copy of the complaint and summons is held not to be personal service.

[1, 2] The question can be settled by keeping in mind the fact that the apparent conflict in the application of these two sections of our code has to do with two entirely different legal concepts. One has to do with constructive service of process by which a court acquires jurisdiction of parties and subject-matter in a legal action; the other is that branch of our law having to do with relief from the terms of a judgment in proper cases. To make one rule equally applicable to both of these concepts would be to set up an impossible legal Procrustean bed. So it is that in this case, in which the court acquired jurisdiction over the defendant by substituted service, the mere fact that the defendant was personally served without the State does not defeat her right to have the default judgment set aside. The words "personally served" as used in section 473a of the Code of Civil Procedure mean personal service of summons and complaint upon a defendant within the State of California; they do not include personal service of summons and complaint upon a defendant without the State of California. The latter service is but an incident to constructive service and in lieu of the publication required by section 413, Code of Civil Procedure. Parkside Realty Co. v. MacDonald, 166 Cal. 426, 434, 137 P. 21; Zobel v. Zobel, 151 Cal. 98, 90 P. 191; Nahas v. Nahas, 1939, 59 Nev. 220, 90 P.2d 223, 92 P.2d 718; Kane v. Stallman, 1941, 209 Minn. 138, 296 N.W. 1; and see note in Ann.Cas.1916B, p. 565. The Nevada and Minnesota cases of Nahas v. Nahas, supra, and Kane v. Stallman, supra, are directly in accord with the view herein expressed.

[3, 4] But the right of a defendant who has not been personally served with summons and complaint to have a default judgment against him set aside is not absolute and unconditional. The granting of such an order is committed to the sound discretion of the trial court. As was said in Boland v. All Persons, 160 Cal. 486, 490, 117 P. 547, 548: "But his opponent may show in opposition to the application that the applicant had actual notice of the action in time to have entered an appearance and present the defense, and that the failure to do so was owing to his neglect or to his consent to the judgment. In that event a case arises for the exercise of the discretion of the court, and it must determine whether or not the laches is of a character that should preclude the relief."

This principle was applied by our Supreme Court in the most recent case of this kind, Hiltbrand v. Hiltbrand, 218 Cal. 321, 23 P.2d 277. That was a divorce case wherein the action was instituted July 7, 1930; there was constructive service upon the defendant who was residing in Switzerland. She received by mail a copy of the complaint and summons July 24, 1930. November 7, 1930, her default was entered and on the same day the interlocutory decree was entered. Nothing was done to set aside the default judgment until May 15, 1931. Under such circumstances, the law which we are required to follow is stated: "We are therefore led to the conclusion that there was in the instant case a sufficient showing to sustain the action of the court below in that enough appeared from the facts to justify the conclusion that, having received knowledge of the existence of the proceeding in the courts of California, the defendant was guilty of inexcusable delay and neglect in not earlier presenting her defense. In making this holding we are not unmindful of the fact that this court has in Rehfuss v. Rehfuss, 169 Cal. 86, 145 P. 1020, and on various other occasions, shown its solicitude for the ordinance of marriage and to that end has held that the showing to set aside a default in a divorce action may rest upon slight evidence. But here the question in the first instance was one within the discretion of the court below, and we are unable to say as a matter of law that such discretion was not properly exercised." Hiltbrand v. Hiltbrand, supra, 218 Cal. at page 324, 23 P.2d at page 278. In the Hiltbrand case, the time elapsing from the interlocutory judgment until an effort was made to set it aside was shorter than in the pending case.

[5] In the presnt case, the trial court in the exercise of its discretion denied the motion to vacate and set aside the default judgment, and, as in the Hiltbrand case, after a careful review of the record, we are unable to say as a matter of law that such discretion was not properly exercised.

The order is affirmed.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Mateo County; Ernest D. Wagner, Judge.

Action by the City of San Mateo against Hugh F. Mullin Jr., to collect a license fee for the practice of law. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appeals.

Reversed.

Ernest A. Wilson, City Atty., of San Mateo (Kirkbride & Wilson, Frank B. Ingersoll, Jr., and Arthur J. Harzfeld, all of San Mateo, of counsel), for appellant.

F. E. Hoffmann, of San Mateo, and J. W. Coleberd, of South San Francisco, for respondent.

WARD, Justice.

This is an action by plaintiff city against defendant, a practicing attorney-at-law, for the collection of a license tax fee due under the provisions of an ordinance of the City of San Mateo for a period from July 1, 1936, to June 30, 1940. Based upon a finding and conclusion of law that the tax was unconstitutional, judgment was rendered for defendant. The city appeals from the judgment.

In June, 1932, the city council of the City of San Mateo passed and adopted ordinance No. 373 entitled "San Mateo Business License Ordinance", which in brief provides that persons engaged in businesses, trades, callings or professions, including that of attorney-at-law, shall pay an annual license tax. The ordinance was amended in April, 1936, to provide that where two or more persons of like businesses, trade, calling or profession are associated as partners, or as employer and employee, then an additional license tax in a less amount shall be paid for each additional person after the first.

The trial court declared "That section 8.25 of ordinance number 373 of the City of San Mateo, as amended, requires a license tax to be paid by attorneys at law, engaged in the practice of law in plaintiff city, unequal in amount, and that said section of said ordinance is discriminatory and that the provisions thereof are, by reason of inequality and lack of uniformity, with respect to the license tax required to be paid by such attorneys, in conflict with section 1 of Article XIV of the [Amendments to the] Constitution of the United States, and section 11 of Article I of the Constitution of the State of California and are therefore void."

[1] In the imposition of the tax herein—a municipal affair—the municipality, unless prohibited by statute, has the right and power to impose the tax, not for the purpose of regulating the conduct of defendant's practice, but for revenue. West Coast Adver. Co. v. San Francisco, 14 Cal. 2d 516, 95 P.2d 138; In re Nowak, 184 Cal. 701, 195 P. 402; Hill v. City of Eureka, 35 Cal.App.2d 154, 94 P.2d 1025.

[2] It is the rule that the requirement of the State Bar Act of payment of an annual fee for the privilege of practicing law does not preclude the imposition of a municipal license tax on attorneys who conduct the business of practicing law. In re Galusha, 184 Cal. 697, 195 P. 406; In re Johnson, 47 Cal.App. 465, 190 P. 852. The above ordinance provides that unless he pays a license tax it shall be unlawful for an attorney to carry on his profession in the municipality.

[3, 4] When a license measure is unreasonable, or an arbitrary yardstick is used, or there is a failure to define sufficiently the subject of the tax, the courts have been prompt to declare it unconstitutional. In City of Los Angeles v. Lankershim, 160 Cal. 800, 118 P. 215, the court held an occupational license tax upon the owner of a building containing thirty office rooms for rent, and exempting the owner of a similar building of twenty-nine rooms, to be an unlawful discrimination. A health measure completely exempting one class imposes a burden upon a selected class of merchants. Justesen's F. S. Inc. v. City of Tulare, 12 Cal.2d 324, 84 P.2d 140. A tax upon a business, which gives a preference to those within the confines of a municipality, unless based upon a reasonable distinction, is invalid. Bueneman v. City of Santa Barbara, 8 Cal.2d 405, 65 P.2d 884. A tax imposed upon those engaged in the same business, variable in amount according to the volume of business done, estimated in any reasonable way, is valid, though a tax upon slot vending machines, which provides a different rate for those ejecting or delivering raisins, is invalid. Matter of Application of Richardson, 170 Cal. 68, 148 P. 213. An ordinance which fails to define adequately the subject of the tax has been disapproved. Barker Bros., Inc., v. Los Angeles, 10 Cal. 2d 603, 76 P.2d 97. Many other instances might be mentioned, but the requirement of constitutionality must in each case be met by demonstrating that the classification is not oppressive against persons or classes. Madden v. Kentucky, 309 U.S. 83, 60 S.Ct. 406, 84 L.Ed. 590, 125 A.L.R. 1383.

[5-9] A difference in the method of conducting a business is generally a sound basis for classification, particularly if it appears that the tax was fixed in proportion to the amount of business, which may be determined by different but reasonable methods. Ex parte Lemon, 143 Cal. 558, 77 P. 455, 65 L.R.A. 946. The method of conducting one business may not furnish basis for a reasonable classification, whereas in another it may. As an instance: in a grocery concern the association of several partners may result in divided responsibility, but a material increase in business does not necessarily follow as in the case of a business association furnishing personal services. An association, as such, of chiropractors, osteopaths or physicians and surgeons in their respective capacities, or as employer and employee, should ordinarily result in a greater volume of business than where one individual practices alone. The practice of the law by an association of persons results in certain economy to them through the joint use of library, stenographic facilities, etc., and to the client as the result of opportunity for conference among the associates, and the ability to obtain advice and assistance from one associate in the absence of another. The activities of the group constitute but one business although each member thereof renders individual services, and such association furnishes a reasonable basis for varying the amount of the taxes. Ex parte Haskell, 112 Cal. 412, 44 P. 725, 32 L.R.A. 527. The method of operation resulting in superior or more convenient service furnishes a reason for a distinct and separate classification. The power to license a business for the purpose of revenue involves the right to make distinctions between essentially different methods of conducting the same general character of business. In Ex parte Haskell, supra, it was held that the manner of conducting a business, in one instance as a traveling salesman, and in a second as a merchant in a fixed place of business, is distinctive for the purpose of taxation. In Continental B. Co. v. City of Escondido, 21 Cal.App.2d 388, 69 P.2d 181, it was held that the fact that bakeries within the city paid ad valorem taxes while those without did not, furnished sufficient justification for a greater license fee imposed upon the latter. In Riley v. Chambers, 181 Cal. 589, 185 P. 855, 8 A.L.R. 418, a larger license fee for real estate brokers than salesmen was upheld. The association of a broker and salesman in the same business under one name or title is of such common practice that courts may take judicial cognizance of such fact. In Ware Shoals Mfg. Co. v. Jones, 78 S.C. 211, 58 S.E. 811, the court held that there is an advantage in the corporate form of organization which justified a different tax treatment. In State v. Razook, 179 N.C. 708, 103 S.E. 67, an auctioneer's license ordinance exempted those who did not use the auction method more than one day in six months. A butcher, and a farmer selling meat as an incident to his business, may, in a scheme of taxation, be in different classes. Davis v. Mayor and Council of Macon, 64 Ga. 128, 37 Am.Rep. 60. A classification of theatres based upon price of admission has been held valid. Metropolis Theatre Co. v. Chicago, 228 U.S. 61, 33 S.Ct. 441, 57 L.Ed. 730. The amount of a license tax may be graded "according to the number of persons employed or used." Ex parte Lemon, supra, 143 Cal. at page 562, 77 P. at page 456, 65 L.R.A. 946. It is possible that four persons used in the conduct of a business may do less work and bring in less financial return than a business conducted by two, but the legislative body is permitted "to take a practical view of the question, and legislate accordingly." Ex parte Sisto Li Protti, 68 Cal. 635, 637, 10 P. 113. In Ferran v. City of Palo Alto, 50 Cal.App.2d 374, 122 P.2d 965, this method of estimating the amount of business is recognized though at page 382 of 50 Cal. App.2d, at page 970 of 122 P.2d the court said: "When we speak of the size of the plant and adopt as the measure the number of employees therein, we are not speaking of mere physical dimensions of buildings, or the like, but of the size of the group employed, which is very definitely related to the volume of business done, in that productive labor produces quantity or volume of output and affects the amount of business done in terms of dollar and cent value." The court held, however, that a license fee could not be similarly computed based upon the number of employees in a plant outside of the municipality.

The number of persons used in the conduct of a business may not be a perfect way of determining the amount of a license fee, but "it is one way of doing so, and, for aught we know, the safest way. * * * But it is fair to presume that no more persons are employed in such establishments than are necessary to the performance of the work, and, as a consequence, that the amount of business done by such establishments is in proportion to the number of persons employed therein." Ex parte Sisto Li Protti, supra, 68 Cal. at page 636, 10 P. at page 113. In Bramman v. City of Alameda, 162 Cal. 648, 653, 654, 124 P. 243, 245, the court said: "Within the rule of the authorities, as the classification may be accomplished in a variety of ways, any gradation will be sustained which is reasonable and fair and equally affects all within the class to which it is applied. And among the varying standards which may be adopted, certainly it cannot be objected to as unfair or unreasonable that as to a business class a reasonable distinction between members of the class cannot be based upon the number of vehicles and animals which are used in the prosecution of the business. This, as in the case of distinguishing a class by the number of persons engaged in the conduct of the business, is a method of gauging the amount of business done or the capital employed therein and imposing a license tax upon the occupation under such gradation. Such a classification is recognized as a proper one in Dillon on Municipal Corporations, § 1410, vol. 4 (5th Ed.), p. 2473. See, also, Wilson et al. v. City of Lexington, 105 Ky. 765, 49 S.W. 806, 50 S.W. 834." (Italics added.)

In Ex parte Lemon, supra, and Ex parte Sisto Li Protti, supra, the language is—persons employed or used. If it is fair and reasonable to fix the license fee in accordance with the number of persons employed, it may with equal force and effect be said that the number "used" or "engaged" in the conduct of the business gives a sounder basis for determining the fair amount of the license fee. The number of employees may vary to a greater extent than the number of employers. If the employers are "used" or "engaged" in producing or contributing to the output or the results of the business, it does not appear that it is unfair or unreasonble to group employer workers and listed employees. They all tend to increase the size of the business and the financial returns.

[10-13] Respondent contends that there is discrimination against him by reason of the fact that in the conduct of his profession he is taxed $15 while some of the associates of law firms pay only $5 for the same privilege. There may be some confusion in differentiating between the right to practice law, evidenced by a certificate issued by the state, and the privilege of conducting a legal business in a municipality. While the state certificate is a prerequisite to practice, the actual practice is a business. In re Galusha, supra. The tax is levied upon the business and not the person. Whether that business is conducted by one, or more than one, associated as partners or as employer and employee, it is still in the class of business as that word is used in the ordinance. If a firm of legal associates paid less than respondent as an individual, he might be aggrieved, but when each "business" individually or as a firm pays the minimum tax of $15, respondent cannot justly claim discrimination. There may seem to be a discrimination between an individual and an individual plus an employee, or a firm of associated or employee attorneys, but such a discrimination, if it existed, would not be a matter in which the individual respondent would be aggrieved, and, as we have herein held, such method of fixing license taxes has been approved. An employer and an employee may be taxed and the employer actually pay or be held responsible for the tax, and the designation of the tax, whether imposed upon property or upon "the exercise of personal rights and privileges," is not controlling in determining its constitutionality. Carmichael v. Southern Coal Co., 301 U.S. 495, 508, 57 S.Ct. 868, 81 L.Ed. 1245, 109 A.L.R. 1327. The exemption of some employers or employees "is peculiarly a question for legislative decision." Carmichael v. Southern Coal Co., supra, 301 U.S. at page 511, 57 S.Ct. at page 873, 81 L.Ed. 1245, 109 A.L.R. 1327.

[14-20] The amount of the tax is not in restraint of trade and not against public policy. In reaching the conclusion that the license tax herein is not unconstitutional, we have been guided by the rules set forth by the Supreme Court of this state and the Supreme Court of the United States. In Ex parte Haskell, supra, 112 Cal. at page 417, 44 P. at page 725, 32 L.R.A. 527, the court said: "The very power to license for purposes of regulation and revenue involves the right to make distinctions between different trades, and between essentially different methods of conducting the same general character of business or trade." "* * * legislatures possess the greatest freedom in classification." Madden v. Kentucky, supra, 309 U.S. at page 88, 60 S.Ct. at page 408, 84 L.Ed. 590, 125 A.L.R. 1383. Where the terms of a license ordinance may be capable of several constructions, its constitutionality should be upheld. Edwards v. City of Los Angeles, 48 Cal.App.2d 62, 119 P.2d 370. In Carmichael v. Southern Coal Co., supra, involving a tax upon employers and employees, the court said (301 U.S. at pages 509, 510, 57 S.Ct. at page 872, 81 L.Ed. 1245, 109 A.L.R. 1327): "It is inherent in the exercise of the power to tax that a state be free to select the subjects of taxation and to grant exemptions. Neither due process nor equal protection imposes upon a state any rigid rule of equality of taxation. See Bell's Gap R. Co. v. Pennsylvania, 134 U.S. 232, 237, 10 S.Ct. 533, 33 L.Ed. 892; Lawrence v. State Tax Comm'n, 286 U.S. 276, 284, 52 S.Ct. 556, 558, 76 L.Ed. 1102, 87 A.L.R. 374. This Court has repeatedly held that inequalities which result from a singling out of one particular class for taxation or exemption, infringe no constitutional limitation. [citing cases]

"Like considerations govern exemptions from the operation of a tax imposed on the members of a class. A legislature is not bound to tax every member of a class or none. It may make distinctions of degree having a rational basis, and when subjected to judicial scrutiny they must be presumed to rest on that basis if there is any conceivable state of facts which would support it. [citing cases]

"This restriction upon the judicial function, in passing on the constitutionality of statutes, is not artificial or irrational. A state legislature, in the enactment of laws, has the widest possible latitude within the limits of the Constitution. In the nature of the case it cannot record a complete catalogue of the considerations which move its members to enact laws. In the absence of such a record courts cannot assume that its action is capricious, or that, with its informed acquaintance with local conditions to which the legislation is to be applied, it was not aware of facts which afford reasonable basis for its action. Only by faithful adherence to this guiding principle of judicial review of legislation is it possible to preserve to the legislative branch its rightful independence and its ability to function."

Appeal from Superior Court, Fresno County; Hon. Ernest Klette, Judge.

Action by W. A. Minner and others against Joe Sadler and others in ejectment and to recover possession of an unpatented lode mining claim, to quiet title thereto and for damages, wherein a cross-complaint was filed and later dismissed upon cross-complainants' motion. From an adverse judgment, plaintiffs appeal.

GRIFFIN, Judge.

This is an action in ejectment and to recover possession of a certain mining claim, to quiet title thereto, and for damages (1) for loss of use of the area contained therein; (2) for mineral wrongfully removed therefrom; and (3) for trespassing upon the property. The complaint alleges generally that plaintiffs are and have been, since October 2, 1940, the sole owners of and entitled to the exclusive possession of the Daisy No. 1 unpatented lode mining claim situated in Fresno County; that the defendants claim an unfounded interest in the area contained therein adverse to plaintiffs; that on February 10, 1941, the defendants, knowing that the area covered by that claim belonged to and was in the possession of plaintiffs, trespassed thereon and ousted plaintiffs therefrom and thereafter excluded them from that area; and that they did wrongfully extract and remove valuable minerals therefrom. Judgment for possession and to quiet title was sought, together with damages in the sum of $200,000. Defendants Tungstore Mines, Inc., and C. A. Rasmussen answered, denied generally the allegations of the complaint, and by way of cross-complaint claimed a prior right to the property by virtue of a contract of sale from defendant Joe Sadler, who claimed title and right of possession by virtue of a previous location of a claim known as Lobo No. 1, covering portions of the area within the boundaries of the Daisy location. By their cross-complaint they sought possession of and asked that title be quieted in them to the area described in the Lobo No. 1 claim. Actual damages in the sum of $1,000 was sought therein.

It is defendants' contention that the Daisy claim was located subsequent to the location of the Lobo claim and that the westerly portion of the Daisy claim overlapped the easterly portion of the Lobo claim. Plaintiffs answered the cross-complaint and denied generally its allegations. They claimed that Sadler's title was without right and alleged the execution of an option to sell executed by Sadler to plaintiffs Minner and Middleton, Sr., by which instrument they claimed to have acquired a 49 per cent interest in the Lobo claim and asked that specific performance of the contract be enforced. Defendants Joe Sadler and Harriet Sadler answered plaintiffs' complaint and denied generally its allegations, set up their claim of title by virtue of a prior location, and alleged that plaintiffs had attempted to jump the Lobo claim by subsequently filing their overlapping claim known as Daisy No. 1. Other defendants, by way of answer, denied generally the allegations of the complaint. Before trial, over objections, but by consent of the court, the defendants amended their answers and set forth as a separate defense that "none of the area covered by the said Daisy No. 1 * * * was, at any time mentioned in the plaintiffs' complaint, a part of the public domain, open to mineral location, but, on the contrary, all of said area was, pursuant to the terms and provisions of section 24 of the Federal Water Power Act of June 10, 1920, 41 Stat. 1075 [16 U.S.C.A. § 818], on February 11, 1921, withdrawn and reserved from mineral location of any kind or character and ever since has been and now is withdrawn and reserved from mineral location". Cross-complainants then moved to dismiss their cross-complaint for the reason that it was their belief that under the facts stated, and the provisions of the Water Power Act above mentioned, they would also be unable to establish title to either claim. No objection was offered and the cross-complaint was dismissed. Upon these pleadings the case proceeded to trial.

The court found generally that it is true that the defendant Joe Sadler did, on September 20, 1940, attempt to locate a certain lode mining claim known as Lobo No. 1, and that notice of location covering the same was recorded on September 25, 1940; that plaintiff D. P. Middleton, Sr., did, on October 2, 1940, attempt to locate Daisy No. 1, and did record notice of location thereof on October 3, 1940, and that as so located Daisy No. 1 overlapped the easterly end of Lobo No. 1 as it was attempted to be located, and that the discovery monument and discovery shaft of Daisy No. 1 were at all times within the boundaries of Lobo No. 1; that it is not true that Sadler moved or changed the boundaries of Lobo No. 1 or any of the monuments of that claim after they were delineated or erected; that the separate defense alleged in the several answers, i. e., that the area covered was not open to location at the time, is true; that it is not true that the plaintiffs were ever the owners of or entitled to possession of any of the area within the boundaries of Lobo No. 1, including that portion of the easterly half of Lobo No. 1 which was overlapped by Daisy No. 1; that it is true that defendant Tungstore Mines, Inc., carried on mining operations, in good faith, on the area covered by Lobo No. 1 and on the easterly portion of that claim which was overlapped by Daisy No. 1, and that the value of the ore removed by said mining operations was less than the cost of mining the same, and that none of the defendants except Joe Sadler derived any gain or profit from said mining operations or from the extraction of ores from any of said property; that the allegations contained in paragraphs III and IV of the answer of Tungstore Mines, Inc., are true; that it is not true that any of the plaintiffs in the action were in actual possession of any of the area covered by Daisy No. 1 between November 1, 1940, and the time of the trial of the action. The court then concluded that none of plaintiffs ever had any right, title or interest in any of the land covered by Lobo No. 1 mining claim and never had any right, title or interest in the easterly portion of said claim which was overlapped by Daisy No. 1 claim, and gave judgment that plaintiffs take nothing by the action and that defendants recover their costs. Plaintiffs offered certain proposed findings in their favor but they were refused. A motion for new trial was denied. This appeal followed.

[1] The evidence fully supports the finding that on Feb. 11, 1921, the San Joaquin Light & Power Corporation filed with the General Land Office Commissioner an application for a power project under the provisions of the act of June 10, 1920, 41 Stats. p. 1075, affecting the land here involved. It further shows that neither plaintiffs nor defendants nor anyone else made application to restore said lands for location purposes. Under section 24 of said act the lands here involved were, from the date of the filing of the abovementioned application of the power company, reserved from entry or location until otherwise directed by the commissioner or by Congress. There is no showing that the Commissioner or Congress directed otherwise. In re Nevada Irrigation District, 52 L.D. 371, 377. Another and more recent decision of the Land Department is In re John Roberts, 55 L.D. 430, decided December 19, 1935. The applicant there filed an application for patent which was denied. The claims were located in 1927 and the Commissioner held they were void because they were within Power Site Withdrawal No. 661. The Federal Power Commission, however, on July 24, 1931, pursuant to section 24 of the act, conditionally restored the land to the public domain for the purpose of location and entry. The Commissioner held that the subsequent restoration under section 24 of the act did not validate mining claims located in 1927 and 1930 because those claims, under the first portion of section 24 of the act, were void. The evidence supports the conclusion that at the time plaintiffs and defendants in the instant case attempted to locate their claim the area here involved was not then open to location and any attempted location thereon was void.

[2] In Coeur d'Alene Mining Company, 53 L.D. 531, 533, cited by plaintiffs, it was held that under a similar state of facts the subsequent claim locator acquired no rights by the location of his lode because the property was included within the prior Power Site Withdrawal and that section 24 of the Federal Water Power Act reserved that property from entry location or other disposal. It therefore appears from the decisions quoted and cited that the filing of an application for a power site under section 24 automatically withdraws the affected lands from mineral location.

Plaintiffs contend and argue at length that even as trespassers they were in possession of the ground within the limits of the purported Daisy No. 1 claim and that because of their possession no one except the Land Department or the Power Company could dispute their title, and that hence their rights as against defendants are just the same as though the property had been open to entry and location, citing Hubbard v. Barry, 21 Cal. 321; Lightner Mining Co. v. Lane, 161 Cal. 689, 120 P. 771, Ann.Cas.1913C, 1093; Corey v. Struve, 170 Cal. 170, 149 P. 48; Goldberg v. Bruschi, 146 Cal. 708, 81 P. 23.

[3] The trial court found, upon sufficient evidence, though conflicting, that the plaintiffs were not in actual possession of any of the area here involved between November 1, 1940, and the time of the trial. It further found, upon the same evidence, that defendants did not oust plaintiffs from possession. The evidence was conflicting in reference to the established boundary lines of Lobo No. 1 claim and was also in dispute as to its attempted location in point of time compared to that of the attempted location of Daisy No. 1 claim. There is substantial evidence supporting the court's finding in this respect. It therefore will not be disturbed on appeal.

A question was raised in Holdt v. Hazard, 10 Cal.App. 440, 102 P. 540, respecting possession under a void location claim. It was there said, at page 444 of 10 Cal.App., at page 541 of 102 P.: "The question involved here is the right of possession between two contesting locators, and it may be conceded, as contended by appellants, that at the time defendants entered upon and took possession of the claims plaintiffs were not in the actual possession thereof. Such being the case, plaintiffs' rights must rest upon the finding of the court to the effect that at the time of defendants' entry plaintiffs had made a valid location of the claims, in accordance with the provisions of section 2324 [of the Revised Statutes of the United States (30 U.S.C.A. § 28)] * * *." (Italics ours.)

[4, 5] In the instant case the court expressly found that the plaintiffs did not make a valid location; that the area involved was not open to location; and that the discovery monument and the discovery shaft of Daisy No. 1 were both within the boundaries of Lobo No. 1. It is elementary that both must be on open and unappropriated ground, and cannot be within the confines of some other person's claim previously located. Lindley on Mines, vol. 2, § 337, p. 778. Even assuming that there is merit to plaintiffs' contention, plaintiffs, at the time of the filing of the action and prior thereto, being out of actual possession, would be bound, therefore, by the rule that in order to recover possession of a mining claim the plaintiffs, being out of actual possession, must prove a valid location. Belk v. Meagher, 104 U.S. 279, 26 L.Ed. 735; Holdt v. Hazard, supra; 17 Cal.Jur. §§ 17 and 18, p. 301, et seq.; Garthe v. Hart, 73 Cal. 541, 15 P. 93; Lind v. Baker, 31 Cal.App.2d 631, 88 P.2d 777.

[6, 7] The only other claim of plaintiffs to participation in any of the proceeds from the mining operations must be based upon their claimed rights under the so-called option agreement above set forth. It will be noted therefrom that Sadler promised to sell 49 per cent of his interest in his mining claims to Middleton, Sr., and Minner for $200, to be paid before October 10, 1940. This is clearly a unilateral writing, without reciting a consideration therefor, and was canceled by Sadler before the consideration referred to therein had been paid or tendered. Such a canceled agreement did not confer upon plaintiffs any interest in or to the claims here involved nor was it subject to specific performance. A mere offer, as such, is subject to revocation by the offerer at any time prior to acceptance. Roth v. Moeller, 185 Cal. 415, 197 P. 62; Levy v. Lyon, 153 Cal. 213, 94 P. 881; Christy v. Drapeau, 22 Cal.App.2d 582, 71 P.2d 940; North Confidence Mining & Development Co. v. Morrice, 56 Cal.App. 145, 204 P. 851.

The determination that the attempted locations of the claims here involved were void sufficiently disposes of the many other questions presented on the appeal. The evidence supports the findings and the findings, as signed, while in part are not happily worded, sufficiently dispose of the issues presented.

Judgment affirmed.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Frank C. Collier, Judge.

Lincoln Sherwin Thomas and others were convicted of assault by means of force likely to produce great bodily injury and of robbery, and they appeal from the conviction of robbery.

Affirmed.

Frederic H. Vercoe, Public Defender, and William B. Neeley, Deputy Public Defender, both of Los Angeles, for appellants.

Robert W. Kenny, Atty. Gen., and Eugene M. Elson, Deputy Atty. Gen., for respondent.

SHINN, Acting Presiding Justice.

Defendants Thomas, Johnson, and Hernandez were jointly charged by information with the crimes of robbery (Count I) and assault by means of force likely to produce great bodily injury (Count II). These separate offenses were committed in the course of the same series of acts, which consisted of a beating administered to a soldier in an alley close by a cafe and bar frequented by Negroes, in which the soldier had been treating the defendants to beer until the place closed at about 2 a. m. After knocking their victim down and fracturing his jaw and nose, thereby rendering him unconscious, the defendants left him in the alley and shortly thereafter divided among themselves $10 which one of them had taken from the soldier's pocket while he lay unconscious. Defendants pleaded guilty to the charge of assault by means of force likely to produce great bodily injury (Count II), and not guilty to the charge of robbery (Count I). When placed on trial for the latter crime they interposed a plea of once in jeopardy and at the conclusion of their trial moved to dismiss the robbery charge, upon the grounds of former conviction and former jeopardy. The motions were denied, defendants were found guilty of robbery and were sentenced for each crime, to state prison for the crime of robbery and to the county jail for the assault, the sentences to run concurrently. All of them have appealed from the conviction of robbery.

The sole ground urged for reversal is that the pleas of guilty to the charge of assault by means of force likely to produce great bodily injury were a bar to the prosecutions for robbery. The contention is that because the crime of simple assault is necessarily included in each of said felonies, a conviction or acquittal of one would bar prosecution for the other. No authority is cited which supports this proposition and it clearly is not the law. The State Constitution, section 13, Article I, provides that no person shall be twice put in jeopardy for the same offense, and sections 687 and 1023 of the Penal Code provide in substance that one who has been convicted or acquitted may not be prosecuted again for the offense first charged or an offense necessarily included therein.

By the first count of the information it was charged that defendants forcibly took from the person and immediate presence of the victim $10, and that the robbery was accomplished by means of force used by the defendants upon the victim and also by then and there putting him in fear. We may therefore assume, without deciding, that upon this count defendants could have been convicted of simple assault. People v. Driscoll, 1942, 53 Cal.App.2d 590, 593, 128 P.2d 382. Had they gone to trial on the second count they could also have been convicted of simple assault.

[1] It is the settled law of California that convictions may be had for more than one offense committed by means of a single act or series of acts, where there is an element of one crime not found in the other and where in a prosecution for either one of the offenses there could not have been a conviction of the other. People v. McIlvain, 1942, 55 Cal.App.2d 322, 327, 328, 329, 130 P.2d 131; People v. Warren, 1940, 16 Cal.2d 103, 111, 104 P.2d 1024; People v. Venable, 1938, 25 Cal.App.2d 73, 76 P.2d 523; People v. Zimmer, 1937, 23 Cal.App.2d 581, 586, 73 P.2d 923; People v. Coltrin, 1936, 5 Cal.2d 649, 660, 55 P.2d 1161; In re Application of O'Connor, 1927, 80 Cal.App. 647, 651, 252 P. 730; People v. Day, 1926, 199 Cal. 78, 86, 89 248 P. 250; People v. Parker, 1925, 74 Cal.App. 540, 549, 241 P. 401; People v. Brannon, 1924, 70 Cal.App. 225, 233 P. 88; People v. Ciulla, 1919, 44 Cal.App. 725, 187 P. 49; People v. Devlin, 1904, 143 Cal. 128, 76 P. 900; People v. Bentley, 1888, 77 Cal. 7, 18 P. 799, 11 Am.St.Rep. 225; People v. Majors, 1884, 65 Cal. 138, 3 P. 597, 52 Am. Rep. 295.

The two felonies charged to appellants, having different essential elements, are separate and distinct offenses within the rule stated in the foregoing cases. Neither offense is included within the other and appellants in a prosecution for one of the offenses could not have been convicted of the other. Appellants' contention is not that they have been convicted twice of the same offense or that either of the offenses of which they have been convicted is included in the other. They say only that they might have been convicted of simple assault in either prosecution, which is correct, but they overlook the important fact that in neither prosecution were they adjudged guilty only of the offense of simple assault. After appellants had pleaded guilty to the aggravated assault charged in the second count, they could not have been convicted of simple assault in a prosecution under Count I, because simple assault is an offense necessarily included within the aggravated assault charged. And if they had pleaded guilty to simple assault under Count II, they could not have been convicted of simple assault under Count I, because that would have been a second conviction of the identical offense to which they had pleaded guilty. But as the case stands, appellants have not been convicted twice of the same offense nor have they been convicted under Count I (robbery by the use of force upon their victim) of an offense necessarily included, or included at all, within the offense charged in Count II (assault by means of force likely to produce great bodily injury).

[2] Appellants' argument amounts only to this: That in prosecutions for two distinct and different felonies, each involving an element of criminality not found in the other, and each involving the act of assault constituting the offense of simple assault, there can be a conviction of one or the other of the major crimes but not convictions of both. There is no constitutional or statutory law which supports this argument, nor have our courts ever so held. In prosecutions for crimes of personal violence involving the act of assault, but one or more additional elements, conviction of the greater offense is legally the equivalent of a conviction of all included offenses and bars further prosecution, under the familiar rule that the major offense cannot be split up so as to allow a separate prosecution for each included offense. People v. Mendoza, 1942, 55 Cal.App.2d 625, 131 P.2d 622; People v. McDaniels, 1902, 137 Cal. 192, 69 P. 1006, 59 L.R.A. 578, 92 Am. St.Rep. 81. No more can any of the included offenses be split up as a basis for separate prosecutions. Acquittal operates in the same way. No such double prosecution has occurred in the cases of appellants. They stand convicted of two felonies, each involving an act of assault upon the person of their victim, but each involving an element distinguishing the major offense from the offense of simple assault. They would have us hold that they have been convicted twice solely of the offense of simple assault, which is true only in the sense that the plea of guilty in the one case or the conviction in the other would have barred further prosecution for the offense of simple assault or any other included offense. But all that has happened is that they have been convicted of two felonies committed in the course of a continuous series of acts, which offenses have the common element of assault on the person of the victim constituting the offense of simple assault.

[3, 4] While the law jealously protects a culprit from double punishment, it does not allow him to commit two separate and distinct offenses for the price of one merely because they have some minor common element. Here the defendants assaulted their victim with great violence, rendering him unconscious, and while he was unconscious they robbed him; they might just as well have robbed him or attempted to rob him first and attacked him afterwards, as was the case in People v. Bentley, supra, 1888, 77 Cal. 7, 18 P. 799, 11 Am.St.Rep. 225. It would be wholly illogical to say that in either case one of the major crimes must go unpunished because, perchance, appellants in each felony prosecution might have been, although they were not, convicted only of the offense of simple assault. Of course, as we have said, two convictions of simple assault could not stand. A plea of guilty to simple assault in one case and a conviction of simple assault in the other, would be an acquittal of the greater offenses charged and would eliminate the elements which distinguish each of the major offenses from the other and from the offense of simple assault. But the judgments here establish the existence of those distinct elements as realities and they cannot be ignored. Appellants are subject to punishment for the offense of assault by means of force likely to produce great bodily injury and for the offense of robbery, because these are separate and distinct offenses, neither of which is necessarily included within the other. Although the act of assault is involved in each, in neither case can it be said that defendants are suffering punishment for the mere offense of simple assault and they are therefore not suffering double punishment.

We do not intend that anything we have said should be construed as applying to a hypothetical situation where the defendants had pleaded guilty to simple assault under Count II and had later been prosecuted for robbery under Count I. We do not have that situation. We agree with appellants' contention only thus far, that if defendants, after their plea of guilty under Count II, had been convicted of simple assault under Count I, the conviction could not stand. But we do not have such a case.

The judgments are affirmed.

On April 1, 1943, the defendant was convicted of violating section 41.05 of Ordinance 77000 of the City of Los Angeles (offering). Her motion for a new trial was denied on April 5, 1943. On the same day the court on its own motion, and over the objection of the defendant, continued the cause to April 15 for hearing on probation and sentence, without a waiver by the defendant of time for sentence. The court thereupon referred the case to the Probation Department for investigation and report. On April 15 the court sentenced the defendant to 180 days in jail, suspended the execution of judgment and sentence, and granted probation for two years on condition that the defendant serve 120 days in jail, leave the State of California within 48 hours after her release from jail and remain out of the state during the rest of her period of probation. On that day before sentence was pronounced, the defendant again moved for a new trial on the ground that sentence had not been pronounced within the time prescribed by law. Penal Code, § 1449. This motion was denied. The defendant appeals from the order of April 5 denying her motion for a new trial, from the order of April 5 continuing sentence to April 15, from the order of April 15 denying her motion for a new trial and from the judgment and sentence.

Entrapment. In her appeal from the judgment on the merits she claims that the trial court erred in refusing to give the instruction, which she requested, on the law of entrapment. No question is raised as to the correctness of the form of the proposed instruction. The only question is whether there is any evidence under which the doctrine of entrapment is applicable. It is undisputed that the complaining witness, police officer Gunn, then in plain clothes, met the defendant in the cocktail lounge of a certain hotel. That Gunn and the defendant went to his room in that hotel where, shortly thereafter, the defendant was arrested by two other police officers. The evidence is conflicting as to who suggested going to Gunn's room and as to what happened in the room. Gunn testified that, after they reached his room, the defendant demanded and he gave her $50 to have intercourse with him. Defendant denied that there was any talk of intercourse or that Gunn paid her any money. The arresting officers testified to defendant's state of undress and to finding under her pocketbook the $50, which had previously been marked.

[1-4] The only evidence as to who suggested sexual intercourse is found in the testimony of Officer Gunn, which is to the effect that the defendant suggested it. If a crime is committed at the suggestion of the defendant, the doctrine of entrapment is not applicable. In People v. Lee, 1935, 9 Cal.App.2d 99, at pages 108, 109, 48 P.2d 1003, at page 1007, the court said: "The defense of entrapment is recognized as a valid defense available to a person charged with the commission of a public offense under certain circumstances. The essential and important element which renders the defense available is the fact of inducement. If an officer or some one acting under his direction induces or persuades a person to commit a crime which he would not have committed without such inducement, the law will not punish the person thus lured into commission of the offense. * * * It is our understanding that the defense of entrapment is a positive defense imposing upon an accused the burden of showing that he was induced to commit the act for which he is being prosecuted. The invocation of the defense necessarily assumes that the act charged as a public offense was committed." The court did not err in refusing to instruct the jury on entrapment, for there was no evidence to support such a defense.

The other grounds which the defendant urges for a reversal are: (1) the prosecution failed to prove that the crime was committed in the City of Los Angeles; (2) the court had no authority to refer the cause to the Probation Department on its own motion, and, therefore, its order continuing sentence to April 15 and the pronouncing of sentence on that day, which was more than five days after the verdict was returned, was error.

[5, 6] Venue. There is no direct testimony that the crime was committed in the City of Los Angeles. But direct evidence is not necessary to prove venue; it may be established by inferences from the evidence. People v. Aggie, 1940, 37 Cal.App.2d 110, 98 P.2d 806. There is an abundance of evidence from which the inference may be drawn that the crime was committed in the City of Los Angeles.

[7-12] Probation and Sentence. The appellant contends that in the absence of an application by the defendant for probation, the court has no power to grant probation or to postpone pronouncement of sentence for more than five days after the verdict. She bases this conclusion, in part, on the premise that she is not required to accept probation. The point is of sufficient importance to require a review of the authorities both on appellant's premise and on her conclusion. In discussing the subject of pardon, the Supreme Court said, in Re Peterson, 1939, 14 Cal.2d 82, 84, 92 P.2d 890: "It has long been held that consent by the prisoner is a prerequisite to the validity of a conditional pardon because its terms may be more objectionable than the punishment fixed by the sentence." (page 85 of 14 Cal.2d, page 891 of 92 P.2d) "Section 1168 of the Penal Code, which defines the rights and duties of the board, and empowers it to parole prisoners upon such conditions as it may deem proper, does not authorize the board to require the prisoner to accept a parole ordered by it, and * * * the consent of the petitioner is a prerequisite to his release upon parole." (Section 1168 of the Penal Code was amended in 1941 (Stats. of 1941, Chap. 106, § 13), and that portion defining the rights and duties of the Board of Prison Terms and Paroles is now found in Sections 3020 to 3065 inclusive of the Penal Code.) The same reasoning applies to probation and the rule is the same unless the language of Penal Code, section 1203.1, "The court may impose and require any or all of the above mentioned terms * * *" (italics ours) deprives the defendant of the right to refuse probation. There is nothing in this language which says the defendant must accept probation. The right of a defendant to refuse probation is a necessary safeguard against the possibility that the conditions of probation may be more onerous than the sentence. The power of the court to impose conditions of probation is very great. For instance, in People v. Blankenship, 1936, 16 Cal.App.2d 606, 61 P.2d 352, it was held that a condition of probation that the defendant submit to a vasectomy was valid. Probation was never intended to be a device for making the punishment more severe than that prescribed by the legislature. As the court said in People v. Hainline, 1933, 219 Cal. 532, 534, 28 P.2d 16, 17, "'Probation' is defined as an act of grace and clemency, which may be granted by the court to a seemingly deserving defendant, whereby he may escape the extreme rigors of the penalty imposed by law for the offense of which he stands convicted." That the defendant is allowed to refuse probation and serve the original sentence if she deems probation too onerous is borne out by the statement of the court in People v. Blankenship, supra, 16 Cal.App.2d page 610, 61 P.2d page 353: "In conclusion, it may be remarked that appellant was not compelled by the condition which the court imposed to submit to an operation whose effect would be to foreclose him from procreation. He was permitted to elect whether he would comply with the condition and receive the clemency which he asked or decline to submit to the operation and accept the penalty which the law provides as punishment for his offense." We, therefore, agree with appellant that she does not have to accept probation, but it does not follow from this that the court lacks the power to order a probation investigation on its own motion. On the contrary, it is well settled that a court does have such power. Penal Code, § 1203; People v. Wilson, 1929, 101 Cal. App. 376, 281 P. 700; In re Phillips, 1941, 17 Cal.2d 55, 63, 109 P.2d 344, 132 A.L.R. 644. When the question of probation is being considered, the Municipal Court has the power to postpone sentence for twenty days. Penal Code, § 1449. This section makes no distinction between cases in which the defendant herself applies for probation and cases in which probation is considered on the court's own motion. So the court had jurisdiction on April 15 to pronounce judgment and sentence. Doubtless election to serve the sentence rather than accept probation must be timely made or probation will be deemed to have been accepted. In the case at bar, the appellant has, within proper time, exercised her election by a rejection of probation, and she should be imprisoned under her original sentence. The order suspending the execution of sentence and placing the defendant on probation subject to terms should be revoked. It therefore becomes unnecessary to decide whether the court had power as a condition of probation to order the defendant to leave the state after her release from jail.

[13] The order of April 5 continuing the cause to April 15 and referring the matter to the Probation Department is not an appealable order; the attempted appeal therefrom is dismissed.

The judgment and sentence and all orders appealed from, other than said order of April 5, are affirmed, with directions that the order suspending execution of judgment and sentence and granting probation be revoked.

LOS ANGELES WAREHOUSE CO v. AMERICAN DISTILLING CO.

S. F. No. 16878.

June 30, 1943.

1. Internal revenue ⚿1751

An internal revenue bonded warehouse, which contracted to receive distilled spirits from owner for storage, and which under a bond was required by government to pay the tax on spirits when they were destroyed in transit, could recover amount of tax from owner. 26 U.S.C.A. Int.Rev. Code, § 2800(a) (1), (c).

2. Bailment ⚿11

If bailed article is destroyed or damaged without bailee's fault, loss must fall on bailor.

3. Internal revenue ⚿1751

The federal laws and regulations governing imposition and collection of tax on liquor did not determine right of internal revenue bonded warehouse, which contracted to receive liquor from owner for storage and which was required by government to pay the tax on liquor destroyed in transit, to recover amount of tax from owner. 26 U.S.C.A. Int.Rev.Code, § 2800 (a) (1), (c).

4. Internal revenue ⚿1732

Inherently the tax on bonded liquor is imposed on the goods, and so far as persons dealing with liquor are concerned, tax follows the property as a necessarily included part of the value thereof, and hence payment of tax becomes an obligation of owner as an incident of ownership payable on removal from bond. 26 U.S.C. A. Int.Rev.Code, § 2800(a) (1), (c).

5. Money paid ⚿1

Where owner of liquor suggested to internal revenue bonded warehouse, to which liquor was sent for storage when it was destroyed, that warehouse should obtain remission or cancellation of liquor tax, and warehouse in making such unsuccessful attempt expended money for legal fees and premium on bond, owner was liable to warehouse for such expenditures. Gen. Laws 1937, Act 9059, § 27; Civ.Code, § 1856.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; George W. Schonfeld, Judge.

Action by the Los Angeles Warehouse Company against the American Distilling Company to recover certain sums of money originally paid out by plaintiff for the use and benefit of defendant whose bonded liquor was destroyed in transit to plaintiff. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals.

Affirmed.

Prior opinion, 130 P.2d 192.

Norman A. Eisner, of San Francisco, for appellant.

Sherman Anderson, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

SCHAUER, Justice.

This is an action by a bailee to recover from the bailor-owner moneys expended by the former in payment of an excise tax on the latter's property. The judgment in favor of the plaintiff-bailee must be sustained.

The property involved was 2,092.5 gallons of gin; exclusive of the tax it was worth 28 cents per gallon. The tax was the United States Internal Revenue excise on distilled spirits; it was imposed at the rate of $2.25 a gallon. Under the law, Int.Rev.Code, § 2800(a) (1) and (c), 26 U.S.C.A. Int.Rev.Code, § 2800(a) (1), (c), such tax attached to the gin "as soon as this substance [came into] existence as such." Obviously, therefore, the gin, as soon as it came into "existence as such," represented an invested value of $2.53 a gallon. (The possibility of abatement of the tax upon destruction of the gin under some circumstances need not be considered, as such contingency did not arise here.) Any owner of the gin necessarily had to consider its value as including the $2.25 a gallon tax inasmuch as such tax had to be paid.

Notwithstanding the fact that the tax attached to the gin simultaneously with its coming into existence, the actual payment of the tax could be deferred so long as the gin was kept in an internal revenue bonded warehouse (up to eight years). Defendant was the distiller and owner of the gin here involved; the tax on such gin had not been paid. Defendant was also the proprietor of a government bonded warehouse located in Sausalito, California.

Plaintiff was engaged in the business of conducting a similar government bonded warehouse, situated at Los Angeles, California, and as a part of its business on occasion caused distilled spirits to be transported in bond from bonded warehouses other than its own to its bonded warehouse at Los Angeles. Prior to October 11, 1938, defendant received from one of its customers a verbal purchase order for the gin here involved, together with directions that the gin be delivered to plaintiff's warehouse at Los Angeles for storage, title to pass after delivery in Los Angeles. On approximately October 11, 1938, defendant notified plaintiff of such order. In order to secure permission from the United States Internal Revenue Department to transport the gin from defendant's warehouse to that of plaintiff it was necessary for plaintiff to make application to the department, designating the carrier by which the gin was to be transported, and also to file a "Transportation and Warehousing Bond" to insure the payment of the tax on the gin. Plaintiff filed such bond with the department and designated the Evans Freight Lines, Inc., as the carrier. The gin was received by the designated carrier, but while it was in transit from the warehouse of defendant to that of plaintiff it was destroyed by fire, through no fault (so it was stipulated) of either plaintiff or defendant. The parties agree that ownership of the gin remained in defendant at all times and "that under the laws of the United States of America distilled spirits being transported in bond from one bonded warehouse to another are deemed from the time the same leave the discharging warehouse to be in the custody of the receiving warehouse."

Thereafter, at defendant's request, plaintiff filed with the Internal Revenue Department a claim for remission of the tax on the gin. The claim was rejected, and on March 29, 1939, the Collector of Internal Revenue demanded of plaintiff the payment of the tax in the sum of $4,708.13. Plaintiff notified defendant by letter of the demand, and asked for defendant's check with which to make payment. Defendant did not furnish such check, but in a reply letter to plaintiff, dated April 3, 1939, the president of defendant distilling company stated, among other things: "I suggest you use every means possible to have the Department remit or cancel this charge, and after that is definitely settled and the money is paid then we can go further into the matter." On April 7, 1939, plaintiff filed with the Collector of Internal Revenue a written claim for abatement of the tax, and in connection therewith was required to post a bond, which it did at a premium expense of $105.93. In June, 1939, plaintiff filed a supplemental claim. Fees paid by plaintiff for an attorney's assistance in the matter amounted to $100.

In July, 1939, the claim was rejected, and in August, 1939, plaintiff paid the tax and accrued interest thereon, in the total sum of $4,809.21. Plaintiff promptly demanded reimbursement from defendant for the tax, the bond premium, and the attorney's fees. Defendant refused to pay and plaintiff brought suit, and recovered judgment for the total of the three sums. From such judgment defendant has appealed.

It seems scarcely more than a truism to observe that when property is destroyed without negligence or other fault of any person the loss falls upon the owner. Yet that simple fact, in the final analysis, determines this litigation.

[1, 2] Defendant contends that the Internal Revenue Code and regulations of the Department of Internal Revenue place primary (and inferentially ultimate) responsibility upon plaintiff for payment of the tax, and that to hold the distiller liable therefor would place upon the latter an impossibly burdensome contingent liability should gin distilled by it be destroyed after such gin had passed out of its control. It is not as the distiller, however, but rather as the owner of the gin that defendant here must reimburse plaintiff. The owner of the liquor lost it when it burned, and he must bear the loss of its total value, which, as we have seen, includes the tax which had attached. If title had passed from defendant company to its customer, then such loss, in the absence of some other controlling circumstance, would have been upon the customer rather than upon defendant. The rights of the respective parties, had the loss been occasioned through some fault of plaintiff, need not concern us here, inasmuch as the parties have stipulated that "the destruction and loss of said gin was in no manner caused or contributed to by the plaintiff or [the] defendant." As stated in 4 California Jurisprudence 22, § 13, "If the subject of the bailment perishes or is lost, or is destroyed or damaged by accident, without any fault on the part of the bailee, the loss must fall on the bailor." See Hirshfield v. Central Pac. R. R. Co., (1880) 56 Cal. 484, 485; Rodgers v. Bachman, (1895) 109 Cal. 552, 557, 42 P. 448; Wolfe v. Willard H. George, Inc., (1930) 110 Cal.App. 532, 535, 294 P. 436.

[3, 4] The federal laws and regulations governing the imposition and collection of the tax do not determine the rights between the parties under the circumstances here depicted. The requirement that plaintiff furnish a transportation bond and the fact that the federal government looked primarily to plaintiff and only secondarily to defendant for payment of the tax are wholly immaterial in this case, to which the government is not a party and which involves no question of primary liability to the government but only that of ultimate liability as between a bailor and a bailee. The law and regulations imposing a primary and direct liability on the bailee-warehouse in favor of the government and requiring a bond from it constitute merely a scheme of procedure adopted by the government for the convenient and certain collection of the tax by it and for the accommodation and convenience of the distiller and subsequent owners in the free transfer of title to the liquor while it remains in bond, up to a period of eight years, without the actual advancement of the money for the tax. Such procedure helps the manufacturer and subsequent purchasers in that it brings the payment of the tax closer to the consumer who ultimately, in effect, pays it; i. e., the tax does not have to be paid to the government until the liquor is removed from the bonded warehouse presumably for distribution through retailers to the consumers, provided such removal is delayed not longer than eight years. Such procedure obviously does not purport to fix ultimate responsibility for the tax upon a bailee-warehouse in respect to its relationship with a bailor-owner. Liability of the distiller of the liquor, or of its bailee, to the government for payment of the tax is essentially different from responsibility for loss of the property (including ultimate responsibility for the tax) as among parties dealing with the liquor. Inherently the tax is imposed on the goods, not on the manufacturer or the bailee or any subsequent owner or consumer. So far as persons dealing with the liquor are concerned the tax follows the property as a necessarily included part of the value thereof and hence, its actual payment being merely deferred, it becomes an obligation of the owner, as an incident of ownership, payable on removal from bond.

[5] The gin was in the constructive custody of plaintiff as the receiving warehouse at the time it was destroyed, and such destruction was tantamount to removal from bond. Under the terms of its transportation bond plaintiff thereupon became liable to the United States Government for the immediate payment of the tax, and, at the demand of the Collector of Internal Revenue, advanced such tax. Plaintiff also advanced the money to pay the obligations it incurred for bond premium and attorney's fees in seeking abatement of the tax pursuant to defendant's request. Under the provisions of section 27 of the Warehouse Receipts Act, Stats.1909, p. 437; 2 Deerings' Gen.Laws, 1937, Act 9059, p. 4218, a warehouse is given a lien for "all lawful claims for money advanced * * * in relation to * * *" goods in its custody. It is also provided, in section 1856 of the Civil Code, that "A depository for hire has a lien for * * * advances * * * incurred at the request of the bailor." For the tax, the bond premium, and the attorney's fees advanced, plaintiff-warehouse is entitled to recover from the owner of the goods.

SHENK, CURTIS, and CARTER, JJ., concur.

TRAYNOR, Justice (dissenting in part).

I concur in the result reached in the majority opinion but do not agree that the federal excise tax on distilled spirits is a property tax, that the tax follows the property "as a necessarily included part of the value thereof," or that it "becomes an obligation of the owner, as an incident of ownership." To employ property law concepts in the solution of problems like the present one can lead only to confusion.

The issue turns not upon who had title to the liquor that was destroyed, but upon whose tax liability was discharged by plaintiff when it paid the tax after the destruction of the liquor. Defendant contends that plaintiff paid its own debt, on the ground that the liquor was being transported under the plaintiff's bond at the time it was lost. Plaintiff contends that it paid defendant's debt, and that the provisions requiring it to post a bond guaranteeing the payment of the tax in the event the liquor was withdrawn from bond are designed, not to impose a new or substituted tax, but merely to insure collection of a tax already imposed. The determination of this issue rests upon the proper interpretation of the federal statutes and regulations with respect to the federal excise tax on distilled spirits.

Section 2800(a) (1) of the Internal Revenue Code, 26 U.S.C.A. § 2800(a) (1), provided, at the time here pertinent: "There shall be levied and collected on all distilled spirits (except brandy) in bond or produced in or imported into the United States an internal revenue tax at the rate of $2.25 (and on brandy at the rate of $2.00) on each proof gallon or wine gallon when below proof and a proportionate tax at a like rate on all fractional parts of such proof or wine gallon, to be paid by the distiller or importer when withdrawn from bond." Section 2800(c) provided: "The tax shall attach to distilled spirits * * * as soon as this substance is in existence as such * * *." Section 2800(d) provided: "Every proprietor or possessor of, and every person in any manner interested in the use of, any still, distillery, or distilling apparatus, shall be jointly and severally liable for the taxes imposed by law on the distilled spirits produced therefrom."

These provisions impose an excise tax on distilled spirits measured by the quantity distilled. United States v. Singer, 82 U.S. 111, 11 Wall. 111, 121, 21 L.Ed. 49; see Patton v. Brady, 184 U.S. 608, 22 S.Ct. 493, 46 L.Ed. 713. Liability for the tax rests upon the distiller as soon as the liquor is in existence and until the tax is paid. If the tax were a property tax it would have to be apportioned among the states according to population. U.S.Const. art. 1, sec. 2; see Bromley v. McCaughn, 280 U.S. 124, 50 S. Ct. 46, 74 L.Ed. 226; Pollock v. Farmer's Loan & Trust Co., 157 U.S. 429, 15 S.Ct. 673, 39 L.Ed. 759.

Recognizing that liquor is frequently held several years before sale or resale, Congress provided for the postponement of the payment of the tax, not to exceed eight years, under conditions insuring payment. Thus section 2879(b) of the Internal Revenue Code, 26 U.S.C.A. Int.Rev.Code, § 2879(b), provides: "The tax on all distilled spirits hereafter entered for deposit in internal revenue bonded warehouses shall be due and payable before and at the time the same are withdrawn therefrom and within eight years from the date of the original entry for deposit therein; and warehousing bonds hereafter taken under the provisions of the internal revenue laws shall be conditioned for the payment of the tax on the spirits as specified in the entry before withdrawal from the internal revenue bonded warehouse, and within eight years from the date of said entry." Subdivision (c) of section 2879 provides: "The Commissioner shall prescribe the form and penal sums of bonds covering distilled spirits in internal revenue bonded warehouses and in transit to and between such warehouses: Provided, That the penal sums of such bonds covering distilled spirits shall not exceed in the aggregate $200,000 for each such warehouse." Pursuant to this provision the commissioner required each receiving warehouse to post a bond to insure payment of the tax when liquor was in transit to or in possession of the receiving warehouse. The bond posted by plaintiff expressly guaranteed payment of the tax by plaintiff in the event the liquor was destroyed while in transit to plaintiff.

While plaintiff's obligation was ancillary to and by way of security for the payment of the distiller's obligation, it did not supersede that obligation. Plaintiff discharged the tax liability that rested upon defendant until the tax was paid, and may recover from defendant under the established principle that "A person who, in whole or in part, has discharged a duty which is owed by him but which as between himself and another should have been discharged by the other, is entitled to indemnity from the other, unless the payor is barred by the wrongful nature of his conduct." Restatement: Restitution, § 76, p. 331; see cases cited in 17 Cal.Jur. 587 et seq.; see, also, Brooks Wharf and Bull's Wharf Co., Ltd. v. Goodman Bros., (1937) 1 K.B. 534.

Appeal from Superior Court, Alameda County; John J. Allen, Judge.

Action by Theresa Souza and others against John Corti, Joseph Gigli and another to recover for injuries sustained in automobile collision. Plaintiffs recovered judgment against defendant Corti, driver of one of the automobiles, and from that portion of the judgment which denied plaintiffs relief against the other defendants, plaintiffs appeal.

Judgment denying relief against such defendants reversed.

For prior opinion, see 129 P.2d 729.

Van A. Neher and Phillips & Munck, both of Oakland, for appellants.

Myron Harris, William H. Older, and John Jewett Earle, all of Oakland, for respondents.

SHENK, Justice.

This is an action for damages for personal injuries resulting from an automobile collision. Judgment was entered in favor of each of the plaintiffs against the defendant John Corti and in favor of the defendants Joseph and Arthur Gigli, father and son. The plaintiffs appealed from the judgment in so far as it is favorable to the defendants Gigli.

The appeal involves the construction, as applied to the undisputed facts, of section 402 of the Vehicle Code, St.1937, p. 2353, the pertinent part of which is as follows: "Every owner of a motor vehicle is liable and responsible for the death of or injury to person or property resulting from negligence in the operation of such motor vehicle, in the business of such owner or otherwise, by any person using or operating the same with the permission, express or implied, of such owner * * *."

Joseph Gigli was the owner of a Dodge sedan. He housed the car in the garage at his home where he and his family, including Arthur and a younger son, resided. The keys were left in the car and members of the family were permitted to use it. The son Arthur conducted a service station at San Leandro. He had general permission to use his father's car and had used it on an average of twice a week for a year and a half. On the evening of Saturday, July 6, 1940, Arthur loaned his own car to the younger brother. At a later hour Arthur desired to go out with his friend, the defendant John Corti, so he sought and obtained permission from his father to use the Dodge car. The father testified that Arthur asked him for the use of the car on that evening and that he granted permission to use it but with the admonition: "Don't lend the car to anyone else." Arthur took the car and in company with Corti stopped at Rocca's, a liquor dispensing establishment and dance hall. From there the two proceeded to a night spot known as Bruno's where they met two girls with whom they had not theretofore been acquainted. Later they decided to return to Rocca's and dance. Arthur suggested that the four go in the Dodge car. Arthur's girl objected because she had a new Plymouth coupe with her and did not want to leave it behind. Neither did Arthur wish to leave his father's car. In order to get the two cars to Rocca's and to make sure the girls would show up, Arthur decided to ride with his girl in the Plymouth. Accordingly he handed the keys of the Dodge to Corti who agreed to take the other girl in that car and "follow" the Plymouth car to Rocca's. The collision in which the plaintiffs were injured occurred on the return trip to Rocca's when the Dodge car, driven by Corti, collided with the plaintiff's car at the intersection of East 14th Street and Dutton Avenue in San Leandro. The negligence and liability of Corti is not disputed. The principal question is whether Joseph Gigli, the owner of the Dodge car, is liable in damages for the injuries sustained by the plaintiffs pursuant to the statute above quoted. He contends that he is not liable because he had not given express permission to Corti to drive the car and that permission so to do may not be implied for the reason that he instructed his son Arthur not to lend the car to anyone else

[1] The portion of the statute now under consideration was enacted in 1929 and was then included in section 1714¼ of the Civil Code. Stats.1929, p. 566. Its constitutionality is not questioned. See Sutton v. Tanger, 115 Cal.App. 267, 1 P.2d 521, O'Neill v. Williams, 127 Cal.App. 385, 15 P.2d 879. The statute defines the owner's liability in cases where the principle of respondeat superior is inapplicable, in order to make him liable for the negligence of any person to whom he had expressly or impliedly given permission to operate his car, and thereby prevent him from escaping liability by saying that his car was being used without express authority or not in his business. Bayless v. Mull, 50 Cal.App.2d 66, 122 P.2d 608; Plaumbo v. Ryan, 213 App.Div. 517, 210 N.Y.S. 225.

By a New York statute adopted in 1924 (New York Highway Law, 1924, ch. 534, § 282-e) liability was imposed on the owner similar to that prescribed by section 402 of our Vehicle Code. In Feitelberg v. Matuson, 124 Misc. 595, 208 N.Y.S. 786, 789, the defendant owner permitted one Mishkin to use his car. The accident occurred while Mishkin and some of his friends occupied the car. The driver was not Mishkin but one of his party. After upholding the constitutionality of the statute the court said: "The defendant also claims that the plaintiff cannot recover for the reason that the person to whom the car was loaned did not drive the car. The statute says, however, that the owner shall be liable for the acts of any person legally 'using or operating the same.' The words are used disjunctively. The Legislature drew a distinction between 'using' and 'operating.' To 'operate,' as distinguished from 'use,' signifies a personal act in working the mechanism of the car. Witherstine v. Employers' Liability Assur. Corporation, 235 N.Y. 168, 172, 139 N.E. 229, 28 A.L.R. 1298. As there stated: 'The driver operates the car for the owner, but the owner does not operate the car unless he drives it himself.' What was the purpose of adding the word 'use' unless it was meant to include the person who had the actual, though not physical, control of the car, and who was constituted by the owner its master ad hoc. If the liability of the owner were limited to the acts of the operator, the statute would become a dead letter in most cases. Its evasion would be an easy matter. The statute must be interpreted in harmony with its verbiage. We cannot hold that 'using' and 'operating' are interchangeable or synonymous words. If the owner chooses to intrust his car to another person, he invests such person, so long as he uses the car, with the same authority in regard to the management of the car which the owner has. That authority includes the right to select the operator. The statute so provides in unmistakable language." The court in that case also said: "Of course, the liability of the owner ceases when the borrower, in turn, gives the use of the car to a third party without the owner's consent." That statement was obiter, and in making it the court was merely emphasizing the distinction, under the New York law, between use and operation.

In Grant v. Knepper, 245 N.Y. 158, 156 N.E. 650, 54 A.L.R. 845, Carucci, an employee of the defendant owner, was in charge of a truck as driver, accompanied by a salesman. He permitted the salesman, who was neither experienced, competent nor licensed as a driver, to operate the vehicle, while the driver rode on the running board. An accident occurred resulting in damage to the car of a third party. The defendant owner was held liable, first, on the common law liability for the negligence of the owner's authorized representative. On a second ground the court, speaking through Cardozo, then Chief Judge, said at page 164 of 245 N.Y., 156 N.E. at page 652, 54 A.L.R. 845: "Passing from common law to statute, we find the owner's liability not merely continued, but extended. By Highway Law, § 282-e: 'Every owner of a motor vehicle operated upon a public highway shall be liable and responsible for death or injuries to person or property resulting from negligence in the operation of such motor vehicle, in the business of such owner or otherwise, by any person legally using or operating the same with the permission, express or implied, of such owner.' 'Use' as well as 'operation' may thus fasten liability upon the owner under the provisions of the statute. Fluegel v. Coudert, 244 N. Y. 393, 155 N.E. 683. This truck was intrusted by the defendant to Carucci, his driver, to be 'used' in the transportation of persons and property to and from a stated point. It was in use for that purpose and no other when the accident occurred. The defendant expected, to be sure, that Carucci would operate the truck as well as use it. None the less, use without more would entail liability for negligence. The statute may be said in a general way to have brought about the same results as had been attained in some other jurisdictions without reference to any statute by the so-called doctrine of 'the family automobile'. Fluegel v. Coudert, supra; Ferris v. Sterling, 214 N.Y. 249, at page 252, 108 N.E. 406, Ann.Cas.1916D, 1161. Only a narrow construction would permit us now to say that an owner placing a car in the care of members of his family to be used for their pleasure or for the family business would escape liability if wife or son or daughter should give over the wheel to the management of a friend. The ruling has been more liberal whenever the question has come up. Kayser v. Van Nest, 125 Minn. 277, 146 N.W. 1091, 51 L.R.A.,N.S., 970; Thixton v. Palmer, 210 Ky. 838, 276 S.W. 971, 44 A.L.R. 1379; Ulman v. Lindeman, 44 N.D. 36, 41, 176 N.W. 25, 10 A.L.R. 1440. Carucci did not abandon the car or its use when he surrendered to another the guidance of the wheel. He was still in charge of the truck, and was using it with the permission of the master, and even in the master's business. He did not cease to use it, and use it with permission, though the method of operation may have been illegal or forbidden. We think the effect of the statute is to read into our law the rule of liability laid down in Geiss v. Twin City Taxicab Co., 120 Minn. 368, 139 N. W. 611, 45 L.R.A.,N.S., 382. The owner is now liable, though the negligence of the substitute may have been 'sudden and unexpected' (Ricketts v. Tilling, supra) if the act of negligence occurs during the life of the permitted use. Carucci was delinquent, but he was still the director of the enterprise, still the custodian of the instrumentality confided to his keeping, still the master of the ship."

A law similar to the New York statute and to our own has been in effect in Michigan since 1915, Pub.Acts 1915, No. 302, § 29. A proviso contained therein "that the owner shall not be liable unless said motor vehicle is being driven by the express or implied consent or knowledge of such owner," has been upheld and construed in harmony with our present conclusion. Kerns v. Lewis, 246 Mich. 423, 224 N.W. 647; see also Kieszkowski v. Odlewany, 280 Mich. 388, 273 N.W. 741. The court in the case of Kerns v. Lewis declined to read into the statute the restriction that the particular driver must be known by and his driving consented to by the owner. In Hawkins v. Ermatinger, 211 Mich. 578, 179 N.W. 249, the provision of a statute declaring that the consent of the owner of a car to its use will be conclusively presumed when the same is driven by an immediate member of his family was held constitutional as within the police power of the state.

In the absence of statutory liability in the State of Washington the courts have adopted the "family use" doctrine to hold the parent responsible when a third person was driving even though the parent gave specific instructions that the third person should not drive the car. King v. Cann, 184 Wash. 554, 52 P.2d 900.

The courts of this state have not recognized the distinction made in such cases as Owen v. Gruntz, 216 App.Div. 19, 214 N.Y.S. 543, and Stapleton v. Hertz Drivurself Stations Inc., 131 Misc. 52, 225 N.Y.S. 661, where the car was turned over to a third person by the permittee. In the case of Haggard v. Frick, 6 Cal.App.2d 392, 44 P.2d 447, the defendant gave the use of a car to his son who was attending university, with the instruction not to permit anyone else to drive it. The son violated the instruction, and permitted another student to take the car and drive it for his own purposes. An accident occurred while the car was so being driven. The District Court of Appeal relied on several cases in this and other jurisdictions, including Grant v. Knepper, supra, in arriving at the conclusion that an owner is liable for the negligence of a person to whom his permittee has entrusted the automobile temporarily.

In Bayless v. Mull, 50 Cal.App.2d 66, at page 72, 122 P.2d 608, at page 612, in a discussion of the general principles, it was said "that the legislature did not intend by the language it used to permit an owner to show any and all restrictions he may have placed on the use of his car and thus escape liability." And again on page 75 of 50 Cal.App.2d, 122 P.2d at page 613, the view of many courts was stated to the effect that "as the owner can avoid the liability by refusing to permit the use of his motor car by another or procure insurance to protect him, he should not be permitted to avoid the consequences of the operator's negligence and escape liability therefor by secret restrictions limiting the right to use the motor vehicle."

The cases of Boland v. Gosser, 5 Cal.App.2d 700, 43 P.2d 559, and Howland v. Doyle, 6 Cal.App.2d 311, 44 P.2d 453, involved third party drivers, and the owner was held not liable. But in each of those cases the permittee was not given the general use of the vehicle. He had the car or truck to make certain repairs or tests, but turned it over to another for the purpose under circumstances which indicated that such delegation was not contemplated by the owner. However, if it may be said that there is anything stated in those cases which is not in harmony with the views expressed herein, it is necessarily disapproved.

[2] In the present case the use which was being made of the borrowed car at the time of the accident was the use which was contemplated by the owner. Any secret restrictions imposed by him on the manner of its use do not negative the controlling fact that it was being used with the owner's permission at the time of the accident. Violations of such restrictions may not be said to cause a revocation of the permission. Liability of the defendant owner in this case pursuant to section 402 of the Vehicle Code is therefore established. Cases such as Engstrom v. Auburn Auto Sales Corp., 11 Cal.2d 64, 77 P.2d 1059, Henrietta v. Evans, 10 Cal.2d 526, 75 P.2d 1051, and di Rebaylio v. Herndon, 6 Cal.App.2d 567, 44 P.2d 581, were concerned with violations of restrictions placed on the borrower as to the purpose for and the time within which the car was to be used. Further consideration need not now be given to those cases for the reason that we have here no question concerning the use of the car for the purpose or the period for which it was borrowed.

[3] As to the liability of the defendant Arthur Gigli, the record shows that defendant Corti took possession of the Dodge car for the use, benefit and accommodation and under the direction of Arthur and for the purpose of taking it to Rocca's for Arthur. Under these circumstances Arthur was the principal and Corti was his agent. The negligence of the latter was therefore imputable to Arthur. Maberto v. Wolfe, 106 Cal.App. 202, 289 P. 218.

The judgment in favor of the defendants Gigli is reversed.

GIBSON, C. J., and CURTIS and CARTER, JJ., concurred.

SCHAUER, Justice (concurring).

I concur in the judgment of reversal as to both Joseph Gigli and Arthur Gigli. In my opinion the evidence fails to support the finding that John Corti, in the operation of the automobile, was not the agent of Arthur Gigli. If John Corti was operating the car as the agent of Arthur Gigli, then the use of the car was that of Arthur Gigli. Regardless of the asserted admonition by Joseph Gigli (the father) to Arthur (his son) not to permit anyone else to drive it, he did consent to its use by Arthur. The situation is substantially the same as though the father had admonished the son not to operate the vehicle negligently. As Arthur was "using" the car at the time of the accident, its use was within the consent given by the father, even though Arthur had disobeyed his father's instruction not to permit another to operate it.

If Arthur had assumed to loan the vehicle to John for John's personal usage, as distinguished from that of Arthur, we should have a different question, for which I suggest no answer here.

When a person to whom an automobile has been entrusted embezzles it, and converts it to his own use in derogation of the title of the owner, I think the owner should not be held fictionally to have consented to usage which he did not in fact consent to, either expressly or impliedly. But when the usage which the bailee makes of a borrowed vehicle does not amount to a conversion of it, his mere disobedience of admonitions as to his personal conduct in the operation of the automobile within the scope of the authorized use should not exculpate the owner from the liability otherwise imposed by the statute.

In this case, Joseph Gigli consented to the use of the car by his son, and such consent covered the time and place in question. The father, therefore, is liable for negligence in its operation while it was being so used even though he had forbidden his son to allow another to operate it and his son had disobeyed such instruction. In the eyes of the law, by reason of the agency relationship, John Corti's operation of the automobile was Arthur Gigli's use of it. The consent of Joseph Gigli to such use (that is, use by Arthur) is all that is necessary to fasten liability upon him for negligence in its operation. As long as the vehicle was being used by Arthur, whether personally or through his agent, Joseph cannot avoid responsibility for negligence in its operation.

TRAYNOR, Justice (dissenting and concurring).

Under section 402 of the Vehicle Code the owner of a motor vehicle is not liable for an injury resulting from the negligence of another unless the latter was using or operating the vehicle with the express or implied permission of the owner when the injury occurred. It is settled that the owner does not become liable under this section merely by entrusting control of the vehicle to another, for if he qualifies his permission by specifying that the vehicle is to be used for a limited time, for a particular purpose, or in a particular locality, and such limitations are substantially violated, the permission terminates. Henrietta v. Evans, 10 Cal.2d 526, 75 P.2d 1051; Engstrom v. Auburn Auto Sales Corp., 11 Cal.2d 64, 77 P.2d 1059; see Bowerman v. Sheenan, 242 Mich. 95, 219 N.W. 69, 61 A.L.R. 866; Heavilin v. Wendell, 214 Iowa 844, 241 N.W. 654, 83 A.L.R. 878; 112 A.L.R. 416; 136 A.L.R. 481. When the owner grants permission, however, he cannot insure its termination upon the occurrence of an injury and thus defeat the purpose of the statute, by specifying that the vehicle is not to be used in a manner that could lead to injuries. It would be an obvious circumvention of the statute if permission could terminate upon violation of a general instruction that the vehicle was not to be operated negligently or in any manner that would violate the Vehicle Code. It would be just as much a circumvention if the owner gave permission to use the vehicle subject to particular restrictions that would free him from the risks of injury that normally attend use of a motor vehicle.

There is no circumvention of the statute, however, when an owner imposes restrictions to protect himself against undue risks, as when he restricts the use of the vehicle to certain times, places, or purposes. The object of such qualifications is to limit the use of the vehicle, not to free the owner from the risks that attend its use. The same object motivates the qualification that the one who receives permission to use a vehicle must not allow any one else to use it. It is more likely that this qualification would be made than any other, for an owner would hardly accord the privilege of using the vehicle except to someone in whom he had confidence. When he takes the precaution to restrict the privilege to a single person, he refuses his consent to the use of the vehicle by others and cannot properly be regarded as liable for injuries that might result from such a use under a statute that predicates the owner's liability on his consent to the use or operation of the vehicle. A qualification that forbids the operation of the vehicle by others also restricts the use of the vehicle by the person entrusted with it. He is precluded not only from lending the vehicle to anyone else, but from using it in any way himself that would involve its operation by another except as compelled by emergencies or the exigencies that arise in the normal use of a motor vehicle. Thus in the present case, the owner's qualification applied not only to Corti's use of the vehicle to transport himself and the girl that accompanied him to Rocca's but to Arthur Gigli's use of it by thus having it brought to him at Rocca's. I therefore dissent from the judgment of reversal as to the owner, Joseph Gigli.

I concur in the judgment of reversal as to Arthur Gigli. There is no conflict in the evidence that while Corti used the vehicle for his own purposes, he operated it at the same time on behalf of Arthur Gigli in getting the vehicle to Rocca's for him. He was thus Arthur Gigli's agent regardless of the accomplishments of his own purposes. Brimberry v. Dudfield Lumber Co., 183 Cal. 454, 462, 191 P. 894; Ryan v. Farrell, 208 Cal. 200, 204, 280 P. 945; see Restatement, Agency, § 236, California Annotations—171; Mechem on Agency, 2d Ed., § 1895.

EDMONDS, Justice (dissenting).

I can see no basis recognized in law for enlarging the vicarious liability of an automobile owner to the extent stated by my associates. In my opinion, they have adopted a construction of section 402 of the Vehicle Code which ignores its express language and is directly contrary to all former decisions of the California appellate courts. The conclusion now reached not only changes the rule as to the owner in the present case, but also, in effect, imposes a retroactive liability upon the respondents and other persons who have loaned their automobiles in reliance upon the former interpretation of the statute. And even more startling is the reversal of a judgment based upon findings of fact which, in turn, are supported by substantial evidence.

Indeed, the essential facts are not disputed. It appears that for the preceding 18 months, Joseph Gigli had loaned his Dodge sedan to his son on an average of twice each week, and when left in the garage at their home, the keys were not taken out of it. On the evening the accident occurred, Arthur asked his father to allow him to use the automobile. The father gave his consent, but, according to his testimony, told Arthur "not to loan the car to nobody else." He also said he had directed Arthur "Not to leave anybody else use it" and to "Let nobody else drive it." These answers followed the form of the questions. But on cross-examination he was asked whether all that concerned him was "that he didn't lend the car to somebody else," "No it is not," was the reply. "What were you concerned with?" counsel continued. Mr. Gigli answered: "Leave nobody drive it." This was followed by the question: "Which is true, that you told him not to lend the car to somebody else and nothing else, or that you told him more than that?" Mr. Gigli replied: "I told him not to leave anybody else drive the car."

Following this conversation, Arthur took the automobile and with his friend, John Corti, went to Bruno's Inn, where they made the acquaintance of two girls. The four subsequently agreed to go to Rocca's Inn, another roadhouse, to dance. Arthur suggested that they go in his father's sedan, but his newly-found companion objected upon the ground that she did not want to leave her new Plymouth coupe at Bruno's. Arthur objected to leaving his father's car there. Corti then asked Arthur to give him the keys to the Dodge, saying that he and the other girl would follow the coupe to Rocca's. Arthur consented and rode with his girl in her Plymouth. The accident occurred on the way to Rocca's.

The trial court found that the accident was caused solely by the negligence of Corti, but that he was, at the time of the accident, operating the automobile without the knowledge and without the permission, express or implied, of its owner, Joseph Gigli. In addition, the court found that "at the time and place of the collision * * * John Corti was not acting as the agent, servant or employee of either or both of the defendants Arthur Gigli and Joseph Gigli."

In considering the legal position of Joseph Gigli as the owner of the automobile, it is necessary first to determine the nature of the express condition which he imposed when he loaned the car. The only restriction placed upon the use of the car, assert the appellants, was, according to the father's testimony, "not to loan the car to nobody else." And the son, they insist, did not loan the car to anyone else but allowed John Corti to drive it for his benefit and accommodation. Assuming, however, that some of the evidence affords a basis for such a distinction, other testimony amply supports the trial court's conclusion as to the terms of the loan. Considering the entire record, it clearly appears to have been Joseph Gigli's intention that Arthur should allow no one else to drive the car, a condition which Arthur fully understood.

By the terms of section 402 of the Vehicle Code, "Every owner of a motor vehicle is liable and responsible for the death of or injury to person or property resulting from negligence in the operation of such motor vehicle, in the business of such owner or otherwise, by any person using or operating the same with the permission, express or implied, of such owner * * *." There is no ambiguity in these words; the owner is liable only if the injury was occasioned by the negligent operation of the person who is using or operating the motor vehicle with the permission of the owner. And the courts of California and of other states in considering this statute and similar legislation, have uniformly held that, when an owner allows another to use his car but limits the use of the vehicle by the permittee, the latter is not "using or operating the same with the permission, express or implied, of such owner" when he exceeds those limitations. (See, in general, annotations in 135 A.L.R. 481, 486-490; 112 A.L.R. 416, 421-424; 83 A.L.R. 878, 881-883; 61 A.L.R. 866, 872, 873). Thus, in California, the courts have, without exception, upheld restrictions upon the time, place or purpose of the permittee's use, and as to who may drive the automobile. Time: Engstrom v. Auburn Auto Sales Corp., 11 Cal.2d 64, 77 P.2d 1059; di Rebaylio v. Herndon, 6 Cal.App.2d 567, 44 P.2d 581. Place or purpose: Henrietta v. Evans, 10 Cal.2d 526, 75 P.2d 1051; cf. reasonable deviation from place of operation where no express restriction as to locality in Bayless v. Mull, 50 Cal.App.2d 66, 122 P.2d 608. Person: Bradford v. Sargent, 135 Cal.App. 324, 326, 27 P.2d 93; Boland v. Gosser, 5 Cal.App.2d 700, 43 P.2d 559; Howland v. Doyle, 6 Cal.App.2d 311, 44 P.2d 453; Helmuth v. Frame, 46 Cal.App.2d 381, 115 P.2d 852.

Assuming that, as stated in the majority and concurring opinions, the trier of facts acted unreasonably in concluding that Corti was not driving the car as the agent of Arthur Gigli, although the use of the car at the time of the accident may have been the use of Arthur, the question still remains, under the statute, whether that use by Arthur is a permitted one. For, as pointed out by this court very recently: "The fact of permission is just as important as is the fact of ownership. If either is absent the statute does not operate." Krum v. Malloy, 22 Cal.2d 132, 137 P.2d 18, 19.

It has been held that where the owner gives his express permission for the use of the car for a certain purpose without restriction as to who is to operate it in order to effect that purpose, the authority of the permittee may impliedly include the right to select the operator to carry out the permitted use (Haggard v. Frick, 6 Cal.App.2d 392, 44 P.2d 447; Pohle v. Bolinas Beach R. Co., 130 Cal.App. 704, 20 P.2d 730; Sutton v. Tanger, 115 Cal.App. 267, 1 P.2d 521), although the circumstances may be such as to negative such authority. Howland v. Doyle, supra; and see Engstrom v. Auburn Auto Sales Corp., supra; see annotations in 112 A.L.R. 416, 424, 425; 83 A.L.R. 878, 884; 61 A.L.R 866, 873-875. But obviously, an expressed intention always supplants an implied one (Tanner v. Title Ins. & Trust Co., 20 Cal.2d 814, 824, 129 P.2d 383; Jones v. Interstate Oil Corp., 115 Cal.App. 302, 1 P.2d 1051; Cliffe Co. v. Du Pont Eng. Co., D.C., 298 F. 649, 651; and see 5 Williston on Contracts, Rev.Ed.1937, § 1293 n. 1., p. 3682), and for that reason consent may not be implied when it is expressly withheld.

The factors required for a finding of either express permission or of implied consent have been stated in many cases. One of these is Bradford v. Sargent, supra, which presented the same question as is now before the court. It was there shown that the owner of the car causing injury had instructed his son that no one other than a specified person should be allowed to drive it. The son allowed another boy to drive the automobile and an accident resulted. A judgment against the owner was reversed. In determining that no permission contemplated by the statute had been given, the court said [135 Cal.App. 324, 27 P.2d 96]: "Express permission would necessarily include prior knowledge of the intended use and an affirmative and active consent to it. An implied consent would indicate a sufferance of use or a passive permission deduced from a failure to object to a known past, present, or intended future use under circumstances where the use should be anticipated. Knowledge of some act or intended act on the part of the user by the owner should be necessary before consent to use should be implied." This decision, directly in point, is not discussed in either the concurring opinion or that of the majority, although this court denied a petition for hearing.

And compare the conclusions upon which the judgment in the present case is reversed with Howland v. Doyle, supra, 6 Cal.App.

2d at page 315, 44 P.2d at page 455, where the District Court of Appeal held: "Permission to drive a motor vehicle, implied as well as express, such as is necessary to bring the case within section 1714¼ [the predecessor of the statute now being considered], can only exist when the owner had knowledge or at least reason for believing that the vehicle would be driven by the person with whose negligence it is sought to charge him." Again a petition for hearing was denied by this court. It also denied a petition for hearing after the decision in Boland v. Gosser, supra. And both Howland v. Doyle and Bradford v. Sargent were expressly approved by this court in Engstrom v. Auburn Auto Sales Corp., supra, and Henrietta v. Evans, supra. The majority opinion, in attempting to distinguish Boland v. Gosser, supra, and Howland v. Doyle, from the present case says that, in those cases, the permittee "had the car or truck to make certain repairs or tests, but turned it over to another for the purpose under circumstances which indicated that such delegation was not contemplated by the owner." (Italics added.) But how may it be said that the delegation to Corti was contemplated by the owner when Joseph Gigli had expressly forbidden any such delegation, and it is an uncontradicted fact that Arthur Gigli had never before allowed another to drive his father's car?

The majority opinion also declares that in the case of Haggard v. Frick, supra [6 Cal.App.2d 392, 44 P.2d 448], the owner of an automobile was held liable although his son violated the father's instruction not to permit anyone else to drive it. But in that case it appears that the father merely expressed the wish to his son that he "would rather he would not let any other person drive" the car. In holding Frick, the owner, liable the court pointed out that he had "delivered the car to his son without direction or restriction as to its use other than the expressed wish that he would not let any one else drive it. It was given, however, with the intention and understanding that the son should have the exclusive use and control of the car throughout the college year, at a place more than 400 miles from appellant's home." Such precatory words do not constitute a limitation upon the authority of the permittee and the decision is simply one in accord with the rule which places within the authority of a permittee without restriction the right to select an operator to drive the car, with consequent liability upon the owner for negligent operation within the field of the permitted use. Yet this is the sole authority, so far as the cases in this state are concerned, upon which a majority of the court relies for a reversal of the judgment in the present case. And, in quoting from the case of Bayless v. Mull, supra [50 Cal.App.2d 66, 122 P.2d 612], their opinion ignores the fact that "there were no express restrictions or limitations" concerning the use of the automobile which caused injury and the court placed its decision upon that ground.

No logical distinction may be made between restrictions upon the purpose, time or place for which an automobile may be used and a limitation upon who may drive it. Indeed, the owner of an automobile may be principally concerned about the operator, for the skill and driving habits of a proposed borrower are usually of much more importance in determining whether one should be entrusted with an automobile than the length of time for or the purpose of the proposed use. Yet in considering a restriction upon time, "* * * it is undisputed," said this court in the Engstrom case "that the only permission given Herndon to use the car was that he might have it for a particularly specified period. The accident happened a day after this time expired. To hold that Herndon was then driving the car with either the express or implied consent of the owner would require us to disregard the plain agreement of the parties." [11 Cal.2d 64, 77 P.2d 1062.] The facts of the present case are much more compelling in favor of the owner, for the undisputed evidence is that at no time did he give permission to Corti to use the car, and permission certainly may not be implied when he gave positive instructions to the contrary.

The record in Henrietta v. Evans, 10 Cal.2d 526, 75 P.2d 1051, 1052, showed "a case of an original permission for a limited use, the scope of which was exceeded; and the question is whether the original express consent terminated prior to the accident by reason of the violation of the limitation." The owners entrusted their automobile to one Evans for the sole purpose of driving the car to Beaumont to consummate its sale there. Evans, however, continued on through Beaumont to Colton, where the collision occurred. "There is no evidence," said the court, "to show authorization to use the car for any other purpose or to drive it to any other place; on the contrary, the only testimony in the record is to the effect that any other use was expressly prohibited. * * * The cases uniformly hold that, where the permission is granted for a limited time, any use after the expiration of the period is without consent, and the owner is not liable, unless the circumstances justify an inference of implied consent to further use. * * * On principle, there is no fundamental ground of distinction between a limitation of time and one of purpose or place, in so far as permission is concerned; and it would seem clear that a substantial violation of either limitation terminates the original express consent and makes the subsequent use without permission." The owners were held not liable.

Nor do the cases from other jurisdictions, cited in the majority opinion, support the conclusions there reached. Following the rule adopted in California, they hold that consent to the use or operation of the motor vehicle by one person, may, in the absence of any express restriction as to the operator, include consent to the operation of the car for the permitted use by another. This is all that was decided in Feitelberg v. Matuson, 124 Misc. 595, 208 N.Y.S. 786, 789, but, the court added, "Of course, the liability of the owner ceases when the borrower, in turn, gives the use of the car to a third party without the owner's consent." Also the facts stated in Grant v. Knepper, 245 N.Y. 158, 156 N.E. 650, 652, 54 A.L.R. 845, clearly show that there was no express restriction by the owner of the truck upon the method of operation of the vehicle. As the court there said, although the driver had surrendered to another the guidance of the wheel, he remained on the truck and "was still the director of the enterprise, still the custodian of the instrumentality confided to his keeping, still the master of the ship."

In the case of Stapleton v. Hertz Drivurself Stations, 129 Misc. 772, 222 N.Y.S. 579, strongly relied upon by the appellants, the trial court held an owner liable although his permittee had signed a lease by the terms of which he expressly agreed not to allow or permit any other person to operate the automobile. In violation of the covenant, he allowed another to drive the automobile, through whose negligence the accident occurred. Upon appeal, the judgment was reversed, the court holding that the use by a third person was not authorized by the owner. Stapleton v. Hertz Drivurself Stations, 131 Misc. 52, 225 N.Y.S. 661; accord: Owen v. Gruntz, 216 App. Div. 19, 214 N.Y.S. 543.

In Kerns v. Lewis, 246 Mich. 423, 224 N.W. 647, no express limitation was imposed by the owner of the vehicle as to who should drive it. But that case is not authority upon the question of the owner Corti's liability for a more fundamental reason. Unlike the California legislation which imposes liability for the negligent operation of a motor vehicle "by any person using or operating the same with the permission, express or implied, of such owner," the Michigan law makes the owner liable if the "motor vehicle is being driven by the express or implied consent or knowledge of such owner." In commenting upon this provision, the court said at page 425 of 246 Mich., 224 N.W. at page 648: "Does the essential consent mentioned in the statute relate to the driver, or to the vehicle 'being driven'? The statute makes the owner liable if the 'motor vehicle is being driven with his or her express or implied consent or knowledge,' and we cannot read into it the restriction that the particular driver must be known by and his driving consented to by the owner. The statute may be drastic, but we cannot render it less so by any permissible construction."

The only case from a foreign jurisdiction, cited by the appellants or by the majority opinion, in which any express restriction upon the person who might drive was imposed by the owner is King v. Cann, 184 Wash. 554, 52 P.2d 900, 901. In that case, the court observed, "There was also some testimony to the effect that Mrs. Cann had told young Holt [the driver of the car at the time of the accident] that she 'would prefer that he did not drive the car.'" Thus the case is very similar to that of Haggard v. Frick, 6 Cal.App.2d 392, 44 P.2d 447, 448, where the father merely expressed the wish to his son that he "would rather he would not let any other person drive" the car. In addition, however, liability in the King case was predicated, not upon any such statute as is here involved, but in accordance with the doctrine of respondeat superior. In the words of the Washington court, "When a member of the family has permission to use the car from the parents, as owners, in so unrestricted a manner as in the instant case, they must be held liable under the principle of agency, or respondeat superior, even though the member of the family turned the driving of the car over to another who proved incompetent or negligent."

And I can see no reasonable basis for characterizing the limited permission given by the owner of an automobile in connection with its use "secret restrictions." To hold that an owner may not qualify his permission and restrict it to a specified use of his automobile, modifies the statute in an important particular and makes him liable for consequences regardless of the terms imposed by him and accepted by the borrower of the automobile. It also takes from the trier of fact the right to determine whether, under the particular circumstances shown, the negligent driver was operating the automobile at the time of the accident with the permission, express or implied, of the owner.

The argument of the majority opinion against the recognition of what are termed "secret" restrictions upon the use of a motor vehicle (see Bayless v. Mull, supra, 50 Cal.App.2d at page 72, 122 P.2d at page 611), as I view the matter, is based upon a misconception of the liability established by section 402 of the Vehicle Code. One is not bound by "secret" restrictions when he has been induced to act through reliance upon the apparent or ostensible authority with which a principal has clothed his agent. See Civ.Code, § 2334. But, obviously an injured plaintiff did not allow the accident to occur through reliance upon the fact that the negligently operated vehicle was being used with rather than without the permission of the owner. And, in any event, the victim is not informed by the operation of an automobile, whether it is being driven by a permittee or a thief. Moreover, a limitation upon the purpose or extent of the permitted use is just as "secret" as is a restriction upon the person who may drive the car.

Much of the confusion in the consideration of the question of restrictive use under such statutes as section 402 of the Vehicle Code, and the classification of some restrictions as "secret" or "unreasonable," undoubtedly has arisen through the reluctance of the courts to recognize such limitations as those upon excessive speed or careless driving. But the wording of the statute, which makes the owner responsible for the "negligence in operation" of his motor vehicle, affords a more satisfactory basis for the exclusion of restrictions upon the manner of driving than a judicially created one dependent upon what a particular court may deem reasonable. For the Legislature has taken from the owner the right to limit the extent of his permission under the statute to a non-negligent operation by express restrictions upon his permittee to drive only in a safe, careful, or lawful manner. So long, therefore, as the owner, either expressly or impliedly, has consented to the purpose and extent to which the car may be used and its operation by the person who is driving at the time of the accident, he is responsible for the negligence of that driver occurring while the car is being operated within such prescribed limits, regardless of any directions as to the manner of operation.

Also, in my judgment, the majority and concurring opinions have unduly extended the meaning of the word "operation" as used in the statute. In order to impose liability upon Joseph Gigli, the negligent "operation" must have been that of Arthur, as he was "the person using or operating" the car with the qualified permission of the owner. The word "operation," although broadly construed to hold that the permittee may be operating the car although not at the wheel so long as he remains in the car and retains supervision and control over the manner of driving, has not been extended to include a situation where the permittee is no longer in the car and therefore not in a position to "direct or superintend" the operation of the vehicle. See Hicks v. Reis, 21 Cal.2d 654, 659, 134 P.2d 788; Armstrong v. Sengo, 17 Cal.App.2d 300 61 P.2d 1188; Sutton v. Tanger, 115 Cal.App. 267, 1 P.2d 521; Grant v. Knepper, 245 N.Y. 158, 156 N.E. 650, 54 A.L.R. 845; Feitelberg v. Matuson, 124 Misc. 595, 208 N.Y.S. 786; Owen v. Gruntz, 216 App.Div. 19, 214 N.Y.S. 543; Stapleton v. Hertz Drivurself Stations Inc., 131 Misc. 52, 225 N.Y.S. 661. It is therefore clear that under the rule of these decisions, the "negligence in the operation" of the Gigli machine was not that of Arthur, who was riding in another automobile.

In the foregoing discussion, I have assumed the correctness of the conclusion in the majority and concurring opinions that no evidence, or inference from the evidence, justified the trial court in finding that Corti was not the agent of Arthur Gigli at the time of the accident. As I read the record, it would support a conclusion by the trial court that the agency relation existed, in view of the fact that Arthur did not want to leave his father's car behind and also because he and Corti had decided that one of them should ride with the girls, as otherwise they might not "show up" at Rocca's. But, the testimony shows, it was Corti's suggestion that he drive the car. He was very insistent in his demand for it, and wished to use it as a means of transportation for his girl and himself. Certainly this evidence is entirely consistent with the finding of the trial court that Corti, at the time of the accident, was not driving the Dodge car as the agent of either the father or the son.

Section 402 of the Vehicle Code imposes a liability upon the owner which did not exist at common law. It may be said with much reason that, in the interests of public policy, the owner of an automobile should be responsible for its negligent use regardless of who may be operating it at the time of the injury. But that is a matter for legislative and not judicial concern, and the statute here in controversy imposes liability only when the vehicle is being operated at the time of the accident with the consent of the owner. Whether in a given case the driver at fault had such permission is a question of fact. The trier of fact is not bound to believe the testimony of an owner as to the restrictions imposed by him upon the use of his car by the permittee, even though it be uncontradicted (Prickett v. Whapples, 10 Cal.App.2d 701, 703–705, 52 P.2d 972), and many times this court has affirmed judgments in favor of the plaintiffs upon testimony as meagre as that which supports the court's findings in the present case. Hicks v. Reis, 21 Cal.2d 654, 134 P.2d 788; Blank v. Coffin, 20 Cal.2d 457, 126 P.2d 868. The application of the rule announced in those cases that any reasonable doubt should be resolved in favor of the conclusion by the trier of fact should not be limited to but one party to an action under that statute and, in my opinion, compels agreement with the finding that Corti was not the agent of Arthur Gigli. Of course, if Corti was not the agent of Arthur, then obviously the former's use of the car at the time of the accident was not Arthur's use, and the entire structure upon which the majority and concurring opinions are predicated collapses, as under no theory of construction, could Corti's use then be said to be the one to which Joseph Gigli had consented.

For these reasons I believe that the judgment should be affirmed as to both Joseph Gigli and Arthur Gigli.

1. Appeal and error ⇨979(2)

An order granting a new trial upon ground of insufficiency of evidence must be affirmed unless order constituted an abuse of discretion.

New trial ⇨13, 72

If it appears to trial judge that verdict was against weight of evidence and that interests of justice would be promoted by new trial, trial judge must grant motion for new trial, and, if there is any reasonable basis for his so believing, his determination will be deemed conclusive on appeal.

3. New trial ⇨70

Trial judge's discretion in granting motion for new trial on ground of insufficiency of evidence is exceedingly broad.

4. Appeal and error ⇨1015(3)

If evidence would have sustained a verdict in favor of plaintiffs, order granting them a new trial on ground of insufficiency of evidence should be affirmed.

5. New trial ⇨72

In action arising out of intersectional collision by automobile guests and their husbands against driver of other automobile, where it could be found from evidence that automobile in which guests were riding entered intersection first and entered intersection from defendant's right, trial judge did not abuse his discretion in granting plaintiffs' motion for new trial upon ground of insufficiency of evidence, following verdict and judgment for defendant. Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Charles C. Montgomery, Judge.

Action by Lee K. Ewing and Dorothy Ewing, husband and wife, and Frank Prescott and Dorothy Prescott, husband and wife, and others, against Otokichi Hamada, for damages arising out of an automobile collision. From an order granting named plaintiffs a new trial, following a verdict and judgment for defendant, the defendant appeals.

Affirmed.

C. F. Jorz, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Paul Blackwood and Samuel P. Young, both of Los Angeles, for respondents.

SHINN, Acting Presiding Justice.

In this action for damages arising out of an automobile collision, defendant Hamada appeals from an order granting certain of the plaintiffs a new trial upon the ground of insufficiency of the evidence, following a verdict and judgment for defendant.

Two of the plaintiffs who were granted new trials were guests in a car driven by Grace Gerstenkorn at the time it collided with defendant's truck. The other plaintiffs who were granted new trials were the respective husbands of the women guests.

[1-4] The correctness of the order granting a new trial upon the ground of insufficiency of the evidence is to be judged under well established rules. The order must be affirmed unless it constituted an abuse of discretion. If it appeared to the trial judge that the verdict was against the weight of the evidence and that the interests of justice would be promoted by a new trial, it was his duty to grant the motion, and if there was any reasonable basis for his so believing, his determination, being one of fact, will be deemed conclusive on appeal. His discretion is exceedingly broad. If the evidence would have sustained a verdict in favor of the plaintiffs, the order granting them a new trial should be affirmed. Brininstool v. Pacific Elec. Ry. Co., 1924, 66 Cal.App. 445, 449, 226 P. 410; Butler v. Miller, 1924, 69 Cal.App. 586, 587, 231 P. 1007.

A brief statement of some of the material facts in evidence will disclose that there was a sound basis for the order. There was testimony which, if believed, was sufficient to establish the following, as facts: That Grace Gerstenkorn, driving north on Barrington Avenue, entered the intersection of Goshen Street and in attempting to cross the latter street had traveled to the middle of the intersection, where the left rear side of her car was struck by the right front of defendant's truck, which was travelling east. The Gerstenkorn car continued on toward the northeast corner of the intersection and turned over. It was travelling at about 15 or 20 miles per hour when it was from 25 to 35 feet south of the intersection, at which point the driver saw defendant's truck approaching from the west at a distance of about 100 feet from the intersection and at a speed which she estimated at from 25 to 30 miles per hour. As she neared the middle of the intersection she saw the truck close upon her, tried to speed up her car, and turned it sharply to the right. The trial judge had ample reason to believe that the Gerstenkorn car entered the intersection first, and it admittedly entered from defendant's right. If it entered first, or the two entered at the same time, defendant was required to yield the right of way. Vehicle Code, sec. 550, St.1937, p. 619. Defendant testified that when his car was 100 feet west of Barrington he could see for a distance of from 50 to 70 feet south on Barrington; that he was travelling about 20 or 25 miles per hour; that he did not see the Gerstenkorn car until he, defendant, was about 15 feet from the intersection, and that the other car when he first saw it was 35 or 40 feet south of the southerly curb line of Goshen. He did not give any explanation of his failure to look toward the south or to see traffic approaching from that direction before he reached the point 15 feet from the intersection.

[5] The mere statement of these facts discloses good reason for granting a new trial. A most reasonable conclusion from defendant's testimony would be that he failed to exercise ordinary care as he approached the intersection. His view was not obstructed and his failure to look or to see what was in plain sight was convincing evidence of his negligence. And in addition, the court might have believed that defendant did not see the other car at all before the collision. His account of the accident was sharply contradicted by other testimony and by the physical facts in evidence, for it is obvious that had the Gerstenkorn car been 35 or 40 feet away from the intersection when defendant's car was no more than 15 feet from the intersection, the cars could not have come together as they did and might not have collided at all. The evidence of defendant's negligence was so strong as to leave no doubt that the trial judge properly and wisely exercised his discretion in granting the new trial. The appeal is utterly devoid of merit.

The order is affirmed.

LANDE v. JURISICH.

Civ. 13607.

District Court of Appeal, Second District,
Division 3, California.
July 9, 1943.

1. Assignments 🔑3

The statute regulating assignments of wages, being "remedial", must be liberally construed, and its interpretation does not so much depend upon the technical definition of the terms used therein as upon the sense in which they were used, and the statute manifests an intent to protect wage earners and salaried workers against the possibility that they may go too far in sacrificing the future to the needs or desires of the present and their remedy ought not to be defeated by judicial construction if that result can reasonably be avoided. St.1937, p. 202, § 303.

2. Statutes 🔑236

A remedial statute must be liberally construed so as to effect its object, and, although due regard will be given to the language used, such statute will be construed, when it is doubtful, so as to suppress the mischief at which it is directed and to advance the remedy provided and bring within the law every case which comes clearly within its spirit.

3. Assignment 🔑11

The mere imposing of a lien on unearned wages is not an "assignment" of them.

4. Equity 🔑23

Where a contract has been voluntarily, understandingly, and fairly entered into and is free from any circumstance justifying equitable relief, an equity court must give full effect to such contract and that for one of the parties the contract was unwise or that its enforcement is harsh, when it was so intended, is immaterial.

5. Equity 🔑1

While an equity court may exercise broad powers of applying equitable remedies, it may not create new substantive rights under the guise of doing equity.

6. Assignments 🔑3

The statute regulating "assignment" of or "order" for wages by use of quoted words manifests an intent to reach every form of instrument which would impound a wage earner's wages before he received them. St.1937, p. 202, § 303.

The term "order" has no fixed legal meaning.

7. Assignments 🔑12

Where contract granting a lien to defendant on plaintiff's unearned wages to secure note, if valid, passed to defendant a new interest in plaintiff's future wages, contract "assigned" an interest to defendant, and, where the agreement would result in an order of court for payment of wages to defendant to extent of his lien, contract was an "order" within statute prohibiting assignment of and order for unearned wages, and the contract was not valid under statute authorizing agreements to create liens upon after acquired or nonexistent property. Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Thurmond Clarke, Judge.

Declaratory judgment action by C. J. Lande against George Jurisich. From an adverse judgment, plaintiff appeals.

Reversed.

Joseph A. Zahradka, Jr., of Los Angeles, for appellant.

L. J. Styskal and Sarah B. Danning, both of Los Angeles, for respondent.

Robert W. Kenny, Atty. Gen., and J. Albert Hutchinson, Deputy Atty. Gen., for amicus curiae on behalf of appellant.

SHAW, Justice pro tem.

Plaintiff appeals from the judgment in an action for declaratory relief. He sought a declaration that a specific part of a contract set up in his complaint is invalid and therefore not binding upon him; the trial court declared it to be valid. The facts are not in dispute. The answer admitted all of the complaint except some conclusions of law, the parties stipulated to the facts so admitted and the court made findings accordingly.

The material facts are as follows: On October 15, 1940, the plaintiff, to evidence a loan to him of $1,000 by defendant, made his promissory note to defendant for that sum, with ten per cent interest, payable in installments of $50 and interest on the 15th day of each month until paid. When this action was brought two of these installments were delinquent and the defendant had, pursuant to the terms of the note, declared the entire amount of the note immediately due and payable. At the time of execution of, and as security for, this note, plaintiff executed and delivered to defendant a paper headed "Assignment of and Lien Upon Wages and Other Compensation," which described the note, assigned to defendant all wages theretofore earned by plaintiff under his employment with a named employer and authorized defendant to collect those wages. This paper contained the following provision, which is the subject of this action: "The undersigned hereby agrees to pay the lender, his successors and assigns, the amount of the promissory note aforesaid in installments as above set forth, upon the terms and conditions contained in said promissory note, from and out of the amount or amounts hereafter to be earned by the undersigned as wages, commissions and other compensation for services in the employ of the employer above named, and as security for such payment, the undersigned hereby grants unto the lender, his successors and assigns, a lien upon said wages, commissions and other compensation, which lien shall be enforceable by an appropriate action in a Court of Equity, but only after default in the making of the installments aforesaid or any thereof." Plaintiff contends that so much of this provision as purports to grant to defendant a lien on plaintiff's unearned wages is void, whereas defendant claims it is valid and threatens to take legal proceedings against plaintiff and his employer to enforce the lien. We think plaintiff's contention must prevail.

Defendant rests his claim of validity on section 2883 of the Civil Code, which provides: "An agreement may be made to create a lien upon property not yet acquired by the party agreeing to give the lien, or not yet in existence. In such case the lien agreed for attaches from the time when the party agreeing to give it acquires an interest in the thing, to the extent of such interest." In the absence of any other applicable statutory provision, there seems no doubt that section 2883 would be applicable to the present case and that under it the agreement here in question would be valid. Cox v. Hughes, 1909, 10 Cal.App. 553, 102 P. 956; Walker v. Rich, 1926, 79 Cal.App. 139, 144, 249 P. 56.

But in 1913 the legislature enacted a statute regulating assignments of wages, adding it to the Civil Code as section 955 (Stats. 1913, p. 537). In 1937 this statute was removed from the Civil Code and placed in the Labor Code (Stats.1937, p. 202), and at the same time was divided into five sections numbered from 300 to 304 inclusive. In 1941 these five sections were again combined into one, as section 300 of the Labor Code, and somewhat amended. Stats. 1941, p. 1851. Ever since its first enactment this statute has contained a provision, always the same in substance, upon which plaintiff relies to show the invalidity of the contractual provision here in question. Since such invalidity depends only upon the statute in force when the contract was made, in 1940, we quote the provision as it then stood, being section 303 of the Labor Code: "No assignment of or order for, wages or salary is valid, except for the necessities of life, unless at the time of the making thereof, such wages or salary have been earned. No assignment of, or order for, wages or salary made for the necessities of life, is valid except to the person furnishing such necessities directly, and then only for the amount needed to furnish such necessities." Defendant insists that the contract in question is not subject to this prohibition because it is not an assignment or order, but only "grants * * * a lien."

[1, 2] But this is a remedial statute, and as such it must be liberally construed. Reynolds v. Reynolds, 1936, 14 Cal.App.2d 481, 484, 58 P.2d 660; Berg v. Standard Light Co. of California, 1928, 89 Cal.App. 542, 545, 265 P. 369; In re Makings, 1927, 200 Cal. 474, 478, 253 P. 918. As stated in Reynolds v. Reynolds, supra, referring to the first statute on this subject, Civil Code, section 955, "The interpretation of the section under discussion does not so much depend upon the technical definition of the terms as upon the sense in which they were used by the legislature." In re Makings, supra, quoted with approval the following passage from 23 Cal.Jur. 801: "[A] remedial statute must be liberally construed, so as to effectuate its object and purpose. Although due regard will be given the language used, such an act will be construed, when its meaning is doubtful, so as to suppress the mischief at which it is directed, and to advance or extend the remedy provided, and bring within the scope of the law every case which comes clearly within its spirit and policy." The companion sections of the Labor Code, all of which were originally adopted as parts of a single statute in section 955 of the Civil Code and are now in section 300 of the Labor Code, provide that no assignment of wages or salary is valid unless it is in writing and has the consent of the assignor's spouse, if the assignor is married, or of his parent or guardian if he is a minor, and that any power of attorney to collect wages or salary is revocable at any time. Taking the statute as a whole, it manifests a legislative intent to protect wage earners and salaried workers against the possibility that, either from improvidence or under the stress of immediate necessity, they may go too far in sacrificing the future to the needs or desires of the present and leave themselves and their families without future means of support. Evidently the legislature had information, which is confirmed by such matters as come within judicial notice, that the evil thus to be guarded against was sufficiently prevalent to call for legislative action, and the remedy ought not to be defeated by judicial construction if that result can reasonably be avoided.

[3] While it is doubtless true that, in strict legal parlance, the mere imposing of a lien on wages to be earned in the future is not an assignment of them (6 C.J.S., Assignments, § 1, p. 1045; In re Estate of Beffa, 1921, 54 Cal.App. 186, 189, 201 P. 616), we see little difference in the incidence of the two on the future condition of the worker and his family. Defendant argues at great length that there is such a difference because the creditor who holds an assignment may collect the assignor's wages as soon as they become due, whereas one holding only a lien must resort to proceedings in court to enforce it. But defendant also suggests that while these proceedings were going on an injunction could and would be had to prevent payment of the wages to the debtor who created the lien, and obviously without such a remedy the lien might prove futile. Such legal proceedings, if the lien is valid, would at once stop payment to the worker, would eventually result in application of his wages to the debt, just as in case of an assignment, and would also impose on the worker costs and expenses of suit, which would not follow an assignment, thus leaving him and his family ultimately in worse condition than if he had made an assignment.

[4, 5] It seems to be defendant's idea that, because the lien he claims is of the class commonly called equitable liens, and could be enforced only in a court of equity —which would take cognizance of it only because of the lack of any other remedy— therefore some sort of equitable adjustment or compromise could and would be made in the enforcement of the lien whereby the wage earner would be allowed to keep and use for the support of himself and his family so much of his future earnings, when they become due, as might be necessary for that purpose, or at least that he would be allowed something toward that end, and the surplus only would be applied to the debt. No authority is cited in support of this theory and we have found none. The lien granted by the plaintiff, if valid, covers the whole of his future earnings, not merely a part thereof. We know of no rule of equity by which a court of equity, when called on to enforce a valid contract creating a lien on definite property, can except some part of that property from its decree of enforcement out of sympathy for the lienor or regard for the financial condition to which he might otherwise be reduced. On the contrary, the rule, as stated in 30 C.J.S., Equity, § 62, p. 411, is: "Where a contract has been voluntarily, understandingly, and fairly entered into, and is free from fraud, accident, mistake, or any other circumstance recognized as a ground for equitable relief, a court of equity must, when its jurisdiction is properly invoked, give full force and effect to such contract; it cannot ignore, disturb, or alter the rights created by it, or grant relief against their enforcement. * * * The mere fact that for one of the parties the contract was unwise or improvident, or that its enforcement is harsh when it was so intended to be, does not alter the rule * * *." A like statement of the rule is made in 10 Cal.Jur. 474, 475. See, also, Boyce v. Fisk, 1895, 110 Cal. 107, 112, 42 P. 473. "While a court of equity may exercise broad powers in applying equitable remedies, it may not create new substantive rights under the guise of doing equity." Rosenberg v. Lawrence, 1938, 10 Cal.2d 590, 594, 595, 75 P.2d 1082. The contract held by the defendant here is, therefore, as fully within the mischief at which the statute is aimed as is an assignment or any other form of agreement which deprives a wage earner of the use of his future wages.

[6, 7] The statute can be applied to it without greater liberality of construction than is permissible here, and we so apply it. By using the terms "assignment" and "order" the legislature obviously sought to reach every form of instrument which would result in the impounding of a wage earner's wages before he received them. While the agreement is not technically an assignment, it does, if valid, pass to defendant an interest in plaintiff's future wages which defendant did not have before and in a sense may be regarded as having transferred or "assigned" that interest to him. The term "order" has no fixed legal meaning; and since the agreement will result in an order of court for the payment of the wages to defendant to the extent of his lien, it may be regarded as an order, for the purposes of this statute.

Judicial precedent for such a construction of the statute appears in Nutt v. Knut, 1906, 200 U.S. 12, 26 S.Ct. 216, 50 L.Ed. 348. That case arose under section 3477 of the U. S. Revised Statutes, 31 U.S.C.A. § 203, which provided that: "All transfers and assignments made of any claim upon the United States, or of any part or share thereof, or interest therein, whether absolute or conditional, and whatever may be the consideration therefor, and all powers of attorney, orders, or other authorities for receiving payment of any such claim, or of any part or share, thereof, shall be absolutely null and void, unless they are freely made * * * after the allowance of such a claim." The defendant there had a claim against the United States and engaged the plaintiff to assist in its prosecution, by a contract which made the payment of plaintiff's compensation therefor "a lien upon the claim." This part of the contract was held void, the court saying, at 200 U.S. 20, 26 S.Ct. 219, 50 L.Ed. 348: "In giving that lien from the outset, before the allowance of the claim, and before any services had been rendered by the attorney, the contract, in effect, gave him an interest or share in the claim itself * * *. In effect or by its operation it transferred or assigned to the attorney, in advance of the allowance of the claim, such an interest as would secure the payment of the fee stipulated to be paid. All this was contrary to the statute; for its obvious purpose, in part, was to forbid anyone who was a stranger to the original transaction to come between the claimant and the government, prior to the allowance of a claim * * *." This case was followed and approved in Calhoun v. Massie, 1920, 253 U.S. 170, 175, 40 S.Ct. 474, 64 L.Ed. 843, 846, and King v. Pons, 1919, 77 Fla. 383, 81 So. 519; and the same result was reached on a construction of the same statute in the earlier case of Manning v. Leighton, 1892, 65 Vt. 84, 26 A. 258, 260, 24 L.R.A. 684, 690. In Trottier v. Foley, 1920, 42 R.I. 422, 108 A. 498, it was held that a workman's agreement acknowledging receipt of a loan from his employer, "against which I pledge my wages until paid back," was an assignment of future wages within the terms of a statute making such assignments invalid against attacking creditors unless recorded and defining "assignment" to include "every instrument purporting to transfer an interest in or an authority to collect the future earnings of any person." The latter part of this definition is similar to the word "order" used in our statute.

PEOPLE v. RUSSELL.

Cr. 3692.

District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California.

July 12, 1943.

Hearing Denied Aug. 9, 1943.

1. Criminal law 🔑814(8)

In prosecution for assault with a deadly weapon, where the evidence established that defendant struck but one blow and ran away, refusal to instruct that a person in exercise of his right of self-defense not only had the right to stand his ground and defend himself when attacked, but that he might pursue his adversary until he had secured himself from danger, was not error.

2. Assault and battery 🔑96(3)

In prosecution for assault with a deadly weapon, court properly instructed on "self-defense" that a person assailed has the right to repel force with force and employ the right to defend himself from apprehended danger to any extent which to him was apparently necessary when he acts in a reasonable manner.

See Words and Phrases, Permanent Edition, for all other definitions of "Self-Defense".

3. Assault and battery 🔑96(3)

In prosecution for assault with a deadly weapon, jury was properly instructed that fact that complainant was not armed with any weapon at time of combat did not deprive defendant of his right to defend himself with that degree of force which to a reasonable man might have appeared necessary under the circumstances there present.

4. Criminal law 🔑1186(4)

In prosecution for assault with a deadly weapon, an instruction on self-defense was not prejudicially erroneous on ground that it applied to murder, manslaughter, and assault with intent to commit murder, which crimes were not involved, where jury could not believe from the evidence that the assault by defendant with a fingernail file was an attempt at murder. Const. art. 6, § 4½.

5. Criminal law 🔑1186(4)

The giving of instructions correct in the abstract but inapplicable to the issues raised by the pleadings or the evidence will not constitute a ground for reversal where no prejudice results. Const. art. 6, § 4½.

6. Criminal law 🔑1163(4)

The court cannot presume error from the mere giving of an instruction correct in the abstract but inapplicable to the evidence, and burden is upon appellant to show prejudice.

7. Criminal law 🔑1186(4)

The assumption is that an instruction having no application to the case as made by the pleadings and proof does not injure a defendant. Const. art. 6, § 4½.

8. Assault and battery 🔑91

Evidence supported finding that defendant did not act in self-defense in making an assault upon another with a fingernail file.

9. Assault and battery 🔑56

In determining whether an instrument not inherently "deadly" or dangerous assumes these characteristics, recourse may be had to the nature of the weapon, the manner of its use, the location on the body of the injuries inflicted, and the extent of such injuries.

See Words and Phrases, Permanent Edition, for all other definitions of "Deadly Weapon".

10. Assault and battery 🔑95

The question whether instrument used in making an assault upon a person on a particular occasion was a deadly weapon is a mixed question of law and fact for determination by the jury.

11. Assault and battery ⚷91, 95

Whether a fingernail file with which defendant assaulted another, resulting in a cheek wound requiring 11 stitches, was a "deadly weapon" was for the jury, and its finding as to its deadly character was justified.

Robert W. Kenny, Atty. Gen., and Alberta Belford, Deputy Atty. Gen., for respondent.

WHITE, Justice.

In an information filed by the District Attorney of Los Angeles County, defendant was accused of the crime of assault with a deadly weapon. A jury found him guilty and this is an appeal by him from the judgment.

Defendant had been working as a "burner" at the California Shipbuilding Corporation in Los Angeles County and the complaining witness, Arthur Warner, was his foreman. On the morning of November 4, 1942, defendant and complainant became embroiled in a heated argument as to whether defendant would perform a certain type of work assigned to him by his foreman. When the defendant refused to perform the work assignment given him by the complaining witness he threatened to discharge the defendant, whereupon the latter applied a vile epithet to the foreman and demanded his wages. The two then went together to the company office to get defendant's pay for him. They both entered the office and defendant testified that the foreman cursed him and ordered him to leave the office. In any event, defendant made his exit and stood just outside the office door from which location, according to the complainant, the defendant continued to address vile and opprobrious names to the complaining witness. The latter testified that just as he stepped out of the office the defendant was standing in a "hunched position" and suddenly "turned and jumped and hit me". The complainant further testified that he struck the defendant "after he struck me, or at the same time he moved toward me, at the same time". As a result of this encounter the complaining witness received a jagged wound in his cheek, requiring eleven stitches, and which was admittedly inflicted by the defendant with the aid of a small, 2½ inch finger nail file which folded up like a jackknife. Another witness testified that he heard the defendant inviting the complainant to come out of the office, at the same time using foul and vile language and threatening "I will show you something, or I will beat you up, or words to that effect". Still another eye witness to the fracas testified: "Warner just stepped down off one step to the right and I saw Russell ahead of him, facing him, make one swing at him".

The defendant set up the plea of self-defense and after testifying to the disagreement between himself and the complainant with reference to the type of work defendant was asked to do, he testified that the complainant discharged him and told him to go to the office to get the wages due him; that they both entered the office, whereupon the complainant cursed the defendant and ordered him to get out of the office; that he complied with that request and stood "right outside the door"; that he was in a weakened physical condition, having received some 59 blood transfusions. That the complaining witness ran out of the office and struck him between the eyes. Defendant further stated that he fell upon the "burning table"; that he was excited and scared; that the complainant grabbed hold of him and again struck him. Defendant testified that he had the finger nail file in his hand during the melee and with it inflicted the injuries which gave rise to this prosecution.

[1-3] It is first contended by appellant that the court erred in refusing to give the following instruction: "The Court instructs the Jury that a person in the exercise of his right of self defense not only has a right to stand his ground and defend himself when attacked, but he may pursue his adversary until he has secured himself from danger". In refusing to give this instruction, the court did not err. Defendant himself testified: "I hit him and just ran, tried to get away from him". All of the testimony is in harmony with the conclusion that the defendant struck but one blow and ran away. There is not an iota of evidence that he attempted to or did "stand his ground" or "pursue his adversary". The court fully and fairly instructed the jury on the law of self defense; that a person assailed has the right to repel force with force; that he may employ the right to defend himself from apprehended danger to any extent which to him is apparently necessary, when he acts in a reasonable manner. The jury was also admonished that though they found it to be a fact that the complainant was not armed with any weapon at the time of the combat, nevertheless, that did not deprive the defendant of his right to defend himself with that degree of force which to a reasonable man might have appeared necessary under the appearances and circumstances there present.

It is next urged that the court erred in giving the following instruction: "To justify a homicide committed by one in resisting or repelling an assault or battery committed or attempted to be committed upon his person by another, it must appear to the slayer as a reasonable man that the danger threatened, if any, was immediate and sufficient to excite the fears of a reasonable person that he was in danger of receiving death or great bodily harm, and that he acted under the influence of such fears and not in a spirit of revenge; and it must further appear that the degree of resistance was not clearly disproportionate to the nature of the injury offered or given—that the force used in repelling or resisting the assault or battery was not clearly greater than was apparently necessary".

[4-7] Appellant contends that the instruction, while being a correct statement of law in homicide cases, had no application to the case at bar wherein the defendant was not accused of murder, manslaughter or assault with intent to commit murder, and that the giving of such an instruction was prejudicial in that by it the court led the jury to believe that the defendant intended to murder the prosecuting witness. This claim is without merit. It would do violence to reason and challenge credulity to assume that the jury was at all impressed that in an assault committed with a finger nail file in the manner and under the circumstances which characterized this controversy that the defendant contemplated or attempted to slay his adversary. Over a long period of time it has been the established rule in this state that the giving of instructions, correct in the abstract, but inapplicable to the issues raised by the pleadings or the evidence in the instant case, will not constitute a ground for reversal where no prejudice results to the defendant. People v. Boggs, 12 Cal.2d 27, 37, 82 P.2d 368; People v. Soules, 41 Cal.App.2d 298, 313, 106 P.2d 639; People v. Hopper, 20 Cal. App.2d 108, 111, 66 P.2d 459; see, also, Section 4½, Article VI, Constitution of California. We can not presume error from the mere giving of such an instruction and the burden is upon the appellant to show prejudice, if any. The assumption, if not the presumption, is that an instruction having no application to the case as made by the pleadings and proof does not injure a defendant.

[8-11] Finally appellant asserts with great earnestness that the evidence is insufficient to support the judgment of conviction and that the verdict is against both the law and evidence. The gist of this argument rests upon the claim that the finger nail file utilized by the defendant in making the assault was not as a matter of law a deadly weapon; and in any event the same was lawfully used by the defendant while acting in necessary defense of his person from an unwarranted attack made upon him by the complaining witness. Upon the last mentioned issue of self defense the jury found against the defendant, and as such finding is supported by substantial evidence, we are not empowered to disturb it. That the weapon used in the case at bar may be said not to be inherently a dangerous or deadly one may be conceded, but nevertheless, it may become such a dangerous and deadly weapon if used in such a manner as to produce great bodily injury. It has long been the established rule that in determining whether an instrument, not inherently deadly or dangerous, assumes these characteristics, recourse may be had to the nature of the weapon, the manner of its use, the location on the body of the injuries inflicted and the extent of such injuries. When the question arises whether the instrument used was one such as would be likely to produce great bodily harm dependent upon the manner of its use, the portion of the body upon which it was used and the extent of the injuries inflicted, there is presented a mixed question of law and fact as to whether upon the particular occasion it was a deadly weapon. That question must be determined by the jury under appropriate instructions from the court. Therefore, the determination as to whether under all the facts and circumstances present in the instant case, the instrument used was a deadly weapon, was for the jury. People v. Cook, 15 Cal.2d 507, 516, 517, 102 P.2d 752. We are persuaded that under the evidence before them the jury herein was entitled to find as they did that the character of the finger nail file as a deadly weapon, upon the occasion here in question, was established.

No prejudicial error appearing in the record herein, it is ordered that the judgment be affirmed.

Appeal from Superior Court, Sutter County; Arthur Coats, Judge.

Action by Lachman Singh, also known as Lasho Singh, also known as Lasha Singh, and Don Singh, against James Furuta, Frank Poole, and another for personal injuries sustained in automobile collision. From a judgment against the defendant Furuta alone, the plaintiffs appeal.

Judgment affirmed.

Manwell & Manwell, of Marysville, for appellants.

Hewitt & McBride, of Yuba City, for respondents.

ADAMS, Presiding Justice.

Plaintiffs sued defendants Furuta and Poole for damages for personal injuries sustained by plaintiffs when the automobile in which they were riding collided with an automobile owned and driven by defendant Furuta, it being alleged that the said accident was due to the negligence of Furuta, and that, at the time of the accident, Furuta was "the duly authorized agent and employee" of defendant Poole and was "acting within the scope of his employment."

The action was tried by the court sitting without a jury, and at the conclusion of the trial findings were made in favor of plaintiffs as to all of the allegations of their complaint except that it was found "that at the time of said accident said defendant, James Furuta, was not acting as the agent of said Frank Poole nor was he acting within the scope of his employment by said Frank Poole."

[1, 2] Judgment was entered awarding damages to plaintiffs against Furuta alone, and plaintiffs have appealed, contending that the trial court erred in failing to hold defendant Poole also liable for the damages awarded. It is stated by appellants in their closing brief that as to the law, counsel for the respective parties are "more or less" agreed, and that the sole question is whether the facts justified the judgment of the court. It seems to be conceded that unless the evidence establishes that at the time of the accident Furuta was engaged in the business of his employer and in carrying out the orders of such employer, defendant

Poole incurred no liability. The question then seems to resolve itself into one of fact; and it is not within the province of this court to weigh such evidence, but merely to determine whether there is any substantial evidence to sustain the contested finding of the trial court, considering the evidence in the light most favorable to respondent and disregarding conflicts therein. We shall so consider the evidence produced in this case.

Defendant Poole owned and operated two peach orchards, one known as the "Home Ranch" and the other as the "Penny Ranch." Furuta was employed by Poole as a laborer. He lived at a home of his own, and drove to his work each day in his own automobile. He worked sometimes on the Home Ranch and sometimes on the Penny Ranch, as directed by his employer. On the day preceding the accident (a Saturday) he was engaged in thinning peaches on the Penny Ranch, and at the end of that day, according to his own testimony, was told by Poole that if it was a quiet day next day he would spray at the Home Ranch. On said following morning he left his home before six o'clock, on his way to the Home Ranch. Instead of going directly to the Home Ranch he went first to the Penny Ranch, and was proceeding thence to the Home Ranch when the accident occurred. He stated that the only reason he went to the Penny Ranch was because he thought he would go around that way to see what Dan (another of Poole's employees) thought about it being a clear day; and that he was going to the Home Ranch anyway; that he was due to report at the Home Ranch at 6:30; that he did not work at the Penny Ranch that morning, as he had seen that it was a quiet day and had decided to spray at the Home Ranch. He also testified that when traveling to and from work Poole's employees used their own cars, and when traveling between ranches, or on Poole's time, they used Poole's trucks for transportation; that he always had reported at the Home Ranch before going to work, and that he checked in there on the morning of the accident at seven o'clock. Defendant Poole testified that his records showed that Furuta reported at the Home Ranch on that day at seven o'clock; that his pay did not commence on any day until he started to work after so reporting; that all employees were required to report at the Home Ranch before going to work, and that if Furuta was to work at the Penny Ranch he was supposed to come first to the Home Ranch and obtain a truck to transport him to the Penny Ranch; that when traveling between the ranches employees used vehicles furnished by him. He did not recall telling Furuta the night before the accident that if it was quiet to spray on the Home Ranch, otherwise to thin on the Penny Ranch; but he stated that if Furuta was to work on the Penny Ranch he was supposed to come to the Home Ranch and get a truck to go over there, and that it was never the habit of employees to use their own cars to go back and forth between the ranches; that anyone going to work got his orders at the Home Ranch and then went to work; that the accident occurred on a Sunday morning, and that Furuta was not supposed to work on that day unless the wind did not blow, in which event he was to come to the Home Ranch. There was no contradiction of the testimony that Poole's employees were supposed to use his trucks when going to and from the two ranches during working hours and were supposed to report for work at the Home Ranch. Poole did not furnish gas for Furuta's car nor compensate him for its use, and Furuta's pay did not commence until he started work on the ranch, which was usually at 6:30 A.M.

[3] Appellant contends that the evidence shows that Furuta was acting on orders when he went first to the Penny Ranch; and that he went there to thin peaches and decided, after arriving there, to go to the Home Ranch instead; but the weight and sufficiency of the evidence, the construction to be put upon same and the inferences to be drawn therefrom were matters for the trial court, and that court found contrary to the construction of the evidence contended for by appellant. Since there is evidence to support the finding of the court it is conclusive here.

[4] Assuming then, as we must, that at the time of the accident Furuta was on his way to the Home Ranch to report for work, and that the trip to the Penny Ranch was not on the business of his employer nor pursuant to any instruction given by him, it is apparent that at the time of the accident, though he was going from the Penny Ranch to the Home Ranch, Furuta was in fact merely going to work and was not acting within the scope of his employment, which employment did not begin until he reported for work at the Home Ranch. In going from his home to his work he was performing no service for his employer, and the latter incurred no liability. See Nussbaum v. Traung Label, etc., Co., 46 Cal.App. 561, 571, 189 P. 728; Adams v. Tuxedo Land Co., 92 Cal.App. 266, 267 P. 926; Mauchle v. 2. Appeal and error 🔑907(3)

On appeal on judgment roll alone, findings should receive a liberal construction to uphold, rather than defeat, judgment.

3. Injunction 🔑126

In determining whether labor union was entitled to injunction to restrain employer from employing workmen other than union members as required by collective labor agreement, in absence of evidence court would assume that union's agents were not guilty of instigating sabotage as claimed by employer. St.1941, p. 2959.

4. Appeal and error 🔑907(2)

In absence of evidence, appellate court would assume that finding was supported by evidence.

5. Appeal and error 🔑909(1)

The findings that employer was justified in discharging employees, and that employees were not discharged or laid off because of sabotage, were not necessarily conflicting, but, in support of injunction restraining employer from violating collective labor agreement, appellate court might assume that employees were discharged because of lack of business or because they were unable to perform their duties. St. 1941, p. 2959.

Injunctive relief will be granted to prevent employer from violating collective labor contract whereby employer agrees to hire only union members so long as they are competent and available, when there is no intent to thereby injure members of other unions or to contravene public interests. St.1941, p. 2959.

7. Trade unions 🔑8

The suspension of charter of local union by national union did not constitute a "failure of consideration" for collective labor agreement executed prior to suspension whereby employer agreed to employ only union members, where parties did not contemplate affiliation with national union and local union was distinct from national union, and after suspension was engaged in business independently. 9. Appeal and error 🔑799

Where collective labor agreement provided that it was extended to May 15, 1944, in absence of notice for modification or termination served at least 30 days prior to May 15, 1943, and there was no evidence that such notice was given, it would be assumed that no such notice was given, and hence issues did not become "moot" so as to justify refusal of enforcement of injunctive relief because case was decided after May 15, 1943.

See Words and Phrases, Permanent Edition, for all other definitions of "Moot Issue".

Appeal from Superior Court, Sacramento County; P. J. Shields, Judge.

Action by John Montaldo and another against the Hires Bottling Company to enjoin defendant from violating provisions of a collective labor agreement. From an adverse judgment, defendant appeals.

Affirmed.

J. M. Inman, of Sacramento, E. R. Vaughan, of Los Angeles, and Downey, Brand & Seymour and Frederic R. Pierce, all of Sacramento, for appellant.

W. H. Metson, P. H. McCarthy, Jr. and F. Nason O'Hara, all of San Francisco, for respondents.

THOMPSON, Justice.

The defendant, Hires Bottling Company, has appealed from a judgment enjoining it from violating the provisions of a collective labor agreement which it entered into with Bottlers Local Union No. 293 of the International Union of United Brewery, Flour, Cereal and Soft Drink Workers of America, Branch No. 2, regulating the employment, wages, hours and services of workmen hired by the bottling corporation. The decree enjoins the defendant from employing workmen except through the agency of Bottlers Local Union No. 293, who are members of that union in good standing. The judgment also contains a mandatory injunction requiring the defendant to discharge all employees who were not hired through the agency of that union, and those who are not members thereof in good standing.

It is asserted the motion for new trial was erroneously denied. The appeal is presented on the judgment roll only. The evidence is not before this court, with the exception of the affidavits which were presented on the motion for new trial.

The appellant contends the collective labor agreement may not be enforced on account of a failure of consideration; that the contract is void because it was breached by the conduct of the business agent of the union in inciting defendant's employees to acts of disloyalty and sabotage; that the court erred in failing to adopt findings on a material issue, and that the contract terminated before the judgment was rendered.

Bottlers Local Union No. 293 of the International Union of United Brewery, Flour, Cereal and Soft Drink Workers of America, Branch No. 2, is an unincorporated union labor organization which was affiliated with the American Federation of Labor until October 6, 1941, when its charter was suspended. John Montaldo was the business agent of Local Union No. 293. The defendant is a corporation which is engaged in the business of bottling and marketing soft drinks. September 10, 1940, the defendant executed a written collective bargaining labor contract with the local Bottlers Union by the terms of which the defendant agreed to employ through the agency of that labor union only workmen who are members thereof in good standing. The defendant also agreed to pay specified wages and to abide by prescribed rules with respect to hours of service and employment. Among the stipulations contained in the contract it was provided that "No members shall be discriminated against or discharged for upholding Union principles." It was also provided that the agreement should remain in force until May 15, 1943, and to May 15, 1944, unless a notice of termination or modification thereof was served thirty days before the first-mentioned date.

The complaint for injunction is couched in four counts. It alleges that the defendant wrongfully discharged union labor workmen on or about April 4, 1941, contrary to the terms of the written agreement, for the reason that they were advocating and upholding union labor principles, and that the defendant hired other workmen who were not members in good standing of the Local Union No. 293. The answer admits the execution of the contract but denies the remaining material allegations of the complaint. The court adopted findings determining the validity of the contract; that the defendant did lay off and discharge employees hired through the agency of said Local Union, who were members of that organization in good standing, and employed other workmen who were not hired through the agency of the union; "that the discharge of the said employees of defendant was justified," but that it is not true the members of the union committed sabotage or "befouled said product with foreign * * * substance" or "slowed down production" as charged in the answer. As conclusions of law the court found that the defendant breached the terms of the collective labor agreement. Judgment was accordingly rendered directing the issuance of an injunction as previously stated. From that decree this appeal was perfected on the judgment roll alone.

[1, 2] Since the appeal is presented on the judgment roll only, and the evidence is not before this court, we are confined to a determination of the questions as to whether the complaint states a cause of action; whether the findings are within the issues; whether the judgment is supported by the findings and whether reversible error appears upon the face of the record. Carpenter v. Pacific Mutual Life Insurance Co., 13 Cal.2d 306, 316, 89 P.2d 637; Merron v. Title Guarantee & Trust Co., 45 Cal.App.2d 60, 113 P.2d 481; Lincoln v. Averill, 47 Cal.App. 2d 335, 338, 117 P.2d 913. The findings should receive a liberal construction to uphold rather than to defeat the judgment. Goldberg v. List, 11 Cal.2d 389, 394, 79 P.2d 1087, 116 A.L.R. 900.

[3, 4] We are of the opinion the complaint states a cause of action authorizing the issuance of an injunction as prayed for, that the findings support the judgment, that the findings adequately determine all of the essential issues of the pleadings, and that reversible error does not appear on the face of the record. The answer does allege that defendant's employees were discharged, or laid off, on account of their acts of sabotage consisting of retarding or slowing down production and befouling and damaging products by injecting therein foreign and noxious substances rendering them "unfit for human consumption." It will be observed the answer does not charge the Labor Union, or its agents, with instigating or encouraging such wrongful acts of sabotage or with polluting the products. If the agents of the union, acting within the scope of their authority, were guilty of such conduct it might constitute a breach of the contract which would justify rescission of the agreement. 63 C.J. 675, sec. 30; 31 Am.Jur. 976, sec. 288. The agents were not charged with that conduct, and, in the absence of the evidence, we must assume they were not guilty of instigating sabotage. If the employees were guilty of such conduct, we may assume it would justify their discharge on that account. But the court specifically found that "members of plaintiff union while in the employ of defendant" did not perform those acts of sabotage or pollution of the products. We must also assume that finding is supported by the evidence. It is true that the court further found "that the discharge of the said employees of defendant was justified." The court does not direct the defendant to reinstate them. On the contrary, the court specifically enjoins the plaintiffs from attempting to procure the reinstatement of those discharged workmen. The court, however, does find that the defendant employed workmen who were not hired through the agency of the Labor Union, and who are not members in good standing of that organization. The court then directed the defendant to discharge all such last-mentioned employees and to refrain from hiring other workmen contrary to the provisions of the collective labor agreement.

[5] The findings that the defendant was justified in discharging employees, and on the other hand that they were not discharged or laid off on account of their acts of sabotage or pollution of the products are not necessarily conflicting. In support of the judgment we may assume they were discharged on account of a lack of business or because they were physically or otherwise unable to perform their duties, and not because they were guilty of sabotage.

[6] The trend of modern authorities authorizes the enforcement of injunctive relief to prevent an employer from violating the terms of a collective bargaining labor contract executed with a duly authorized labor union, in which instrument the employer agrees to hire workmen only through the agency of the labor union from its members who are in good standing, so long as they are competent and available, when there is no intent to thereby injure the members of other unions or to contravene public interests. Sec. 1126, Labor Code, enacted in 1941, St.1941, p. 2959; Ribner v. Racso Butter & Egg Co., 135 Misc. 616, 238 N.Y.S. 132; Goldman v. Cohen, 222 App.Div. 631, 227 N.Y.S. 311; Engelking v. Independent Wet Wash Co., 142 Misc. 510, 254 N.Y.S. 87; Roosevelt Amusement Corp. v. Empire State Motion Pictures Operators Union, 144 Misc. 644, 258 N.Y.S. 240; Leveranz v. Cleveland Home Brewing Co., 24 Ohio N.P.,N.S., 193; 95 A.L.R. 49, note; 31 Am.Jur. 879, sec. 118. Section 1126 of the Labor Code reads: "Any collective bargaining agreement between an employer and a labor organization shall be enforceable at law or in equity, and a breach of such collective bargaining agreement by any party thereto shall be subject to the same remedies, including injunctive relief, as are available on other contracts in the courts of this State."

[7] The appellant challenges the validity of the collective labor agreement in this case on account of an alleged lack of consideration and for want of mutuality, chiefly because the charter by means of which the respondent union was affiliated with the American Federation of Labor was suspended October 6, 1941, after the execution of the contract in question. It is asserted that the principal consideration which passes to an employer from the labor union in a collective bargaining agreement is the promise of industrial peace and freedom from labor disturbances so as to increase the employer's prospect of conducting a successful business. It is contended that the suspension of the charter of the respondent union created a failure of consideration by depriving it of the ability to render the services necessary to a fulfillment of the contract. We must concede that an important consideration for collective bargaining with a labor union with respect to workmen, wages, hours and employment, is to secure freedom from labor disturbances. If the defendant contracted with Bottlers Local Union No. 293, with the mutual understanding that it was to thereby secure the cooperation of the American Federation of Labor, and the charter of the Local Union was thereafter suspended without fault on the part of the defendant, then that change of relationship might constitute a partial failure of consideration, provided it was shown to have been detrimental to the defendant.

No adequate showing of such failure of consideration appears in the present case. The collective labor agreement was not made with the American Federation of Labor. That organization is not mentioned in the contract. It does not appear from the agreement that the contracting parties contemplated the affiliation of the Local Union with the American Federation of Labor. That contract appears to have been confined solely to a relationship between the defendant and Bottlers Local Union No. 293 of the International Union of United Brewery, Flour, Cereal and Soft Drink Workers of America, Branch No. 2. When a contract is reduced to writing the intention of the parties is generally ascertained from the writing alone. Sec. 1639, Civil Code. In the absence of fraud, the written contract supersedes all previous negotiations between the parties. Sec. 1625, Civil Code. Fraud on the part of the Local Union was neither alleged nor proved in this case. The respondent Local Union was and is an unincorporated labor union separate and distinct from the American Federation of Labor. The Local Union is still engaged in business independently of the American Federation of Labor. In its separate identity it had the authority to contract with the defendant upon the subject of union labor workmen's wages, hours and services to be performed according to the terms of the agreement. We are therefore of the opinion the suspension of the charter of the Local Union by the American Federation of Labor did not constitute a failure of consideration under the circumstances of this case.

[8] In the absence of particular detrimental acts, conduct or circumstances in violation of the terms of a collective labor agreement, it has been frequently held that contracts similar to the one which is involved in this case are valid as against ordinary claims of lack of consideration or want of mutuality. Gates v. Arizona Brewing Co., 54 Ariz. 266, 95 P.2d 49; Rentschler v. Missouri Pac. R. R. Co., 126 Neb. 493, 253 N.W. 694, 95 A.L.R. 1; 31 Am.Jur. 875, sec. 104; Weber v. Nasser, Cal.App., 286 P. 1074; 95 A.L.R. 21, note.

It is true that the hearing before the Supreme Court, after decision by the District Court of Appeal, in the Weber case, supra, was dismissed on the ground that the issues became moot because the contract which was there involved expired before the Supreme Court was able to pass upon the hearing. Weber v. Nasser, 210 Cal. 607, 292 P. 637. We cite the opinion which was rendered in that case as it appears in the Pacific Reporter because it contains an excellent review by the late Presiding Justice Tyler of the cases showing the change which has taken place, as indicated by modern decisions, with respect to the application of injunctive relief to enforce the provisions of collective labor agreements between an employer and a union labor organization regarding the wages, hours and services of workmen. That opinion also considers the subjects of consideration and mutuality of the contracting parties, which issues are involved in this case. While it is true the Supreme Court neither approved nor disapproved the conclusions in that opinion, it is worthy of consideration. An excellent and exhaustive brief on nearly every issue which is presented on this appeal may be found in 95 A.L.R., page 10 to 56 thereof.

[9] We are of the opinion there is no substantial merit in appellant's contention that because the issues "will become moot before this case can be decided," since the written agreement provides that it may be terminated by the serving of a thirty day notice therefor prior to May 15, 1943, equity should not intervene. In support of that assertion the appellant cited the Weber case, supra. In that case the contract terminated on August 31, 1930. The hearing before the Supreme Court was submitted July 3, 1930. The Supreme Court was unable to reach that case for determination until October 30, 1930. In the meantime the contract expired. The court properly said that "any order we might make would be futile." That appeal was therefore dismissed on the ground that the issues had become moot.

The present case presents quite a different situation. The contract in the present case has not yet expired. Apparently it will not expire until May 15, 1944. Section 13 of the agreement provides that "It is hereby expressly agreed upon and understood that this agreement shall be, and it is hereby renewed and extended in full force and effect to the fifteenth (15th) day of May 1944," in the absence of a notice for modification or termination thereof, served at least thirty days prior to May 15, 1943. There is no evidence that such notice was given. It is not contended that notice was served. We must assume no such notice was given. The contract is therefore in full force and effect.

Under circumstances similar to those which exist in this case, it has been held that a collective labor agreement will be deemed to have been automatically renewed and extended to a specified date as provided by the contract, upon failure to give a specifically required notice of termination. Under such circumstances some affirmative showing is necessary on the part of the employer to terminate the contract. Leveranz v. Cleveland Home Brewing Co., supra; 95 A.L.R. 54, note; 31 Am.Jur. 875, sec. 103.

We therefore conclude that the issues of this case have not become moot, and that there is no reason on that account why the injunction may not be lawfully enforced.

[10, 11] We may not hold that the trial court abused its discretion in denying defendant's motion for a new trial. That motion was made chiefly on the ground of newly discovered evidence. It was presented on affidavits and counter-affidavits of the respective parties. On the issue of alleged acts of sabotage and pollution of the products by the defendant's employees, and alleged encouragement or inducement for such conduct on the part of the Local Union or its agents, the averments are conflicting. Moreover, we are of the opinion the appellant's affidavit in that regard fails to show due diligence as an excuse for not presenting that evidence at the trial of the case. 20 Cal.Jur. 84, sec. 59.

There is merit in the contention that, under proper circumstances, there might have been a failure of consideration for the contract when the charter of the Local Union in affiliation with the American Federation of Labor was suspended October 6, 1941, after the trial of this case was concluded. However, we are of the opinion the trial court properly assumed that was not a proper issue at the trial or on motion for new trial, because, as we have previously said, affiliation with the American Federation of Labor was not contemplated by the parties under the terms of the collective labor agreement.

[12] It has been uniformly held that the granting or refusal of a new trial on the ground of newly discovered evidence is so far within the sound discretion of the trial judge that the order of the court will not be disturbed on appeal except for a manifest abuse of discretion. Berkowitz v. Kiener Company, 37 Cal.App.2d 419, 427, 99 P.2d 578; 2 Cal.Jur. 906, sec. 534; 20 Cal.Jur. 81, sec. 58.

The judgment is affirmed.

Appeal from Superior Court, Sacramento County; Raymond T. Coughlin, Judge.

George Paris was convicted of an offense, and he appeals.

Affirmed.

Alphonse Matthews, of Sacramento (O. F. Meldon, of Sacramento, of counsel), for appellant.

Robt. W. Kenny, Atty. Gen., and T. G. Negrich, Deputy Atty. Gen., for respondent.

ADAMS, Presiding Justice.

Appellant was charged with a violation of section 288 of the Penal Code, the charge being that on November 20, 1942, in Sacramento County, he did "willfully and unlawfully and feloniously place his hands upon and fondle the private parts of" a child of the age of seven years "with intent then and there of arousing, appealing to and gratifying the lust and passion and sexual desire of said George Paris," etc. He was found guilty as charged, and, his motion for a new trial having been denied, was sentenced to be imprisoned in the state prison for the term provided by law. On this appeal he contends that the verdict is entirely unsupported by the evidence in that the evidence shows that the crime committed was not that charged in the information but was in fact rape, that while rape is lewd and lascivious conduct it is not the kind of lewd and lascivious conduct charged, and that there was not only a failure of proof, but a fatal variance between the charge and the evidence.

A similar contention was made in People v. O'Donnell, 11 Cal.2d 666, 81 P.2d 939, where the defendant was charged with lewd and lascivious conduct under section 288 of the Penal Code, and, in a second count, with rape. On his conviction on both counts he was sentenced to San Quentin on the charge of violating section 288, but, because of a recommendation of the jury on the rape charge, was sentenced on that count to imprisonment in the county jail, the sentences to run concurrently. On appeal it was conceded that the evidence supported the conviction on the rape charge but it was contended that it was insufficient to support the other. There the victim of the offense was a child of the age of three years, and the proof that she had been raped and that defendant had committed the offense was physical evidence. The court said, page 669 of 11 Cal.2d, page 940 of 81 P.2d: "It is difficult to understand why the jury, having found defendant guilty of rape, could have made the recommendation it did. It is admitted that the evidence is sufficient to sustain that charge, but it is claimed there is no evidence tending to show that appellant violated section 288 of the Penal Code. In this connection it is claimed that the lewd and lascivious acts were part of and became merged in the rape charge, for which reason appellant could not be punished under the provisions of section 288 of the Penal Code. The fact that appellant was convicted upon the charge of rape does not necessarily prevent him from being punished under section 288 for any of the acts committed prior thereto. If any one of the antecedent acts of lewd and lascivious conduct was committed without the intent to commit rape, but simply to gratify appellant's lustful passion, and then later, emboldened by his success and further inflamed with passion, he conceived the further nefarious intent to penetrate the body of the child, the antecedent acts prior to the rape are punishable under the section involved." Citing People v. Parker, 74 Cal. App. 540, 241 P. 401; People v. Lind, 68 Cal.App. 575, 229 P. 990; People v. Bronson, 69 Cal.App. 83, 230 P. 213; People v. Agullana, 4 Cal.App.2d 34, 40 P.2d 848; People v. Meyer, 94 Cal.App. 696, 271 P. 751; People v. Piburn, 138 Cal.App. 56, 31 P.2d 470.

In the Parker case the court said that while under section 288 as it then read, defendant could not be punished for rape, it did not necessarily follow that he could not be punished under section 288 for the lewd and lascivious acts leading up to the rape.

In People v. Bronson, supra [69 Cal.App. 83, 230 P. 214], this court said that: "All that is required to complete the crime defined by section 288 of the Penal Code is that the acts committed on the body of a child under the age of 14 years are of lewd or lascivious character and that the intention of the party committing them was thus to excite or arouse the sexual passion or desires of such party or of the party upon whose body they are committed or of both."

[1] Appellant argues that because the testimony of the physician who examined the child showed the use of force in the commission of the crime, resulting in severe injury to the victim, defendant could not have been guilty of acting as charged in the information. As he expresses it in his brief: "From the injuries described by the Doctor one would be led to infer they resulted from the attack of a ferocious beast rather than from the fond and caressing touch of a kindly disposed spirit, regardless of what the purpose was." However, in the O'Donnell case above cited the circumstances were held sufficient to support a conviction under section 288 where the results were similar to those shown in this case and where there was no evidence as to the preceding acts of defendant. Here there is evidence that defendant took the child in his arms and carried her into the building and to the room therein where his purpose was accomplished, and there placed her upon the springs of a bed. As she then became unconscious she could give no testimony as to what subsequent acts defendant performed in the consummation of the crime; and while the evidence would have supported a charge of statutory rape, that fact does not absolve defendant from the crime charged, and he suffered no injury because the information did not so charge. While a crime may be committed under section 288 without its amounting to rape, it seems impossible that rape may be committed upon a child under the age of fourteen years without thereby violating the provisions of section 288.

[2, 3] Appellant also attacks the judgment on the ground of insufficiency of the evidence. An appellate court cannot disturb the findings of the triers of fact unless it be made clearly to appear that upon no hypothesis is there sufficient substantial evidence, circumstantial or otherwise, to support the conclusion reached in the lower court. People v. Stangler, 18 Cal.2d 688, 692, 117 P.2d 321. Here there is ample credible testimony to support the verdict of the jury.

The judgment and the order denying a new trial are affirmed.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Leslie E. Still, Judge.

Earl C. Wilson was convicted of escape, and he appeals.

Affirmed.

Earl C. Wilson, in pro. per., for appellant.

Robert W. Kenny, Atty. Gen., and Eugene M. Elson, Deputy Atty. Gen., for respondent.

YORK, Presiding Justice.

Appellant by information was charged with the crime of escape, in that on or about the 8th day of May, 1942, he "did willfully, unlawfully and feloniously escape from the Wayside Honor Farm", while confined therein as a prisoner having theretofore been convicted of a violation of section 503 of the Vehicle Code, St.1935, p. 174, a felony. Appellant entered his plea of not guilty to the charge, waived a jury trial and upon stipulation the testimony taken at the preliminary hearing was admitted in evidence on behalf of the People. No evidence was offered by appellant. Thereafter the court found appellant guilty of the offense, as charged in the information, and sentenced him to the State prison at San Quentin for the term prescribed by law.

Although represented by counsel at the trial, appellant prosecutes this appeal from the judgment in propria persona, and has filed a brief which fails to raise a question of law. Nevertheless, because of the peculiar circumstances surrounding the case, some discussion seems necessary in order to explain the conclusion reached by this court.

The record reveals that in March, 1942, appellant was convicted of a violation of section 503 of the Vehicle Code, a felony, but the trial court, instead of sentencing appellant to the State prison, imposed the alternative sentence of one year in the county jail, as permitted by the terms of section 503, supra. By such action, appellant's crime was thereby reduced or changed from a felony to a misdemeanor, pursuant to the terms of section 17 of the Penal Code, to-wit: "A felony is a crime which is punishable with death or by imprisonment in the state prison. Every other crime is a misdemeanor. When a crime, punishable by imprisonment in the state prison, is also punishable by fine or imprisonment in a county jail, in the discretion of the court, it shall be deemed a misdemeanor for all purposes after a judgment imposing a punishment other than imprisonment in the state prison." (Emphasis added.) Therefore, when appellant on May 8, 1942, made his escape from the Wayside Honor Farm, to which he had been transferred from the county jail, he was serving a sentence for a misdemeanor.

Prior to this, to-wit, on February 14, 1942, the case of In re Wilkins on behalf of Ramirez, 49 Cal.App.2d 709, 122 P.2d 361, in a well-reasoned opinion, held that section 4532 of the Penal Code relating to escapes had reference only to those persons convicted of felonies, and did not apply to a person theretofore convicted of a misdemeanor.

[1] Although he made his escape from the Wayside Honor Farm on May 8, 1942, the information based on section 4532, supra, charging appellant with the crime of escape was not filed until the following December (1942). Meanwhile, the Supreme Court on October 30, 1942, in the case of In re Halcomb, Cal.Sup., 130 P.2d 384, and companion cases, disapproved the holding in the Wilkins case and decided that section 4532, supra, applied to escapes by persons convicted of misdemeanors, as well as of felonies. See, also, People v. Smillie, 55 Cal.App.2d 381, 130 P.2d 714.

[2] Since this court is bound by the decision of the Supreme Court in the Halcomb case, we are under the necessity of affirming the judgment of the trial court.

For the reasons stated, the judgment is affirmed.

DORAN and WHITE, Justices (concurring).

We concur, but we do so with misgiving and only because this court, by tradition and practice, is expected to follow the decisions of the Supreme Court, which in the situation here presented are In re Haines, 195 Cal. 605, 234 P. 883, and In re Halcomb, Cal.Sup., 130 P.2d 384, 387. The action of the 1943 Legislature (Assembly Bill 479, Stats.1943, Chapter 635) in amending section 4532 of the Penal Code, so as to provide for a county jail sentence in the cases of misdemeanants who escape or attempt to escape from lawful custody, adds weight to the dissenting opinion of Mr. Justice Traynor in the Halcomb case, supra, wherein he said: “The courts cannot lift qualifying phrases from legislation without usurping legislative functions and the usurpation is particularly flagrant when the phrase has been added by amendment”. In view of the aforesaid legislative action, particular pertinency attaches to what Mr. Justice Traynor further said in his dissent when he declared: “There is always the possibility that the Legislature intended a provision to be read as it is written, however unwise it appears. The court’s refusal to read it as it is written makes it impossible for any one to rely upon the written word of the Legislature”. By the action taken at its recent session in amending section 4532 of the Penal Code, the Legislature affirms the logical construction placed upon the language and the legislative history of the 1923 amendment to section 107 of the Penal Code (part of which is now section 4532) by Mr. Justice Traynor in his dissenting opinion, supra, and which amendments gave rise to the decisions in the cases of In re Haines and In re Halcomb, supra, which require us, in practice, to affirm a judgment we regard as violative of natural justice and at variance with a legislative intent clearly appearing in the language of the 1923 statute and its legislative history.

We are in accord with what we regard as the timely admonition contained in Mr. Justice Traynor’s dissenting opinion, supra, wherein he urges, for the reasons advanced by him, that the decisions In re Haines, supra, and In re Durand, 6 Cal.App.2d 69, 44 P.2d 367, should be overruled.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Diego County; Edward J. Kelly, Judge.

Declaratory judgment action by Oceanview Memorial Park and others against A. Caminetti, Jr., Insurance Commissioner of the State of California, as liquidator of Old West Life & Annuity Company, and another. From a judgment for plaintiffs, defendants appeal.

Affirmed.

Morton L. Barker and William Paul Wood, both of Los Angeles, for appellants.

Rorick & Cottingham, of Oceanside, and Monroe & McInnis and C. M. Monroe, all of San Diego, for respondents.

GRIFFIN, Justice.

Plaintiffs and respondents M. N. Smith and Pearl K. Smith, husband and wife, are the owners of the stock of plaintiff and respondent Oceanview Memorial Park, a corporation (hereinafter referred to as Memorial Park Corporation). This action was brought for declaratory relief in order to determine the validity of a promissory note for $32,500, executed March 5, 1932, and the trust deed securing the same, and to enjoin the foreclosure of the trust deed. It was alleged generally that the consideration for the note failed; that the present holder thereof, defendant and appellant A. Caminetti, Jr., Insurance Commissioner of the State of California, as liquidator of the Old West Life & Annuity Company, a California corporation (hereinafter called the Annuity Company), was not a holder in due course, and that the defendant W. P. Wood, as trustee, was undertaking to foreclose the trust deed by sale, which he had advertised for the 31st day of October, 1941. The relief prayed for was granted by the trial court and this appeal followed.

In 1932, the Smiths organized the Memorial Park Corporation, to conduct a cemetery and mausoleum business. They acquired certain properties for this purpose and divided it into cemetery lots, and a portion thereof was set aside for the building site of a proposed mausoleum. The corporation was mainly created in order that the owners might enter into a proposed agreement with the National Thrift Corporation of America (hereinafter called the Thrift Corporation), to finance and build the mausoleum on the site mentioned. For this purpose a promissory note was signed and a trust deed, dated March 5, 1932, was executed by the Memorial Park Corporation to the Security Title Insurance and Guaranty Corporation, as trustee, and the Thrift Corporation, as beneficiary. By their terms the Memorial Park Corporation agreed to pay $32,500 on or before three years to the beneficiary. Upon the back of the trust deed appears an assignment dated March 7, 1932, two days after its execution, whereby the Thrift Corporation assigned the same to one R. E. Trapp. There also appears an assignment dated March 9, 1932, from Trapp to Los Angeles Life Insurance Company (hereinafter referred to as the Life Insurance Company).

At the same time there was also executed a contract dated March 5, 1932, between plaintiff Memorial Park Corporation and the Thrift Corporation. The contract on behalf of the latter corporation was signed by W. O. Harris, vice president, and Leo T. Porter, secretary. Harris at that time was in charge of construction. This agreement recites that the Thrift Corporation agrees to build in a satisfactory and workmanlike manner, free from debt or liens (other than the trust deed referred to) a mausoleum, according to plans and specifications, for a total consideration of $37,000. This amount was to be paid first, by the note and trust deed for $32,500, and second, by a bill of sale for 20 individual crypts in said mausoleum to be selected by the Thrift Corporation, and from the proceeds of the sale of which the Thrift Corporation was to receive the net amount of $4,500, the Memorial Park Corporation retaining the exclusive option either to buy or sell the crypts within a period of one year. The contract then provides: "We agree to the following allowances in the construction of said mausoleum and will credit the account of the Oceanview Memorial Park, a corporation, with any savings thereon, and will accept payment from said Oceanview Memorial Park for any amount in excess thereof". Then follows the listed items and amounts which aggregate $28,096. It further provides: "We agree to start the construction of said mausoleum as soon as all the papers are in proper form, including the trust indenture hereinabove referred to and to diligently continue the construction thereon and to complete the building within a period of four months from the date thereof."

After executing the above-mentioned contract, there was some delay before construction started. About the month of April, construction commenced and went along for two or three months "rather haphazardly". The Thrift Corporation became financially involved and in September, 1932, finally stopped construction and later went into bankruptcy. Some scaffolding and part of the frame work of the mausoleum was up and some concrete had been poured for the foundation. No grading had been done as agreed in the contract. Trash was left about the place. Some of the walls had been completed "up to the parapet line". Part of the building was built from the foundation up to where the roof line should have been. Roof forms were put on but were never poured with concrete. Those forms and the incompleted mausoleum remained in that condition for about ten years. Shortly after cessation of work on the building, about $8,500 in mechanics' and materialmen's liens were filed and recorded against the property. Actions were commenced upon most of the liens to foreclose them. Settlement was made by Smith with most of the lien claimants. One lien claim was foreclosed. Smith later purchased the property at the foreclosure sale for $300.

In reference to the history of the transaction respecting the trust deed and note the following facts are found by the court: that the Memorial Park Corporation on March 5, 1932, executed the promissory note to the Thrift Corporation in the sum of $32,500; that at the same time and as a part of the same transaction it executed its trust deed securing the payment thereof to the Security Title Insurance and Guaranty Company; that the sole and only consideration for the promissory note and trust deed was the written contract executed upon the same date and as a part of the same transaction; that the Thrift Corporation thereby undertook and agreed to erect upon the real estate and to complete within four months in accordance with specifications then agreed upon and approved, a mausoleum building; that it was an implied term of said contract that said promissory note should not be placed in the hands of an innocent purchaser for value prior to the completion of said mausoleum building; that there was no substantial performance of said building contract; that the Thrift Corporation thereafter was adjudicated a bankrupt, and said structure was never completed; that on March 7, 1932, the Thrift Corporation assigned to Trapp the promissory note for $32,500; that on March 9, 1932, Trapp transferred the same to the Life Insurance Company; that said Life Insurance Company, by successive changes of name, became known as National Thrift Assurance Corporation of California (hereinafter called the Assurance Corporation), and Old West Life & Annuity Company, a corporation; that on March 7, 1932, the Thrift Corporation caused an assignment of its interest in the trust deed to be made to the Assurance Corporation; that said trust deed was recorded on March 26, 1932; that neither Trapp nor the Life Insurance Company were innocent holders or holders for value in due course of said note or the beneficial interest in said trust deed securing the same; that, on the contrary, Trapp and the officers of the last-named corporation well knew the terms of the building contract and that at the time of said transfer the same had not been fulfilled; that said transfers were not made in the regular course of business and that the transfer of the last-named corporation was not for a valuable consideration; that although defendants have possession of the note and trust deed, nevertheless it is subject to all defenses to which the same would be subject in the hands of the original payee, the Thrift Corporation; that the attempted transfer of the note constituted fraud upon the rights of the plaintiffs and that the facts relative thereto were fully known to all subsequent holders thereof. The court concluded that the plaintiffs were entitled to have the title to the property quieted as against the trust deed and the defendants above mentioned, and that the plaintiffs are entitled to an order permanently enjoining the foreclosure or enforcement of the trust deed. Judgment was entered accordingly.

Appellants' main contention is that there is not sufficient evidence to sustain the trial court's finding that the defendant Annuity Company or the defendant Insurance Commissioner, as liquidator thereof, did not take the instruments in question as a holder in due course.

Smith testified that he knew nothing as to what happened to the trust deed until notice of the sale thereunder was given him in the fall of 1941 by W. P. Wood, as substitute trustee; that he did not "suppose they could collect the note as they had not performed the contract"; and that under the contract he was not aware that it would be legally possible for the Thrift Corporation to transfer the note to a third party.

Trapp testified and appellants contend that prior to February 24, 1932, the Thrift Corporation was engaged in procuring funds for use in its business by the sale of what were known as thrift certificates; that the certificates were a form of bond; that the corporation was engaged in making loans of various types and also engaged in the construction and sale of various types of buildings; that he, Trapp, had a contract with the Thrift Corporation on a commission basis which gave him the exclusive agency in the United States covering the sale of the investment certificates issued by the corporation; that these certificates were sold on an installment basis and payments extended over a period of approximately 18 months; that Trapp maintained offices in California and also in other states; that in February, 1932, the Thrift Corporation decided to change its plan of operation and entered into negotiations with Trapp for the cancellation of his contract; that on February 24, 1932, an agreement was entered into by him and the corporation under which he agreed to the termination of his exclusive selling agency and the cancellation of unearned commissions; that at that time it was estimated that the total commissions to which he would be entitled under his contract exceeded the sum of $50,000; that the corporation agreed to pay him $35,000 in securities, consisting of first trust deeds and $15,000 in cash; that at the time of entering into the agreement Trapp had coming to him, as accrued earned commissions, the sum of $19,000; that he received about $5,000 in installments, and the promissory note for $32,500 here involved, secured by the trust deed which is the subject of this action; that the note and deed of trust were acquired by the Thrift Corporation in the following manner: That prior to February 24, 1932, the Life Insurance Company had been engaged in the sale of life insurance and other forms of insurance in the State of California; that the officials of the Thrift Corporation had determined that they could make more money for the corporation by engaging in the sale of a combination of an investment certificate and life insurance policy, and for this purpose the officials acquired control of a corporation which held the stock of the Life Insurance Company; that they planned to discontinue the sale of the thrift certificates formerly sold through Trapp's agency and they so informed him; that he objected to the threatened cancellation of his contract and it was finally agreed that if he would agree to a cancellation and put money into the Insurance Company he would be given a contract for the sale of policies of that company; that pursuant to this agreement Trapp delivered to the Life Insurance Company the sum of $10,000 in cash shortly after February 24, 1932, and agreed to deliver securities of the value of $35,000; that in return, Trapp was to receive stock of the value of $35,000 in a holding corporation which held all of the stock of the Insurance Company; that on February 25, 1932, the name of the Los Angeles Life Insurance Company was changed to National Thrift Assurance Corporation; that because of the fact that the Insurance Company became insolvent no stock in the holding company was ever issued to Trapp under the agreement; that on February 24, 1933, the insurance commissioner of the state, pursuant to a petition filed by him for that purpose, was appointed liquidator of the Old West Life & Annuity Company, by order of the court, and in the latter part of 1941, commenced proceedings for the foreclosure of the trust deed in the full amount set forth therein. This action followed.

[1] It will be noted that the endorsement of the note by the payee thereof and by Trapp was effected before the instrument was due. Under section 3140 of the Civil Code, the holder thereof is deemed prima facie to be a holder in due course. A holder in due course is a holder who has taken a negotiable instrument under the following conditions: "* * *(3) That he took it in good faith and for value; (4) That at the time it was negotiated to him he had no notice of any infirmity in the instrument or defect in the title of the person negotiating it." § 3133, Civ.Code. In this connection, in support of the court's findings, we will review some of the additional evidence offered in that respect.

First, it is conceded that the statute of limitations has run as against the promissory note. The trust deed was assigned directly from the original beneficiary to the Life Insurance Company. It is apparent that the Thrift Corporation and its officers had knowledge of the terms of the building contract for which the note and deed of trust were issued, and that no consideration had passed between the maker and the beneficiary at the time the instruments were executed. The contract was drawn by W. O. Harris and a copy of it was on file in the office of the Thrift Corporation with the note. The trust deed was placed of record. Trapp, for several years, maintained an office on the same floor in the same building with the Thrift Corporation. However, he testified that he did not have knowledge of its transactions or occupy any official capacity with that corporation other than operating his own sales agency in selling securities of that corporation. He did testify that a few days before he accepted the note and trust deed he made a trip to the property; that he did not make any effort to contact the makers of the note or trust deed, but his attorney made an investigation and reported back to him.

Harris, as vice president, testified that he handled the transaction for the Thrift Corporation; that he discussed it with Trapp, and around the time the papers were being completed, Trapp asked him what the details of the deal were, and as he remembered it, he showed him a copy of the building contract.

Plaintiff Smith testified that he discussed "in generalities this contract" with Trapp, which conversation was held shortly before the contract was executed.

Harris further testified that one Bruce Young, affiliated with the Life Insurance Company, was brought to the Thrift Corporation office about that time and that Trapp and Young held a lot of "secret sessions" with Nathan T. Porter and his son Leo T. Porter, president and secretary respectively of the Thrift Corporation; that he, Harris, "knew there was some insurance deal of some kind brewing, but what it was I didn't know"; that as far as he, as vice president of the Thrift Corporation was concerned, he would never "have considered such a proposition as the assignment of the note and deed of trust * * * because it was an incompleted transaction."

The evidence also discloses that in the certificate of change of name, on March 3, 1932, Nathan T. Porter and Leo T. Porter were named as president and secretary of the Life Insurance Company. These individuals were also president and secretary of the Assurance Corporation.

Without setting forth other evidence produced, it already seems to be a logical conclusion to be reached that the parties, finding the Thrift Corporation to be in financial distress and facing bankruptcy, were merely transferring the trust deed and note from one corporation controlled by them to another corporation or corporations also controlled by them, for the purpose of rehabilitating the latter corporations; that Trapp was merely an instrumentality used for this purpose and that they well knew about the entire transaction respecting the Memorial Park, the terms of the building contract, the consideration for the note and deed of trust, that the amount payable by the Memorial Park Corporation was dependent upon contingencies to happen in the future; and that they knew that under the provisions of the building contract the amount to be finally paid on the note and trust deed might be substantially less than the amount expressed on the face of those instruments.

[2] From the evidence the trial court was fully justified in holding that the appellants were not holders in due course; that there was no consideration or that the consideration had failed, and that the note and trust deed were unenforceable, either in the hands of the original holder or subsequent holders, and each were charged with notice of the conditions surrounding the execution of the trust deed. Goodwin v. Nickerson, 51 Cal. 166; Prouty v. Adams, 141 Cal. 304, 74 P. 845; Meyer v. Weber, 133 Cal. 681, 65 P. 1110; Spotton v. Dyer, 42 Cal.App. 585, 184 P. 23; Roush v. Kirkman, 42 Cal.App. 115, 183 P. 353; Symonds v. Sherman, 219 Cal. 249, 26 P.2d 293.

[3, 4] In this connection it is also argued that under the evidence, as a matter of law, plaintiffs are estopped from denying that they had knowledge of the transfer of the instruments and that the defendant Commissioner is a holder in due course. It appears from the evidence that plaintiff Mr. Smith in one of the actions to foreclose one of the liens against Memorial Park Corporation, filed a verified answer in which he set up as a defense thereto that the note and trust deed above mentioned were sold to a third person by the Thrift Corporation and are "still outstanding and unreleased, and said trust deed constitutes a first lien upon said premises"; that before the mausoleum was completed, the Thrift Corporation became insolvent and "the mausoleum still remained 75 per cent uncompleted". Defendants here were not parties to that action. There was no adjudication of those questions in that action. While a verified pleading filed by a party in one action is competent evidence against him in another case as an admission, it is not conclusive and does not carry the effect of an estoppel of record. De Bock v. De Bock, 43 Cal.App. 283, 184 P. 890; 10 Cal.Jur. p. 616, sec. 6. As between the parties to this action the pleadings above mentioned did not constitute an estoppel as a matter of law for the purposes suggested.

It is next contended that even though appellants were not holders in due course, the trial court failed to require the maker of the note and trust deed to make payment to defendants herein for the benefits received under the building agreement pursuant to which the note and trust deed were given; that the action was an equitable proceeding and that therefore before plaintiffs could obtain the relief sought, they would have to do or offer to do equity. It is argued that in their answer defendants alleged that a substantial portion of the mausoleum was completed by the Thrift Corporation; that they expended over $13,000 in its erection; that a portion of the incomplete building is now being used by plaintiffs, and that they have collected large sums from the sale of crypts therein; that the trial court failed to find on this issue and denied defendants any relief. They cite the rule set forth in 27 Cal.Jur. p. 212, § 19, "* * * that while a special contract remains unperformed, the party who has not completed his part cannot sue indebitatus assumpsit to recover compensation for what he has done. But there is an exception to the rule in cases where something has been done under a special contract, though not in strict accordance therewith. While no recovery can be had on the contract, if the other party has derived some benefit from the labor performed the law implies a promise on his part to pay such remuneration as the benefit conferred is really worth."

The trial court did find that "there was no substantial performance of the building contract"; that the trust deed was unenforceable; that the consideration failed, and that plaintiffs were entitled to have their title to the property quieted as against the trust deed and against defendants, and no condition precedent was attached to such right in the findings or judgment.

We must conclude that the court found against defendants on the issue that they were entitled to any relief under their claim. The record fully supports the court's finding that the Thrift Corporation breached its building contract through no fault of plaintiffs. It is true that defendants presented in evidence a record of the Thrift Corporation's cancelled checks and book account purporting to show that certain payments had been made for labor and material by that corporation in reference to the Memorial Park contract. These amounts totalled approximately $12,424.49. Pictures were received in evidence showing the incomplete state of the building.

Defendants produced an engineer as a witness, who testified as to the value of the building in its incomplete state. He testified that he did not see the building until 1942; that he could only put a value on the work that was there then; that it was testified that the work was about 60 per cent completed; that 60 per cent of $12,000 would be about $7,000, not allowing for the marble work which was done later; that the marble work was worth around $4,000; that his estimate of the value of the building in 1932, including all items, was about $6,000.

Plaintiff Smith testified that most of the work that had been done by the Thrift Corporation was more of a detriment to the Memorial Park than it was an asset; that when work ceased on the building, scaffolding and roof forms were left up, but concrete was not poured; that over a period of ten years the forms became weather beaten, were useless, and had to be removed; that he tried to secure a loan on the property to fix it up but could not, due to the clouded condition of the title involving all of his lots by reason of the trust deed; that later he tried to fix up the lower corridor of the mausoleum; that he built an office and rest room, put on a temporary roof over the corridor, and used the marble delivered on the job in constructing some 99 crypts of those contemplated and disposed of most of them at $175 apiece; that the Thrift Corporation never paid for the marble or items of brass and copper that were used by him; that this was an item of one of the liens which he settled; that he paid off approximately $3,000 in liens by exchange for crypts and graves and by cash; that he "laid out" probably $5,000 in money in title searches and additional expenses and also paid out "several thousand dollars" more in parking and landscaping, which was supposed to have been done under the contract, plus another item of $225, for which he held a receipt. He then testified that in his opinion about 60 per cent of the concrete work had been done when the Thrift Corporation went bankrupt (not that 60 per cent of all of the work was completed as believed by defendants' witness, the engineer, and upon which he made his compilation of estimated value); that he, Smith, spent several months of hard work himself in making the buildings and grounds presentable. He then testified upon cross-examination that the Thrift Corporation did put some material and labor into the property and enhanced the value of it about $10,000, but he testified that subtracting the liens, etc., which the Thrift Corporation did not pay, he did not see how it could claim those items as its expenditure of money.

[5, 6] There is no question but that plaintiffs have been greatly inconvenienced and damaged by the Thrift Corporation's breach of the contract, and by its subsequent actions. It is under this evidence that defendants claim that they were entitled to be reimbursed for the purported amount plaintiffs have been enriched by the transaction. Defendants complain because the court failed to find the amount of claimed enrichment and refused to award them a share thereof. From an examination of the evidence it is readily apparent that the evidence was not only conflicting, but also quite confusing respecting the amount of the claimed equitable relief, if any, that might be rightfully due to defendants. It is true that the Thrift Corporation did expend some sums and furnish some material and labor on the building. Much of the material was not paid for by it, however, and liens were allowed to be filed against plaintiffs' property. They were confronted with many law suits in connection therewith. Any beneficial arrangements Smith may have made with those claimants in payment of the material could not and should not be claimed by the Thrift Corporation or its assignees. The Thrift Corporation was the one who breached the contract and apparently by some manipulation endeavored to gain some advantage to them by assigning the note and trust deed. It cannot be said under the evidence that the trial court abused its discretion in failing to award to defendants any relief. The trial court fully considered this question. If counsel are at all in doubt in this respect, a copy of the trial court's opinion accompanying the record should be read. The reasons there expressed and the conclusions reached as to why defendants were not entitled to equitable relief, is stated in quite forceful language. It does not appear therefrom that if the court would find more fully on the subject, such a finding would be in defendants' favor. Bell v. Adams, 150 Cal. 772, 90 P. 118. The trial court's determination of the equities of the respective parties will not be disturbed upon this appeal.

Judgment affirmed.

CAMINETTI, Insurance Commissioner, v. IMPERIAL MUT. LIFE INS. CO.

Civ. 13703.

District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California.

June 29, 1943.

Rehearing Denied July 28, 1943.

Hearing Denied Aug. 26, 1943.

1. Appeal and error ⇨931(1), 1010(1)

Usually, an appellate tribunal is not justified in reversing judgment as not sustained by sufficient evidence, unless it appears from record that, accepting full force of evidence adduced, with every inference therefrom favorable to prevailing party, such party is still precluded as matter of law from recovering judgment.

2. Insurance ⇨44

The word "hazardous", as used in statute requiring superior court to direct insurance commissioner to take possession of assets and conduct business of insurance company in such condition that its further transaction of business will be hazardous to its policyholders, means that company's management so conducts its business that there is loss or risk of loss to policyholders. St.1937, p. 2563, § 1011.

See Words and Phrases, Permanent Edition, for all other definitions of "Hazardous".

3. Insurance ⇨64

The trial court's determination on competent testimony, without abuse of discretion, that mutual life insurance company's management is such that control of its business should be returned to it by insurance commissioner theretofore appointed as company's conservator, is binding on courts of review. St.1935, p. 541, § 1012; St.1937, p. 2563, § 1011

4. Insurance ⇨64

On hearing of mutual life insurance company's application for permission to resume title to and possession of its property and conduct its own business after insurance commissioner's appointment as company's conservator, burden was not on commissioner to prove that company was in hazardous condition. St.1935, p. 541, § 1012; St.1937, p. 2563, § 1011.

5. Insurance ⇨64

While order of proof is generally within trial court's discretion, a mutual life insurance company, on its application for order terminating insurance commissioner's conservatorship of company, must assume burden of proof that ground for commissioner's appointment as conservator does not exist or has been removed and that company can properly resume title to and possession of its property and conduct of its business. St.1935, p. 541, § 1012; St.1937, p. 2563, § 1011.

A judgment may be reversed for erroneous rulings on law questions only when complaining party's rights have been prejudiced, and where trial court's decision or judgment is manifestly right on evidence and error has not resulted in miscarriage of justice, appellate tribunal is not authorized to set aside judgment. Const. art. 6, § 4½.

7. Insurance ⇨64

The superior court's erroneous ruling that burden of proof was on insurance commissioner in hearing on mutual life insurance company's application for permission to resume title to and possession of its property and conduct its own business after commissioner's appointment as company's conservator did not result in "miscarriage of justice," where evidence was sufficient to meet burden of proof imposed on company, so as to preclude reversal of judgment for company. St.1935, p. 541, § 1012; St.1937, p. 2563, § 1011.

10. Criminal law 🔑27

The law of jurisdiction wherein crime is committed determines whether offense is felony or misdemeanor.

11. Criminal law 🔑275

A plea of "nolo contendere", like a demurrer to indictment, admits all facts stated in indictment for purpose of particular case, but cannot be used as "admission" elsewhere, as it is implied confession only of offense charged.

14. Criminal law 🔑275

The plea of "nolo contendere", though often used as substitute for plea of guilty, amounts only to declaration by defendant that he will not contend.

15. Criminal law 🔑275

A plea of "nolo contendere" cannot be used against defendant as an "admission" in civil suit for same act.

16. Criminal law 🔑275

A plea of "nolo contendere" is a "confession," which defendant may be sentenced in particular prosecution, but such conviction cannot be used in another proceeding to discredit witness.

See Words and Phrases, Permanent Edition, for all other definitions of "Confession".

17. Criminal law 🔑275

Strictly speaking, plea of "nolo contendere" amounts only to agreement by defendant that fact charged may be considered as true for purposes of particular case wherein plea is entered, and it is not conclusive, though implied, "confession" of guilt.

On insurance company's application for permission to resume title to and possession of its property and conduct its own business after insurance commissioner's appointment as company's conservator, a plea of nolo contendere, entered by certain officers of company to federal indictment for conspiracy to defraud government, did not constitute evidence that they had engaged in fraudulent transactions, so that their conviction on such plea was inadmissible in evidence as "admission" that company did not comply with legal requirements for issuance of certificate of authority to it. St.1937, p. 2018, § 704.5; p. 2563, § 1011 (i); Cr.Code §§ 37, 335, 18 U.S.C.A. §§ 88, 541.

In superior court's interlocutory judgment, restoring to mutual life insurance company its business and property theretofore taken over by insurance commissioner as company's conservator recital that court retained jurisdiction of proceeding and continued matter for stated time for purpose of receiving further evidence or hearing additional motions was void as contrary to statutory provisions and whole theory of such administrative proceedings. WHITE, Justice.

This is an appeal by the Insurance Commissioner of the State of California from a judgment rendered pursuant to section 1012 of the Insurance Code, St.1935, p. 541, restoring to Imperial Mutual Life Insurance Company (hereinafter referred to as Imperial Mutual) business and properties which had theretofore been taken over by the Commissioner under section 1011 of the Insurance Code, St.1937, p. 2563.

The insurance company here involved was incorporated in 1927 as a mutual benefit association under the assessment plan as provided for in what was commonly known as Chapter 4, of the Civil Code. Chapter 4 was thereafter superseded by Chapter 8 of the Insurance Code (sections 10640 to 10780 inclusive, St.1935, pp. 657–668), and all such Chapter 4 mutual benefit associations were automatically placed under Chapter 8 of the Insurance Code (section 10669, Insurance Code).

From the adoption of the Insurance Code on September 15, 1935, until the latter part of 1936, Imperial Mutual was operated under Chapter 8 of Part 2, Division 2 of that code. It was, in other words, conducted upon the "mutual benefit assessment plan". Its policies did not provide for "premiums" but for "assessments" to be levied as death claims arose. At the time Chapter 8 was enacted the law provided (sections 10739 to 10744, Insurance Code) that such an association could transform itself into a Chapter 9 company without reincorporating, and thereafter be governed by the provisions of such last mentioned chapter. In the case of Imperial Mutual, such transformation was accomplished in the latter part of 1936. At that time its name was changed from Imperial Mutual Life Insurance Association to Imperial Mutual Life Insurance Company; it altered its plan of doing business; prepared new policies and thereafter operated under the provisions of Chapter 9, St.1935, p. 671 et seq., as to all business subsequently written. It should here be noted that Chapter 8 does not provide for reserves on policies, but Chapter 9 requires "modified" or reduced reserves for the first five policy years and thereafter full reserves. Insurance Code section 10870, St.1935, p. 676. So far as the company here involved is concerned, full reserves were required to be maintained on business procured and policies issued after December 31, 1941. Insurance Code, section 10870.

On June 16, 1941, A. Caminetti, Jr., in his capacity as Insurance Commissioner of the State of California and pursuant to the provisions of section 1011 of the Insurance Code, filed in the Superior Court of Los Angeles County his application for an order appointing him as Conservator of Imperial Mutual and directing him as such Conservator to take possession of respondent insurance company. Upon the issuance of such order, appellant insurance commissioner took possession of the books, records and property of respondent and proceeded to conduct, as such conservator, respondent's insurance business. Thereafter, and pursuant to the provisions of Section 1012 of the Insurance Code, respondent made application to said Superior Court for an order permitting it to resume title and possession of its property and to be permitted to conduct its own business. The last mentioned code section provides that the order granted pursuant to section 1011 of the Insurance Code shall continue in force and effect until an application, such as was made by respondent insurance company here, is filed and "it shall, after a full hearing, appear to said court that the ground for said order directing the commissioner to take title and possession does not exist or has been removed and that said person can properly resume title and possession of its property and the conduct of its business."

Upon conclusion of such hearing the Superior Court rendered its judgment, denominated "interlocutory", wherein it was recited that the ground for the commissioner's action in taking over the respondent's business did not exist or had been removed, and that the insurance company could properly resume possession of its property and conduct of its business; that the order issued by the court on June 16, 1941, in accordance with Insurance Code section 1011, appointing the commissioner as conservator, be terminated and cancelled and the conservatorship created by such order be dissolved; and that the said insurance company take immediate possession of its properties; that the commissioner forthwith restore such properties to respondent. Following the foregoing, the judgment provided:

"The court retains jurisdiction of the matter for the purpose of entering a final judgment, upon motion of either party or on the court's own motion, such final judgment to make final disposition of this proceeding and the property and affairs of the respondent company, and which final judgment may be in accord with the interlocutory judgment or different therefrom, depending upon such further showing as may be made to the court.

"That until such final judgment shall have been entered, this court retains complete jurisdiction in the premises and in these proceedings for all purposes, including the making, upon proper showing, of any other or further appropriate order, and the amending or vacation of this interlocutory judgment.

"The matter is now continued on the court's calendar until February 10, 1943, at 10 o'clock a. m., or as soon thereafter as counsel can be heard, in department 12 of this court, for the presentation of such supplementary evidence, the hearing of such argument, and the making of such motions as may be meet and proper in the premises, with the right reserved to either party, however, to have set on the court's calendar at any time convenient to the court in the meantime, any matter appropriate to the premises."

So far as the factual background surrounding this litigation is concerned, the record discloses that for some time prior to 1937, Mr. Mark Pierce, President of Pierce Brothers, a corporation, which operates a large undertaking business in the city of Los Angeles, had been interested in what was then a comparatively new subject, referred to as burial insurance. Such insurance was and is legally authorized in this State. Insurance Code section 10240, St.1935, p. 642. By the terms of the code section just cited, such insurance is referred to as a "burial contract"; is denominated a life policy which contains an agreement for a valuable consideration, to dispose of the remains of any person living at the time such policy is executed. Policies of this character are payable to a funeral director who receives the proceeds thereof in partial or complete payment of the costs for the funeral of the insured. Believing that the establishment of such an insurance company would be of benefit to his mortuary; to funeral directors generally, and as well fill what he conceived to be a public need, Mr. Pierce travelled east where he consulted with the officers of two large life insurance companies in an endeavor to prevail upon them to write and issue such policies in the State of California; but for various reasons the companies interviewed declined to enter such a field of insurance. Mr. Pierce then determined upon identifying himself with some local company in Southern California which would undertake to issue such policies. While seeking an appropriate company for such purposes, Mr. Pierce came in contact with Mr. F. W. Bailey who was then President and a Director of Imperial Mutual and held proxies from most of its members. Mr. Bailey's wife was also a company director, while an employee of the company served as the third director thereof. After some negotiations between Mr. Pierce and Mr. Bailey, the latter agreed to resign as an officer and director; to procure the resignations of the other officers and directors; to procure the election to the board of directors of persons named by Mr. Pierce and to substitute the latter for himself in all of the proxies held by him. In consideration of the foregoing, Mr. Pierce paid to Mr. Bailey the sum of $27,000. Accordingly, Mr. Pierce was duly designated as the proxy holder; and Pierce Brothers, Incorporated, determined who should go on the board of directors of the insurance company. It further appears that prior to consummating the purchase of Imperial Mutual, Mr. Pierce engaged the services of an attorney who was a former insurance commissioner of the State of Missouri and a recognized authority on insurance law, to lay the entire plan before the insurance department of the State of California; submitting to that department the names of those who would constitute the management personnel of the insurance company; that Pierce Brothers would become active in such management and that the company would write burial policies of insurance. The proposed plan met with no opposition from the California State Insurance Department and the testimony indicates a favorable attitude toward the plan on the part of the Insurance Department.

It is also indicated by the record herein that at the time the present management took over Imperial Mutual, that company had slightly more than 1,000 policy holders, to which figure its policy holders had diminished from over 5,000. Under the law such an association was required to have at least 1,000 policy holders and should its membership decrease to less than that number and not be increased to 1,000 within 90 days, its certificate of authority to do business would be revoked and the insurance commissioner would liquidate it or merge it with some other company. Insurance Code sections 10710, 10711, 10712, St.1935, p. 663.

Such minimum membership requirement was, in effect, continued over into Chapter 9. Insurance Code section 10830, St.1935, p. 672. It is noteworthy, in connection with the decision arrived at by the trial court that, under the present management Imperial Mutual enjoyed a substantial growth; expanded its policy holders from a scant 1,000 in 1937 to more than 10,000 by the end of the year 1940 and increased its total assets from some $16,000 to approximately $164,000 during the same period. Without here mentioning by name the persons comprising the present management, it is established by the record that they are men of proven business ability, financial responsibility, and of excellent standing in the community.

In the present proceeding appellant insurance commissioner challenges what is characterized as a "liberal" policy of writing insurance and settling claims thereunder. In that connection it appears that about September, 1938, the then Insurance Commissioner of California prepared a list of some 28 instances in which claims against Imperial Mutual, aggregating some $4,800, had been paid under circumstances not contemplated by the policies and which were hazardous to the successful conduct of the insurance business. Following conferences or hearings held by the commissioner, Imperial Mutual agreed to install a completely new and rigid underwriting system, whereby the acceptance of all new insurance risks would be strictly and rigidly supervised and enforced. Also the same with respect to the payment of all claims; the legality of all claims would be closely considered so that no improper claims would be paid, but on the contrary all proper claims would be paid promptly. The company agreed not to ante-date any more policies except to make the policies uniformly dated on the 1st and 15th. If a policy was issued, we will say, June 10th, it would be dated June 15th, the nearest half month's date, or if a policy were issued June 5th, it would be dated June 1st. A completely new underwriting system was immediately installed whereby all applicants were either inspected or medically examined in accordance with their age or amount of the policy applied for and undesirable risks rejected. A new system was installed with reference to payment of claims. Claims were closely examined and all facts as to their validity were also considered. Every claim was submitted to the company's attorney for his opinion as to the legality of the claim and whether it should be paid or rejected. As to the subsequent conduct of respondent insurance company, appellant commissioner in his brief concedes that "since that conference, the files do not disclose any serious repetition of the situation there presented"; while in connection therewith the trial judge in his summation of the evidence said "The mistakes that were made in those early years have been frankly admitted, and there is no evidence that they were continued. The evidence indicates that the company learned by those mistakes, profited by them, and did not continue any of them."

Further, in connection with the conferences or hearings held by the commissioner in 1938, appellant complains "It was pointed out that the financial situation of the company was becoming impaired; and that Mr. Pierce thereupon donated $9,000 to the company; and his brother-in-law, Mr. Dean, the next year donated an additional $2,000." We fail to perceive in these contributions or loans to the company any evidence that the donors' connection with the insurance company constituted a hazardous or dangerous situation. It seems rather to confirm the position taken by the insurance commissioner in 1938 that the connection of Pierce Brothers, Incorporated, and its officers with Imperial Mutual was more of an asset than a hazard and more a source of strength than of danger.

[1] We shall first give consideration to appellant's claim that the evidence showed without conflict that the company did not have assets, in excess of its other liabilities, to provide for reserves as required by section 10870 of the Insurance Code, and that, in consequence, the court erred in holding that the company was not in a financially hazardous condition; that it had complied with the law and had met the requirements thereof for the issuance to it of a certificate of authority to do business. Insurance Code sections 10915, 1011(e), 1011(i), St.1935, p. 680, St. 1937, p. 2563. Appellant insurance commissioner concedes the long established and usual rule that before an appellate tribunal is justified in reversing a judgment upon the ground of insufficiency of the evidence, it must appear from the record that accepting the full force of the evidence adduced, together with every inference favorable to the prevailing party which may be drawn therefrom, it still appears that as a matter of law the prevailing party is precluded from recovering a judgment, but urges that the rule does not apply if the trial judge committed any error or errors of law which manifestly influenced or controlled his conclusions of fact. In other words, that an appellate court is not bound by the findings of the trial court on evidence where an erroneous view of the law has been applied to the facts. To the claimed application of erroneous rules of law to the facts by the trial court, we shall later give consideration because from a review of the record we are convinced that any such errors could not have influenced the conclusion arrived at by the trial court when the evidence herein is considered as a whole.

[2] As we understand the definition of the word "hazardous" as used in the statute, it means that the management of the insurance company so conducts its business that there is a loss or risk of loss to the policy holders. That when such a condition prevails it becomes the duty, and is the right of the insurance commissioner to take possession of the company's assets and to conduct its business as conservator. Appellant insurance commissioner asserts that the present management came into power through an illegal agreement by which it caused to be paid the sum of $27,000 to fiduciaries to induce them to abandon their trust. What we have heretofore said concerning the progress made by the present management strongly militates against the verity of the claim that the action of Pierce Brothers in obtaining control of the insurance company proved in any way hazardous to the latter or its policy holders. It is next contended that the influence and control of Pierce Brothers over the management of Imperial Mutual was inimical to the best interests of the company and tended to produce a hazardous situation in reference thereto. The evidence in the case does not warrant such a conclusion. As heretofore pointed out, the evidence was such as to justify the view taken by the trial court that the present management has been a source of strength to the insurance company. No salaries or other remuneration have been taken by the management. A contribution of $11,000 in cash to the insurance company was made by the management and the company's general agency was financed by the Pierce Brothers group to the extent of some $41,000. Appellant concedes that the men who make up the Pierce Brothers corporation are astute and successful business men but challenges their motive and the opportunity for venality that is presented to them. The record of accomplishments by the insurance company under the present management does not warrant the stricture that they either took advantage of any opportunity to do wrong by the insurance company or that their motive was an evil one. It is the legality of their acts with which the law is concerned rather than the motive which prompts such actions. With reference to the proxies obtained by Mr. Pierce, the record reflects that when the insurance commissioner objected to their use, the management disregarded and terminated such proxies in 1940 and they were not thereafter used. At the annual meeting of the insurance company, whereat directors were elected, the policy holders were fully informed of their rights to personally appear at the meeting or to give their proxy to anyone they chose. The board of directors did name a policy holders committee of five prominent and reputable men but the policy holder was left free to designate any person of his choice as a proxy in the event he did not desire to appear at the meeting and vote in person. True, Pierce Brothers had an interest in the insurance company, reflected in their profits from funerals conducted by them and paid for from the proceeds of the burial policies issued by the company, but we fail to perceive wherein such an interest was antagonistic to the welfare of the company so long as the affairs of the latter were honestly and efficiently conducted. The record is barren of any evidence of dishonesty at any time and fails to establish any inefficiency since the conferences held with the former commissioner in 1938.

[3] We come now to a consideration of appellant commissioner's claim that the methods adopted by the insurance company in computing its reserves did not conform with the provisions of section 10870 and other Insurance Code mandates. It would unduly prolong this opinion to enter into a discussion of the technical nature of life insurance reserves and the manner of their computation as the same appears in the record. Suffice it to say that conceding a conflict in the evidence upon the merits of reserve computation as practised by the insurance company management and the method advocated by the insurance commissioner, there is nevertheless in the record evidence of sufficient substantiality to warrant the trial court's conclusion that no hazardous or unsound financial condition was proven, and that the further transaction of business by the present management would not be hazardous to the company's policy holders, creditors, or to the public. During the years the company has been in business under the present management it has promptly met all its financial obligations. The factual situations which we have been discussing all involved matters which of necessity must be confided to the sound discretion of the trial court which hears the testimony, observes the witnesses and analyzes the financial statement of the company. When the trial court has, upon competent testimony and without abuse of discretion, determined that the management of the insurance company is such that the control of its business should be returned to it, that determination is binding upon our courts of review. Caminetti v. Guaranty Union Life Insurance Co., 52 Cal.App.2d 330, 336, 126 P.2d 159.

In view of the conclusion at which we have arrived concerning the correctness of the court's decision that respondent company "Can properly resume title and possession of its property and the conduct of its business" (section 1012 Insurance Code) it becomes unnecessary to discuss or decide appellant's contention that the court erred in striking from the order obtained by the commissioner on June 16, 1941, under section 1011 of the Insurance Code, that portion of such order which directed that title to respondent corporation's assets be vested in the commissioner. The latter concedes that the claimed error in this respect is not of itself, of such a nature as to require a reversal of the main order appealed from, and that only in case of a reversal would the question of technical title to the company's assets assume importance.

[4-8] Appellant insurance commissioner next complains of the ruling of the trial court upon the hearing under section 1012 of the Insurance Code that the burden of proof was upon the commissioner. This ruling was erroneous. In making his application under section 1011 of the Insurance Code, the commissioner does not seek a judicial appointment and a judicial ruling that the company is in fact delinquent. By his application the commissioner merely represents that he has found certain conditions to exist and has made his official administrative determination to proceed as authorized by the statute. In obtaining his original ex parte order, the commissioner is not required to show to the court that the company was in fact in a hazardous condition, but only that he, as a state officer, invested by legislative authority with the power, has so "determined" and "found". The insurance code provides that the order or determination of the Commissioner to take over the affairs and assets of the company shall continue in force and effect until, upon application by either the commissioner or of the company, it shall appear to the court, after a full hearing, that the ground for said order does not exist or has been removed and that the company can properly resume title to and possession of its property and the conduct of its business. While the order of proof in any trial is generally speaking within the discretion of the court, it has been decisively settled that in a proceeding such as this, under section 1012 of the Insurance Code, it is the duty of the company challenging the determination of the insurance commissioner to take over its affairs, to assume the burden of proof upon its application to the court for an order terminating the conservatorship. Caminetti v. Guaranty Union Life Insurance Company, 52 Cal.App.2d 330, 335, 336, 126 P.2d 159. However, we are not persuaded that the error in the ruling complained of warrants or necessitates a reversal. A judgment may be reversed for erroneous rulings on questions of law only when the rights of the party complaining have been prejudiced; and where the decision or judgment is manifestly right upon the evidence and the error has not resulted in a miscarriage of justice, an appellate tribunal is not authorized to set aside the judgment. In other words, it is incumbent upon appellant to show that error has occurred which resulted in a miscarriage of justice before he is entitled to a reversal. § 4½, Art. VI, Constitution of California; Tupman v. Haberkern, 208 Cal. 256, 262, 263, 280 P. 970; Lutz v. Merchants' National Bank, 179 Cal. 401, 404, 177 P. 158; Murphy v. Retirement Board, 49 Cal.App.2d 58, 60, 121 P.2d 101. In the instant proceeding there was a full and fair hearing; each side was permitted to and did present all of its evidence. Therefore, notwithstanding this error of law, after an examination of the entire cause, including the evidence, we are unable to say that the error complained of resulted in a miscarriage of justice. We can not, therefore, disturb the judgment. We are not unmindful of appellant commissioner's claim that it can not be assumed that the court would have found in favor of respondent upon the main question involved had it required that the evidence should preponderate in favor of respondent. But as we review the evidence and the summation thereof by the trial court, we are impressed with the belief that respondent met the burden imposed upon it, and consequently, no miscarriage of justice resulted from the erroneous ruling as to who should assume the burden of proof. When considered as a whole, the evidence clearly justifies the decision arrived at in the trial forum.

[9-18] It is next contended by appellant commissioner that the court erred in refusing to permit him to prove that certain officers of respondent company had been convicted of a felony involving fraud. In his "Response to Application for Full Hearing" the commissioner pleaded "On or about the 30th day of March, 1938, the said Mark A. Pierce and the said Joseph B. Dean, and certain other officers and employees of Pierce Bros., a corporation, were charged in an indictment filed in the United States District Court for the Southern District of California with the commission of a felony, to-wit, a violation of 18 U.S.C.A. § 88, in that they did conspire to defraud the government of the United States. Thereafter and on or about the 26th day of September, 1938, the said Mark A. Pierce and the said Joseph B. Dean each entered a plea of nolo contendere to said indictment and judgment was thereupon entered assessing a fine of $2500.00 against each of them". In support of the foregoing allegations the commissioner offered in evidence a certified copy of such an indictment in the United States District Court and of the "judgment and commitment" showing the pleas interposed and the fine assessed. At the close of the hearing the court granted a motion to strike the above quoted paragraph from the commissioner's "response" and sustained an objection to the proffered exhibit. In support of his claim that the rulings of the court were erroneous, appellant urges that the foregoing evidence conclusively established that the company did not comply with the legal requirements for the issuance to it of a certificate of authority (Insurance Code section 704.5, St. 1937, p. 2018) and therefore "he was entitled to continue in possession and control of the company's business, affairs and assets (Insurance Code section 1011(i)". The first section just cited vests in the commissioner power to suspend, revoke, or decline to grant or renew a certificate of authority if any present officer or director of the applicant company has been convicted of a felony, having as one of its necessary elements a fraudulent act or an act of dishonesty in the solicitation of, acceptance, custody or payment of money or property, while the subdivision of the section last referred to authorizes the insurance commissioner to take possession of a company when it has failed to comply with the requirements for the issuance to it of a certificate of authority, or when its certificate has been revoked. Without question Mr. Pierce was an officer and director of Imperial Mutual and it cannot be questioned but what the offense charged in the indictment was one "having as one of its necessary elements a fraudulent act". That the offense charged was a felony must also be conceded. 18 U.S.C.A. § 541; State v. Fousek, 91 Mont. 448, 8 P.2d 791, 84 A.L.R. 303. True, a different rule is prescribed by our statute which classifies crimes after judgment as felonies or misdemeanors according to the penalty actually imposed. Penal Code, section 17. But that statute has application only to crimes under our State statutes and has nothing to do with crimes denounced by the Federal statutes. It is the law of the jurisdiction where the crime was committed that determines the character of the offense as a felony or a misdemeanor. State v. Fousek, supra. Assuming that a judgment and sentence pronounced following the entry of a plea of nolo contendere constitutes a "conviction", can such a "conviction" predicated as it is on a nolo contendere plea, be received in evidence as an admission of guilt in a collateral and subsequent civil proceeding? In reviewing the history of nolo contendere pleas, the authorities are harmonious in holding that such a plea, like a demurrer, admits for the purpose of the particular case, all the facts therein stated, but is not to be used as an admission elsewhere. Such a plea is an implied confession only of the offense charged. It is discretionary with the court to receive it or not. It is advantageous to a party because by it he is not estopped to plead not guilty to an action for the same facts, as he would not be permitted to do upon a plea of guilty. The existence in the law of the two pleas, i.e., guilty and nolo contendere, is indicative of the fact that there is some distinction or difference between them. Undoubtedly the plea of nolo contendere is often used as a substitute for a plea of guilty but it amounts only to a declaration by the defendant that he will not contend. It has been held not to be a confession of guilt. Barker v. Almy, 20 R.I. 367, 39 A. 185. It is uniformly held that such a plea cannot be used against the defendant as an admission in any civil suit for the same act. Manifestly, if a plea of nolo contendere has the same effect as a plea of guilty, viz., admitting the charge, then it differs in no respect from a plea of guilty. Buck v. Commonwealth, 107 Pa. 486, 489. Tucker v. United States, 7 Cir., 196 F. 260, 41 L.R.A.,N.S., 70, is authority for the statement that the plea of nolo contendere is in fact a confession on which a defendant may be sentenced in a particular prosecution, and as the plea is limited to that particular case, such conviction can not be used in another proceeding to discredit the witness; then in State v. Suick, 195 Wis. 175, 217 N.W. 743, 744, we find the following: "The plea of nolo contendere is an implied confession. Judgment of conviction follows such a plea as a matter of course, yet the plea itself contains no admissions which can be used against the defendant in another action." Strictly speaking, therefore, the plea of nolo contendere amounts only to an agreement on the part of the defendant that the fact charged may be considered as true for the purposes of the particular case wherein it is entered. 31 A.L.R. 278. A plea of nolo contendere, while an implied, is not a conclusive confession of guilt. By entering the plea the defendant does not confess or acknowledge the charge against him, as upon a plea of guilty. Doughty v. De Amoreel, 22 R.I. 158, 46 A. 838; State v. La Rose, 71 N.H. 435, 52 A. 943; White v. Creamer, 175 Mass. 567, 56 N.E. 832. We are therefore persuaded that the plea of nolo contendere did not constitute evidence that the officers of the insurance company herein who entered such a plea in the Federal Court had engaged in a fraudulent transaction and therefore the "conviction" based upon such a plea was inadmissible as an admission against such company officers in the instant proceeding. Appellant commissioner at the trial did not offer any evidence that the company officers in question had engaged in any fraudulent transactions but relied upon the erroneous theory that such officers' pleas of nolo contendere in the Federal Court amounted to a confession of guilt and consequent conviction that was binding upon them in subsequent proceedings including the instant case.

In a well considered and clearly reasoned opinion prepared by Honorable Emmet H. Wilson, Judge of the Superior Court of Los Angeles County, in case numbered 389,698, entitled S. B. Buchsbaum, Petitioner, v. Daugherty, Commissioner of Corporations of the State of California, Respondent, it was held that the corporation commissioner could not refuse to issue a permit because the applicant therefor had entered a nolo contendere plea in a Federal court criminal proceeding which charged a felony. The entry of a nolo contendere plea simply amounts to an arrangement or agreement between the defendant and the court that to save the government the expense of prosecuting the case and to save the defendant the cost and annoyance of defending it, he, the defendant, agrees, solely and alone and for the purpose of that case and for no other purpose, that the Federal court may assume that the defendant is guilty and assess a fine against him. The conviction thus obtained upon such a plea, by reason of the agreement underlying it, must in all good conscience, fairness and equity be held to be a conviction for the limited and agreed purposes of that proceeding, and to carry out the arrangement made with the court, and for no other purpose. The proffered evidence was therefore not admissible against the officers of the company in the case at bar and the rulings of the trial court thereon were correct and proper.

[19, 20] Finally, appellant insurance commissioner contends that the court erred in that part of what was denominated "an interlocutory judgment" wherein the court recited that it retained jurisdiction of the proceedings and continued the matter for a year and a day for the purpose of receiving further evidence or hearing additional motions. We find ourselves in accord with appellant's claim that such attempt by the court to retain jurisdiction over the matter is at entire variance with the statutory provisions, in direct conflict with the whole theory of such administrative proceedings and, therefore, void and ineffective. The challenged portion of the judgment is hereinbefore set forth and quoted in this opinion. This being a special proceeding the jurisdiction of the court is limited by the terms and conditions of the statute under which the proceeding is instituted. Smith v. Westerfield, 88 Cal. 374, 26 P. 206. There was but one question before the court and that was as to the right of appellant commissioner to operate respondent's insurance business, or whether the control and operation of such business should be withdrawn from the commissioner and restored to respondent. When by its judgment the court decided this issue in favor of respondent, it completely and effectively exhausted the court's jurisdiction. Upon the authority and for the reasons stated by us in Caminetti v. Imperial Mutual Life Insurance Co., 54 Cal.App.2d 514, 129 P.2d 432, which had to do with a motion to dismiss this appeal, the judgment herein must be modified by striking therefrom that portion by which the court sought to thereafter retain jurisdiction of the issues here involved.

For the foregoing reasons the judgment appealed from is modified by striking therefrom that portion last referred to and which is herein quoted, and as so modified the judgment is affirmed. Neither party to recover costs on appeal.

YORK, P. J., concurs.

DORAN, Justice (dissenting).

I dissent. I am not satisfied that section 4½ of Article VI is sufficiently comprehensive to redeem the judgment reached, as it was, under the possible and likely influence of a misunderstanding of the law in several vital particulars.

I am in entire accord with the arguments presented by appellant with regard to most of them and in particular with regard to the error of the trial court pertaining to the burden of proof. Equally vital, in my opinion, was the evident misunderstanding of the trial court as to the nature of the action. Obviously, in that connection, the action was confused with an action in equity where the court has and retains control of the receiver at all stages of the proceeding and where the court's judgment is paramount. What the outcome would have been in the absence of these two errors alone, to my mind, is impossible of determination.

It is my understanding of the law, when, from a review of the entire record, it is impossible to determine definitely what the result would have been in the absence of the errors under consideration, then section 4½ may not be applied to uphold the judgment. It has been so held in criminal cases. People v. Salaz, 66 Cal.App. 173, 225 P. 777; People v. Irby, 67 Cal.App. 520, 227 P. 920; People v. Sica, 76 Cal.App. 648, 245 P. 461. And there is no apparent reason for distinguishing between criminal and civil actions in such circumstances. Moreover, in civil actions involving juries it has been held repeatedly that instructions calculated to mislead the jury, and thereby affect their judgment and conclusion upon the issues, is prejudicial and reversible error. An erroneous viewpoint or a misunderstanding as to the law by the trial judge, calculated to mislead and thereby affect the judgment, likewise may result in a miscarriage of justice. Section 4½ is not a cure-all and in my opinion should not be applied to sustain a judgment in the circumstances presented by the record herein.

Chas. R. Thompson and Sherman & Sherman, all of Los Angeles, for respondents.

WHITE, Justice.

This action was instituted by plaintiff for declaratory relief (section 1060, Code of Civil Procedure) in connection with the interpretation placed by defendant insurance commissioner upon certain sections of the Insurance Code of this state insofar as such sections applied to the manner of doing business by plaintiff insurance company.

By its complaint and supplement thereto, plaintiff alleged that it has outstanding approximately 11,000 life contracts or policies, all of which were issued to and held by residents of the County of Los Angeles. That with the exception of approximately 790 policies, which were issued prior to October 26, 1936, when plaintiff became a mutual life and disability insurance company on the stipulated premium plan, with provision for assessments, under and by virtue of the provisions of Chapter 9, Part 2, Division 2 of the Insurance Code, as provided by sections 10739 to 10744 inclusive of said code, St.1935, pp. 666, 667, practically all plaintiff's outstanding policies are what are commonly known as "burial" policies, or "funeral service" policies, providing in substance that upon the death of the insured the plaintiff will procure and pay for a funeral, consisting of various designated services and items for a designated amount by a designated funeral director named in the policy. It was further alleged that of such outstanding "funeral service" policies, approximately 600 are single premium policies, that is, policies paid for by one premium at the time of issuance, and that approximately 9,500 are premium paying policies—that is policies paid for by periodic premiums from time to time during the lifetime of the assured, or for a designated number of years. Plaintiff further alleged that under the provisions of sections 10870 and 10875 of the Insurance Code, St.1935, pp. 676, 677, it had calculated its reserves in accordance therewith and in the regular, usual and acceptable way of calculating reserves on life contracts by all life insurance companies. It is then alleged that starting in 1937 plaintiff company annually furnished and filed with defendant insurance commissioner reports, duly and properly executed, showing in detail the modified reserve calculation, and also filed statements reflecting its condition and affairs. It is then alleged that about November, 1940, defendant commissioner for the first time "intimated to plaintiff that there might be a contention advanced by him that he would adopt another method of calculating modified reserves and another interpretation of section 10870 than that used by plaintiff". It is then further alleged that defendant commissioner did "on or about the 22nd of May, 1941, adopt the contention and still contends that plaintiff's said method under its interpretation of section 10870 is incorrect". Plaintiff's pleading then alleged "That there has arisen and continues to exist, an actual and bona fide dispute and controversy between plaintiff and defendant, with respect to the modified reserve and assessment provisions of plaintiff's outstanding "funeral service" policies and respecting the interpretation of sections 10870 and 10875 of the Insurance Code and respecting the proper method of calculating modified reserves on such business and respecting plaintiff's reserve liability on such business as hereinabove set forth and further, in that defendant contends that plaintiff cannot modify in any way the reserves on its said single premium policies, whereas plaintiff contends that while it has not done so in the past (it has carried full reserves thereon) it may, in accordance with said reserve provisions of such policies and section 10870, for the purpose of a test of solvency, modify reserves on such business, and further in that defendant contends that by applying his method and interpretation of section 10870, there is a deficiency in plaintiff's reserves and that therefore, plaintiff is insolvent and defendant can therefore seize and take over plaintiff, its business and assets, whereas plaintiff contends that there is no deficiency in its reserves and that on the contrary, it has a substantial surplus and is not insolvent, and that if it should be held that defendant's method of calculating modified reserves and his interpretation of section 10870 are correct and that also plaintiff cannot modify the reserves under its said single premium policies, defendant cannot seize and take over plaintiff, its business and assets, but that plaintiff is entitled, and should be given an opportunity, to collect 'additional premiums or assessments' from its policy holders for the purpose of repairing such deficiency, or charging same, if not paid, as a lien against the reserve on such policies, which would eliminate any such deficiency, as specifically provided for in such policies and by the provisions of section 10875 of the Insurance Code."

Plaintiff prayed for declaratory relief and a judgment establishing and decreeing:

"(a) The rights, duties and obligations of the parties respecting the reserves under the provisions of plaintiff's outstanding policies and Section 10870 of the Insurance Code;

"(b) That plaintiff's method of calculating modified reserves on its outstanding policies is correct and lawful under Section 10870 of the Insurance Code;

"(c) That plaintiff may continue to so calculate its modified reserves in such manner;

"(d) That plaintiff in so modifying its reserves in such manner need not reduce in any way its due and deferred premiums;

"(e) That plaintiff, if it so desires, may also modify the reserves on its outstanding single premium policies, in accordance with their provisions and Section 10870 of the Insurance Code;

"(f) That defendant's method of calculating modified reserves under plaintiff's outstanding policies is incorrect and unlawful;

"(g) That plaintiff does not have a deficiency in its reserves and is not insolvent, or if plaintiff does have a deficiency in such reserves,

"(h) That plaintiff has the right and be given sufficient time and opportunity to call for and collect additional premiums or assessments from its policyholders, or charge same to such reserves, to repair such deficiency, in accordance with the policy provisions and section 10875 of the Insurance Code."

Following the filing of defendant's answer, issue was joined and the cause proceeded to trial before the court sitting without a jury. This action, together with the proceeding instituted by the commissioner against defendant company, this day decided (139 P.2d 681), and the mandate proceeding filed by the insurance company against the commissioner, also this day decided (139 P.2d 693), was tried pursuant to stipulation upon the record made in the so-called "principal" proceeding entitled

After trial the court made findings in favor of plaintiff and entered judgment decreeing that in the conduct of its business the methods used by plaintiff complied with its policy provisions and with sections 10870, 10875, 10895 and 915 of the Insurance Code, St.1935, pp. 676, 677, 679, 532. From such judgment defendant insurance commissioner prosecutes this appeal.

[1-3] Appellant commissioner contends that the trial court was without jurisdiction to award declaratory relief to respondent for the reason that the latter did not exhaust its administrative remedies before seeking judicial intervention. In this claim, appellant must be sustained. The complaint and supplement thereto filed herein alleged "That defendant did, on or about the 22nd day of May, 1941, adopt the contentions and still contends that plaintiff's said method under its interpretation of section 10870 is incorrect * * *"; and that this ruling was in conflict with law. Assuming the truth of these allegations, respondent had the right to appeal to the Attorney General of California, as authorized by section 12923 of the Insurance Code St.1937, p. 2021. That section provides that when a controversy arises between the insurance commissioner and one affected by any order, ruling, decision or act of the commissioner, and is submitted to the Attorney General, the opinion of the latter in response to such submission shall govern and control the commissioner in respect to the matter so submitted. Courts are without power to interfere in the intermediate stages of an administrative proceeding. Abelleira v. District Court of Appeal, 17 Cal.2d 280, 291, 301, 109 P.2d 942, 132 A.L.R. 715. The power reposed in the courts by section 1060 of the Code of Civil Procedure to make a declaratory decree does not confer upon a court of equity authority, by such a decree, to stop or interfere with administrative proceedings, where it would not, under recognized and settled principles, have interfered with or stopped such administrative proceedings under its power to enjoin. Louis Eckert Brewing Co. v. Unemployment Reserves Commission, 47 Cal.App.2d 844, 848, 119 P.2d 227; Bradley Lumber Co. of Arkansas v. National Labor Relations Board, 5 Cir., 84 F.2d 97, 100. In Hoyt v. Board of Civil Service Commissioners of City of Los Angeles, 21 Cal.2d 399, 132 P.2d 804, it was specifically held that the statute authorizing suits for declaratory relief does not enlarge the jurisdiction of courts over parties and subject-matter. Manifestly, in the case at bar the administrative proceeding affecting respondent was not complete; the administrative remedies available to respondent were not exhausted, and the declaratory relief action with which we are here concerned was premature.

The judgment is reversed.

IMPERIAL MUT. LIFE INS. CO v. CAMINETTI, Insurance Commissioner.

Civ. 13646.

District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California.

June 29, 1943.

Rehearing Denied July 28, 1943.

Hearing Denied Aug. 26, 1943.

1. Mandamus 🔑10

Generally, an act, to be compelled by mandamus, must be one to performance of which petitioner is entitled when mandamus proceeding is instituted, but mandamus lies when it appears from an officer's or board's conduct or declarations that he or it does not intend to comply with obligation to renew a permit or license when time for such action arrives.

2. Mandamus 🔑176

A mutual life insurance company, filing petition on June 12, 1941, for writ of mandate, directing insurance commissioner to issue to petitioner certificates of authority to do business during fiscal years ending June 30, 1941, and June 30, 1942, was not restricted to suing for renewal of its certificate for balance of 1940-41 fiscal year and obligated to file another petition for ensuing year, in view of statutory rule that law does not require idle acts. St.1935, p. 512, §§ 700, 701; Civ.Code, § 3532.

3. Equity ⟹39(1)

Equity does not look with favor on piece-meal litigation and whenever possible will dispose of entire controversy between parties, grant complete relief, and settle all differences between parties in one action, leaving nothing for further litigation between them on same subject-matter.

4. Equity ⟹39(1)

Equity, having once acquired jurisdiction of subject-matter of action, will retain it, so that complete adjudication of all existing rights may be had and final determination of all matters in controversy accomplished.

5. Mandamus ⟹168(3)

In mandate proceeding to compel insurance commissioner to issue certificate of authority for petitioner to do business as mutual life insurance company, rejection of evidence that two of petitioner's officers and directors were convicted of felony in federal court prosecution, wherein they entered pleas of nolo contendere, because of commissioner's failure to plead such convictions, was not error, regardless of whether court abused its discretion in denying commissioner's motion for leave to file amended answer including such averment, as such evidence was inadmissible because of entry of such pleas. St. 1935, p. 512, §§ 700, 701.

6. Mandamus ⟹177

In mutual life insurance company's proceeding for writ of mandate to compel insurance commissioner to grant petitioner a renewal certificate of authority to do business in state, superior court's award of damages to petitioner against state for commissioner's interference with petitioner's business was erroneous, in view of evidence that any damage sustained was occasioned by commissioner's appointment as petitioner's conservator and decision to discontinue writing of new insurance, rather than by his refusal to issue renewal license. Code Civ.Proc. § 1095; St.1935, p. 512, §§ 700, 701; St.1937, p. 2563, § 1011.

WHITE, Justice.

This is an appeal from a judgment and the peremptory writ of mandate issued thereon. The proceeding was instituted by Imperial Mutual Life Insurance Company, a corporation (hereinafter referred to as petitioner), against A. Caminetti, Jr., Insurance Commissioner of the State of California (hereinafter referred to as the Commissioner), to compel the latter to issue to petitioner a certificate of authority or license to do business as an insurance company in this state. Insurance Code sections 700, 701, St.1935, p. 512.

By stipulation, this cause was tried upon the record made in the case of Caminetti v. Imperial Mutual Life Insurance Co. in which case we have this date filed an opinion (139 P.2d 681) and to which case reference is made for a comprehensive and detailed statement of the factual background surrounding this litigation. Following the trial, the court entered judgment directing the commissioner to issue to petitioner a renewal certificate of authority to transact business as an insurance company for the period ending July 1, 1942.

In addition to the facts recited in the case above referred to, it may aid the clarity of this opinion to here state that petitioner has been engaged in a mutual insurance business in this state since about 1927, from which date until 1941, such business was conducted pursuant to a certificate of authority originally issued by the commissioner and renewed each year thereafter until 1940. Section 701 of the Insurance Code provides that such a certificate shall expire on the first day of July after its issuance, unless sooner revoked.

The insurance commissioner did not issue the renewal of the license for the period July 1, 1940, to July 1, 1941, but by stipulation with petitioner did extend its certificate of authority from time to time, the last extension by stipulation expiring June 15, 1941. It was during the time covered by these stipulations that a controversy arose between petitioner and the commissioner with respect to the proper interpretation of certain statutes and petitioner's outstanding policy provisions with respect to the reserves it was required to maintain on such outstanding policies. This controversy gave rise to the litigation which forms the basis of Caminetti v. Imperial Mutual Life Insurance Co., Cal.App., 139 P.2d 681, this day decided. On June 6, 1941, petitioner, on a regular form supplied to it by the commissioner, made application for renewal of its certificate of authority for the period from July 1, 1941, to July 1, 1942, accompanying the said application with the regular fee required for the renewal of its license. The commissioner refused to further extend the company's certificate of authority after June 15, 1941, or to renew the certificate of authority for the period from July 1, 1941, to July 1, 1942. On June 13, 1941, petitioner filed in the superior court its "Petition for Writ of Mandate, Temporary Injunction and Other Relief". By such petition the petitioner sought a writ of mandate directing the commissioner to issue a renewal certificate of authority in the usual form, authorizing petitioner to do business for the period commencing July 1, 1940, to July 1, 1941, and from July 1, 1941, to July 1, 1942. When the matter came on for trial, the period ending June 30, 1941, had expired and the judgment therefore provided only for the issuance of a writ of mandate directing the commissioner to issue to petitioner a certificate of authority for the period July 1, 1941, to July 1, 1942. By the judgment it was further ordered that pursuant to the provisions of section 1095 of the Code of Civil Procedure, petitioner have and recover from the State of California the sum of $7,500 as compensation for damages found by the court to have been sustained by petitioner by reason of the refusal of the commissioner to issue a renewal of petitioner's certificate of authority to do business.

[1-4] For the first ground of appeal the commissioner contends that insofar as the writ of mandate applies to the fiscal year 1941–1942, the petition therefor was prematurely filed. Such petition was filed June 12, 1941, and prayed for a writ directing the issuance of certificates of authority for the fiscal years 1940–1941 and 1941–1942. As heretofore noted, when the cause came on for trial the first named fiscal year had expired and the judgment entered herein on March 7, 1942, directed the commissioner to issue a renewal certificate of authority "For the period ending January 1, 1942". Appellant Commissioner urges that by its petition filed June 12, 1941, respondent was restricted to sue for the renewal of its certificate for the balance of the fiscal year 1940–1941 or the remainder of such period from June 15th, when the stipulation between the parties expired, and June 30, 1941. It is true, as contended by the commissioner, that section 701 of the Insurance Code provides that every such certificate shall expire on the first day of July after its issuance, and it cannot be questioned that the general rule is that the act sought to be compelled by mandamus must be one to the performance of which the party is entitled at the time the proceeding in mandate is instituted (McGinnis v. Mayor and Common Council of City of San Jose, 153 Cal. 711, 715, 96 P. 367), but that rule is subject to a kindred rule that mandate may be resorted to when it appears from the conduct or declarations of the officer or board, that they do not intend to comply with their obligation to renew a permit or license when the time for such action arrives. In the instant case we are confronted with the fact that differences and disputes had arisen between the commissioner and respondent insurance company during the fiscal year 1940–1941 in connection with which the commissioner permitted the company to do business only by stipulations. When the stipulation ending June 15th was about to expire the commissioner indicated his intention not to extend the same. Upon the expiration of such stipulation, he seized the company under section 1011 of the Insurance Code, St.1937, p. 2563. Respondent company had made regular application for renewal of its certificate of authority for the period 1941–

1942, paid the fee therefor, and such renewal was refused. In fact, by his answer and return to the alternative writ the commissioner "Admits that respondent (commissioner) refused and still refuses to issue to petitioner a certificate of authority for the period commencing July 1, 1941, and terminating July 1, 1942". To insist in an equitable proceeding such as mandate is, and under the facts and circumstances here present, that petitioner should have been compelled to file a petition for renewal of its license for the few days between June 15th and June 30th, 1941, and then, subsequent to July 1st, file another petition for the ensuing fiscal year ending June 30, 1942, would do violence to the rule enunciated in section 3532 of the Civil Code, which reads "The law neither does nor requires idle acts." Equity will also consider the fact that there is no showing of prejudice to appellant commissioner by reason of the time when the action herein was filed. The court was concededly clothed with jurisdiction under the petition to deal with the remaining days of the 1940–1941 fiscal year, and at the time the cause came on for trial the last mentioned fiscal year had passed and the following fiscal year of 1941–1942 was more than half over. Equity does not look with favor upon litigation by piecemeal, and whenever possible will dispose of the entire controversy between the parties, will grant complete relief and whenever possible will settle and determine all differences between the parties in the one action, leaving nothing for further litigation between the same parties and upon the same subject-matter. Sonnicksen v. Sonnicksen, 45 Cal.App.2d 46, 52, 113 P.2d 495. Let us assume that on June 12, 1941, when the petition for a writ of mandate was filed, petitioner had no cause of action against the commissioner to compel a renewal of its license for the following fiscal year commencing July 1, 1941. This situation continued to exist until the last named date, but admittedly, at any time after July 1, 1941, petitioner might properly have brought an action in mandate affecting the fiscal year ending June 30, 1942. Therefore, under the familiar rule that equity once having acquired jurisdiction of the subject-matter of an action will retain it, to the end that a complete adjudication of all conflicting rights may be had and a final determination of all matters in controversy may be accomplished, the court was justified in retaining jurisdiction until all the issues in the action should be determined and all the differences between the parties arising thereunder were settled. Union Oil Co. v. Reconstruction Oil Co., 20 Cal.App.2d 170, 183, 66 P.2d 1215. By such procedure the court was enabled to do complete justice by deciding the whole case. "Equity regards that as done which ought to have been done." 10 Cal.Jur. 505; Civil Code § 3529.

[5] Appellant commissioner next complains of the action by the court in rejecting evidence showing that two of the officers and directors of the insurance company had been convicted of a felony in a Federal court prosecution wherein they entered pleas of nolo contendere. In the instant mandate proceeding the court grounded its ruling on the fact that the matter of such conviction was not set up in the pleadings filed by the commissioner. An oral motion for leave to file an amended answer including such an averment was denied by the court. It becomes unnecessary to pass upon appellant commissioner's claim that in denying such motion the court abused its discretion. In view of what was said by us in Imperial Mutual Life Insurance Co. v. Caminetti, 139 P.2d 691, this day decided, concerning the inadmissibility of such evidence because of the pleas of nolo contendere entered in the criminal proceeding in question, it follows that had the court permitted appellant to file the requested amendment to his answer, the conviction relied upon could not aid appellant, and would not have constituted grounds upon which he could legally predicate a denial of petitioner's application for a renewal of its certificate of authority to do business.

[6] Finally, appellant challenges the legality of that portion of the judgment by which the court, acting pursuant to section 1095 of the Code of Civil Procedure, awarded petitioner damages in the sum of $7,500 against the State of California. The court made extensive findings as to the damage allegedly sustained by petitioner due to the interference with its business by appellant commissioner. But as we read the record it seems clear to us that the damage, if any, sustained by petitioner was occasioned by the appointment, under section 1011 of the Insurance Code, of the commissioner as conservator, and by the latter's decision to discontinue the writing of new business. Imperial Mutual Life Insurance Co. v. Caminetti, supra. It is apparent to us from the record that assuming the commissioner had issued the certificate of authority and then had proceeded as he did to procure his appointent as conservator, then determined as he did, not to write further new business, the damages for which redress is sought herein would nevertheless have accrued. When he took over as conservator the commissioner was not required to issue to himself a certificate of authority had he concluded to continue the writing of new insurance business. In the light of the record before us it would therefore be highly speculative to say that the damage to petitioner was occasioned by the refusal to issue the renewal license rather than on account of the action of the commissioner in taking over the affairs of the company under the provisions of the insurance code. No causal connection was shown or proven between the damage claimed and the action of the commissioner which gave rise to the mandate proceeding with which we are here concerned.

For the foregoing reasons the judgment appealed from is modified by striking therefrom that portion thereof reading as follows: "It is further ordered, adjudged and decreed that petitioner herein, Imperial Mutual Life Insurance Company, have and recover of and from the State of California, damages in the sum of Seven Thousand Five Hundred Dollars ($7,500)." As so modified, the judgment is affirmed. Neither party to recover costs on appeal.

I concur in that part of the decision which modifies the judgment but dissent as to that portion which approves of the issuance of the writ.

CURTIS, Justice.

In an action entitled Acker v. Baldwin, 18 Cal.2d 341, 115 P.2d 455, pending in the Superior Court of the County of Los Angeles, plaintiff on April 17, 1942, recovered judgment against the defendants. Petitioner was one of the defendants in said action. Defendants, within the permissible time, served a notice of intention to move for a new trial. Subsequently said motion was made and the trial court at the hearing thereof on June 22, 1942, made an order vacating the findings and judgment and dismissed the action on the ground that it had no jurisdiction of the action. On July 7, 1942, there was entered a formal judgment of dismissal. Thereafter and on August 12, 1942, and after notice to defendants, plaintiff moved the court to set aside said order and judgment of dismissal on the ground that said order was void and in excess of the jurisdiction of said court. This motion was made under section 473 of the Code of Civil Procedure authorizing the court, on motion after notice to the other party to set aside any void judgment or order. On August 19, 1942, the trial court granted said motion and set aside and vacated both the order vacating the findings and judgment and the formal judgment of July 7, 1942, based upon said order. The effect of this order of August 19, 1942, if valid, would be to restore the original judgment rendered in that action in favor of the plaintiffs.

Thereupon the petitioner, as one of the defendants in said action, instituted this proceeding in certiorari to review the last mentioned order of the trial court of date, August 19, 1942. It is the contention of petitioner that the judgment of date, July 7, 1942, dismissing said action, was a valid and final judgment and that the trial court was without jurisdiction to vacate the final judgment.

Preliminary to the discussion of the merits of this controversy, it is necessary to consider and pass upon the point raised by respondents, that certiorari will not lie to review the order of August 19, 1942, for the reason that it is an order made after final judgment and therefore is appealable.

Section 1068, Code of Civil Procedure, provides that "A writ of review may be granted by any court, except a municipal, police or justice's court, when an inferior tribunal, board, or officer, exercising judicial functions, has exceeded the jurisdiction of such tribunal, board, or officer, and there is no appeal, nor, in the judgment of the court, any plain, speedy, and adequate remedy."

[1] We deem it unnecessary to do any more than cite a few of the decisions of this court holding "certiorari will not lie to review an appealable order or judgment either before or after the expiration of the time limited by law for appealing therefrom." Ivory v. Superior Court, 12 Cal. 2d 455, 459, 85 P.2d 894; Harth v. Ten Eyck, 12 Cal.2d 709, 87 P.2d 693; Id., 16 Cal.2d 829, 108 P.2d 675; Coan v. Superior Court, 14 Cal.2d 591, 95 P.2d 931, 932; Howaldt v. Superior Court, 18 Cal.2d 114, 114 P.2d 333; Bank of America v. Superior Court, 20 Cal.2d 697, 703, 128 P.2d 357; Lewith v. Rehmke, 215 Cal. 241, 9 P. 2d 297; Casner v. Superior Court, 23 Cal. App.2d 730, 74 P.2d 298. In the last named case at page 732 of 23 Cal.App.2d, at page 300 of 74 P.2d, we find the following statement of the law: "The order of the court vacating the judgment of dismissal was a special order made after final judgment, as were also the respective orders for judgment in defendants' favor, and, as such, were appealable under the provisions of section 963 of the Code of Civil Procedure. [Citing authorities.] Where the law allows an appeal from an order or judgment, even when the tribunal making such order or rendering such judgment exceeded its authority in so doing, a writ of review may not be granted. [Citing authorities.]"

As against these decisions, we are cited to the following cases decided by this court, which, it is claimed, support a contrary rule: Stanton v. Superior Court, 202 Cal. 478, 488, 261 P. 1001; Lankton v. Superior Court, 5 Cal.2d 694, 696, 55 P.2d 1170; Treat v. Superior Court, 7 Cal.2d 636, 638, 62 P.2d 147; Whitley v. Superior Court, 18 Cal.2d 75, 113 P.2d 449. In our opinion these cases can all be distinguished from the decisions holding that certiorari will not lie to review an appealable order.

In Stanton v. Superior Court, supra, the trial court in two actions pending before it made an order in each case purporting to vacate the judgment previously entered therein, and directed a different judgment, and signed and entered the same in lieu of the former judgment. On appeal the court recited the steps taken in the two actions before the trial court resulting in the orders vacating the original judgments and the entry of the different judgments in the place of the former judgments. The court also discussed the power of the trial court, and the procedure to be followed under sections 473, 663, and 663a of the Code of Civil Procedure, governing the vacation of judgments and the entry of different judgments in the same actions, and concluded as follows: (202 Cal. at page 489, 261 P. at page 1005) "We are therefore satisfied that said sections of the Code were never intended to apply to orders or judgments attempted after the fashion herein disclosed. We are also satisfied that neither of these orders or subsequent judgments can be said to be special orders made after final judgment within the meaning of section 963 of the Code of Civil Procedure, because such section contemplates orders given by a court having jurisdiction to act." The court, therefore, in the Stanton case held that as the orders in question were not special orders made after final judgment, they were not appealable and were therefore subject to review under proceedings in certiorari. Reference to this case may be found in Ivory v. Superior Court, supra, and Bank of America v. Superior Court, supra.

In Lankton v. Superior Court, supra, after the judgment in favor of the plaintiff had become final and the time for appeal and motion for new trial had elapsed, the trial court in a memorandum opinion indicated its purpose to reduce the amount of the judgment in favor of plaintiff in a material amount. Plaintiff applied either for a writ of prohibition or a writ of review. It was held that he was entitled to a writ of prohibition but not a writ of review, as no order modifying the judgment had been actually made by the trial court.

In Treat v. Superior Court, supra, the trial court set aside its findings and judgment in favor of plaintiff. It was held that the court was authorized to make such an order either under the provisions of section 662 of the Code of Civil Procedure, that is, upon a motion for a new trial, or by reason of its inherent power to correct mistakes in its proceedings, and to annul within a reasonable time orders and judgments prematurely, inadvertently, or improvidently made. However, it appeared from the record of the proceeding before the court, that the order of the trial court under attack was not made under the authority of either of these methods of procedure. While a notice of intention to move for a new trial was filed at the same time as the motion to vacate the findings and judgment, it is stated in the opinion: (7 Cal.2d at page 641, 62 P.2d at page 149)

"There is nothing before us to indicate that any action upon the motion for a new trial was ever taken by the trial court," and also (7 Cal.2d at page 640, 62 P.2d at page 149) "Respondent advances no claim or contention that the original findings and judgment were prematurely or improvidently made." The court in that case upon the authority of the Stanton case, held that the order was not one rendered in pursuance of any of the prescribed rules of procedure as defined by the sections of the Code of Civil Procedure and was therefore subject to attack in a proceeding for a writ of review.

[2, 3] In Whitley v. Superior Court, supra, it was sought to review two nunc pro tunc orders of the trial court granting a motion for a new trial. As amended in 1939, section 657 of the Code of Civil Procedure provided that when a new trial was granted on the ground of the insufficiency of the evidence, the order of the trial court shall so specify in writing and shall be filed with the clerk within ten days after the motion is granted, otherwise on appeal it will be conclusively presumed that the order was not based upon that ground. In the case in which these orders were made, the trial court granted the motion of defendant for a new trial, but failed to file any written order other than a minute order. After the ten day period, the plaintiff appealed. Almost two months later in one instance and almost three months in the other, the trial court apparently being of the opinion that the written minute order was insufficient as entered, signed and filed the two nunc pro tunc orders; the first of which stated that the ground upon which the order granting a new trial was made was the insufficiency of the evidence, and in the second of said orders, it was recited that the failure to file the written (signed) formal order within the ten day limit was due to the inadvertence of the court and not of counsel as had been stated in the prior signed order. After holding that the court was without jurisdiction to make either of said orders, and in reply to the contention that certiorari would not lie, the court on page 82 of 18 Cal.2d, on page 453 of 113 P.2d stated: "Finally, as an objection to a determination of the validity of these nunc pro tunc orders, respondent urges the point that a writ of review is not a proper proceeding in this case, as petitioner has her remedy by appeal. Respondent here calls attention to the general rule that certiorari may not be used as a substitute for appeal. 4 Cal.Jur. 1052. But it is likewise well recognized that an order which is not provided for in our procedure is not an appealable order within the meaning of section 1068, Code of Civil Procedure, and an application for a writ of review is the proper remedy. [Citing among others the Stanton and Treat cases.]" No claim was made in that case that either of the two nunc pro tunc orders was made under section 473 of the Code of Civil Procedure, and therefore that point was not passed upon by the court in its decision.

[4] In each of the four cases just discussed, there appeared some special reason why the general rule that certiorari will not lie to review an appealable order was not applicable. These cases can readily be distinguished from the instant proceeding. It will be noted that the underlying principle upon which the Stanton case was decided, and which was followed generally in the other cases, was that the order of the trial court under attack was not in pursuance of any of the prescribed methods of procedure as defined by the Code of Civil Procedure. As noted herein the order of August 19, 1942, setting aside the order and judgment of dismissal was rendered in pursuance of section 473 of the Code of Civil Procedure. It was, therefore, an order made after judgment and was appealable.

We are therefore of the opinion in view of the overwhelming weight of authority in this state, that the petition herein to review the order of the trial court of date, August 19, 1942, purporting to vacate its order dated July 7, 1942, should be denied. This conclusion renders it unnecessary to enter into any discussion of the question of the validity of said order of August 19, 1942, or of any other question raised by the petition.

The petition is denied for the reason hereinbefore stated.

TRAYNOR, Justice (concurring).

I concur in the judgment. It is settled that certiorari does not lie to review an appealable order. Cal.Code Civ.Proc., § 1068; see cases cited in 4 Cal.Jur. 1036 et seq. Section 963 of the Code of Civil Procedure lists among appealable orders, "any special order made after final judgment." Since the order of August 19, 1942, was a special order made after final judgment it was appealable and certiorari is therefore not available. The majority opinion takes the view, however, that the order in question was appealable not simply because it was a special order after final judgment but also because it was made pursuant to an established method of procedure, in this case, section 473 of the Code of Civil Procedure. It is my opinion that any special order after final judgment that affects the judgment (see 2 Cal.Jur. 153) is appealable whether or not it is made pursuant to a prescribed rule of procedure. The exception of orders that are not authorized by the Code of Civil Procedure was first read into section 963 in 1927 in the case of Stanton v. Superior Court, 202 Cal. 478, 261 P. 1001, in disregard of numerous cases of long standing. Livermore v. Campbell, 52 Cal. 75; In re Estate of Bullock, 75 Cal. 419, 17 P. 540; White v. Superior Court, 110 Cal. 54, 42 P. 471; Anglo-California Bank v. Superior Court, 153 Cal. 753, 96 P. 803; Hildebrand v. Superior Court, 173 Cal. 86, 159 P. 147; Magee v. Superior Court, 10 Cal.App. 154, 101 P. 532; for additional cases see 2 Cal.Jur. 184 and 4 Cal.Jur. 1036 et seq.

The holding in the Stanton case that section 963 "contemplates orders given by a court having jurisdiction to act" (202 Cal. 478, 489, 261 P. 1001, 1005) would apply as well to final judgments, for both final judgments and orders after such judgments are made appealable in the same terms. No condition that the court must have jurisdiction to act is set forth with respect to either, and there is no more justification for adding such a condition in the one case than in the other. The Stanton case and those based upon it have departed from established principles without adequate consideration of the authorities. These cases should be overruled and the law restored to its traditional pattern as described in White v. Superior Court, 110 Cal. 54, at page 57, 42 P. 471, at page 472: "The order in question is a special order, made after final judgment, and, as such, is made the subject of appeal by express terms of the statute (Code Civ. Proc., § 939, subd. 3; Id., § 963, subd. 2; Slavonic [etc.], Ass'n, v. Superior Court, 65 Cal. 500, 4 P. 500; Livermore v. Campbell, 52 Cal. 75; Calderwood v. Peyser, 42 Cal. 110); and, being so appealable, it cannot be reviewed by certiorari.

"Nor does it make any difference in this respect if the order be, as contended, in excess of the jurisdiction of the court making it, and consequently void. Void judgments and orders are not the less appealable by reason of that fact (Livermore v. Campbell, supra); and, when that remedy is afforded, it excludes the right to certiorari, notwithstanding the order be void in the extreme sense. People v. Shepard, 28 Cal. 115; Stoddard v. Superior Court [108 Cal. 303] 41 P. 278. 'It may be readily admitted,' says Mr. Justice McFarland, in delivering the opinion of the court in the case last cited, 'that the court had no jurisdiction to make the order; but, as the order is appealable, certiorari will not lie, because it lies only when "there is no appeal."'

"So far, then, as the remedy by certiorari is concerned, it would be wholly unprofitable to consider the question as to the jurisdiction of the respondent to make the order complained of."

PACIFIC LUMBER CO. v. INDUSTRIAL ACCIDENT COMMISSION et al.

S. F. 16801.

Supreme Court of California.

July 8, 1943.

Rehearing Denied Aug. 5, 1943.

1. Workmen's compensation 🔑252

A contract for sale of designated trees by lumber company to tie maker for cutting into logs and splitting thereof into ties, posts, etc., at price based on board measure content of suitable timber, as determined by representative of company, which retained rights to inspect work, demand that buyer utilize all suitable portions of each tree, assign contract, and prevent buyer from assigning it or his rights thereunder, gave company complete control over buyer, so as to justify Industrial Accident Commission's finding that buyer was company's "employee" within Workmen's Compensation Act.

See Words and Phrases, Permanent Edition, for all other definitions of "Employee".

2. Workmen's compensation ⟹1386

In workman's compensation proceeding, where it is contended that parties' written contract was not employment contract, oral evidence is admissible to show inception of agreement, parties' situation when contract was executed, and their practical construction of contract by their subsequent acts.

3. Workmen's compensation ⟹1446

In workman's compensation proceeding by one injured while cutting down tree under contract with lumber company, evidence held sufficient to warrant inference by Industrial Accident Commission that underlying purpose of contract was to have company's timber made into redwood split products by claimant for company's use, or sale to its customers, rather than to sell them to claimant for resale to third parties, and that parties contemplated that such products should become company's, not claimant's property, so that contract was one of employment of claimant by company.

4. Workmen's compensation ⟹1939

In proceeding to review Industrial Accident Commission's award of compensation to one injured while cutting tree under contract with lumber company, which contended that contract was not one of employment, but conditional sales agreement, Supreme Court is bound by Commission's finding on conflicting evidence as to claimant's receipts under contract and previous similar contracts between parties.

5. Workmen's compensation ⟹252

The fact that lumber company, before its employment of tie maker, claiming compensation for injuries sustained while cutting tree under contract with company, had operated under similar written contracts, was immaterial on question whether particular contract was one of employment or conditional sales agreement.

6. Workmen's compensation ⟹252

Whether lumber company changed its plan of operation from relation of employer and employee between it and tie maker to relation set forth in written contract between them for reasons other than to avoid benefits and privileges accorded employee by law was immaterial on question whether contract was one of employment, so as to entitle tie maker to compensation for injuries sustained, if status of employer and employee continued under new plan.

7. Contracts ⟹155

Where written contract between lumber company and tie maker, operating thereunder when injured while cutting down tree on company's land, was prepared entirely by company, it must be construed in tie maker's favor and against company in determining whether he was company's employee at time of injury.

8. Workmen's compensation ⟹52

The provisions of Labor Code must be liberally construed by court with purpose of extending their benefits for protection of persons injured in course of their employment. St.1937, p. 265, § 3202.

9. Workmen's compensation ⟹1939

Whether one claiming compensation from lumber company for injuries sustained was company's employee when injured was fact question for Industrial Accident Commission to determine.

10. Workmen's compensation ⟹1939

Courts are without power to disturb Industrial Accident Commission's findings, unless there is lack of substantial evidence supporting them, and are not concerned with conflicts in evidence, and where there is such evidence supporting Commission's findings and orders, reviewing court may not substitute its views for those of Commission and annul Commission's award.

11. Workmen's compensation ⟹1939

Where Industrial Accident Commission's findings are supported by inferences which may fairly be drawn from evidence, reviewing court will not disturb Commission's award, though evidence is susceptible of opposing inferences.

Proceeding by the Pacific Lumber Company to review an order of the Industrial Accident Commission awarding compensation to John Turkovich for personal injuries sustained in the course of his employment by petitioner.

Award affirmed.

CURTIS, Justice.

On June 21, 1941, while cutting timber on land belonging to petitioner, the Pacific Lumber Company, John Turkovich was struck by a falling tree and suffered a fracture of his leg. He filed a claim for compensation against the company before the Industrial Accident Commission. His claim was contested by the company on the ground that Turkovich was not in its employ at the time he received his injury. The commission found to the contrary, its finding being that "John Turkovich, while employed as a tie maker on June 21, 1941, at Redcrest, California, by Pacific Lumber Company, sustained injury arising out of and in the course of aforesaid employment when a tree fell upon him fracturing his right leg." Based upon this finding an award was made in favor of Turkovich. The sole question before us in this proceeding is whether there was any substantial evidence before the commission supporting this finding.

[1] At the time Turkovich sustained said injury he was working under a written contract between himself and the Pacific Lumber Company (referred to hereafter as the company). This written contract purported to be a conditional sales agreement, and it recited that the company agreed to sell and Turkovich agreed to buy certain designated trees for the purpose of cutting them up into logs and splitting the logs into ties, posts, shakes, stakes, etc., referred to in the written contract as "redwood split products." The price to be paid by Turkovich, the "Buyer," was determined "on the basis of board measure content of such timber suitable for manufacture by Buyer of such redwood split products." Such board measure and suitability were to be determined by a representative of the company and his decision was made conclusive upon both parties. This written contract was dated March 18, 1941, and provided that the "Seller hereby grants to Buyer a limited license of ingress into and egress from and occupancy of the portions of the real estate hereinabove described [being the land upon which the designated trees were standing] solely for the purpose of cutting said timber, so marked and designated, manufacturing or reducing the same into such redwood split products, storing such products and removing the same for sale and delivery elsewhere, * * * provided that this agreement is upon the condition that Buyer shall begin to cut or cause to be cut said timber so marked and designated on or before March 18, 1941, and shall have completed all of the cutting, reducing, manufacture, storage and removal of the resulting redwood split products herein referred to from the premises hereinabove described not later than June 30, 1941. * * *" Payment of purchase price of said timber was to be made on the 1st and 16th days of each month, or at such other times as may be mutually agreed upon.

Paragraphs 5 and 8 of the contract read as follows:

"5. Seller may at all reasonable times send inspectors on the premises in order to determine whether or not Buyer's operations are being conducted in a wasteful manner or are unnecessarily wasteful and destructive of the timber or the real property on which it is located. Buyer agrees to abstain from any practice which in the judgment of the Seller * * * is wasteful or destructive. For the purpose of preventing unnecessary waste Seller shall have the right to demand that all portions of each tree suitable for manufacture into split stock products be so utilized by Buyer.

"8. This agreement, or any right thereunder, may be assigned by the Seller but shall not be assignable by the Buyer without the consent of the Seller."

The company reserved the title and ownership of the timber and products manufactured therefrom until the purchase price was fully paid, with the proviso that Turkovich might have vested in him the title to such portions of said timber in lots of not less than 1,000 feet, board measure, upon payment of the purchase price. In case the Buyer failed to pay for the timber covered by the written contract, the company was given the right, among others, to sell the products manufactured therefrom to itself, at private sale without notice, and to hold Turkovich for the balance due, if any, of the purchase price after applying proceeds of said sale to payment of the purchase price.

If we construe the written contract without reference to any extrinsic considerations, we think it shows that the company retained control over Turkovich in many essential respects. The trees which were covered by the contract were designated and marked by the company, and Turkovich was required to convert them into "redwood split products." Turkovich had no part in their selection, nor did he have any right to the trees which he purported to buy except to use them for this one purpose. The company retained the right to determine "the board measure content" of such timber suitable for manufacture into split products, and its determination as to suitability and board measure was conclusive on both parties. The company retained the right to send inspectors on the premises to determine whether Turkovich's manner of operation was wasteful or destructive of the timber or of the real property on which the timber was standing. The company retained the right to demand that all portions of each tree suitable for manufacture into split stock products be utilized by Turkovich. The company also retained the right to assign the written contract and to prevent Turkovich from assigning it or any of his rights thereunder. Turkovich is the one who had the right to cut the trees but he could not assign that right, thereby showing that although the transaction purported to be a sale, it called for purely personal services on the part of Turkovich.

The company retained the title to the timber and all products manufactured therefrom until the purchase price thereof was paid. It also retained the right to restrict the sale of the manufactured products by Turkovich to lots of not less than 1,000 feet, board measure. The company retained possession and control over the manufactured products as security for the payment of any amount due from Turkovich, and the right in a summary manner to sell the same to itself without notice at private sale. After applying the proceeds of the sale—less expenses, including attorney's fees—to the amount due from Turkovich, the company retained the right to hold Turkovich personally for any balance due in case the proceeds of the sale were not sufficient to satisfy said indebtedness. While the company blandly states that Turkovich had full control over his work, we submit that a reading of the contract shows to the contrary. We might ask what independence Turkovich actually had under the contract. As we will later show, only a few trees were covered by any one contract and, when this contract was finished, a like contract would be given for additional trees. Any manifestation of independent action on Turkovich's part (such as for instance, selling ties to persons other than the company) would simply end his employment. The company would simply stop "selling" trees to him and he would be through. The practical effect of the contract was to give the company complete control over Turkovich.

[2] However, in a proceeding before the Industrial Accident Commission for an award for personal injuries, where it was contended that the written contract between the parties was not a contract of employment, oral evidence is admissible to show the inception of the agreement, the situation of the parties at the time of the execution of the contract, and the practical construction of the contract by the parties thereto in their subsequent acts. Carlson v. Industrial Acc. Comm., 213 Cal. 287, 2 P.2d 151; Luckie v. Diamond Coal Co., 41 Cal.App. 468, 183 P. 178. Pursuant to the above proposition of law, the Industrial Accident Commission at the hearing of the present matter received in evidence not only the written contract, but evidence of the parties as to their business relations, their situation at the time the written contract was executed, and the subsequent acts of the parties thereto in operating under said contract.

[3] The evidence shows that the company was the owner of certain timberland and was engaged, along with the general business of manufacturing and selling lumber, in the business of manufacturing redwood split products from timber belonging to it. This was a regular branch of its business, and it employed a number of tie makers for this purpose. It required all such split products for its own business, and in addition thereto it frequently had to buy such products from other parties in order to meet the demands of its trade. All such split products so produced by its employees were of course the property of the company and were subsequently sold by it to the trade.

There was but slight conflict in the evidence which showed that Turkovich was a tie maker by occupation and, as such, he was engaged in felling trees, cutting them into logs, and splitting the logs into ties and fence posts, referred to in the contract as "redwood split products." He had been so engaged with the company some four years prior to receiving his injury. At the beginning of his employment he was assigned a certain definite strip of land on which there were trees suitable to be manufactured into redwood split products. It was orally agreed between him and the company that he would convert these trees into ties and posts, and that he was to receive for his services a certain price per tie or post depending upon the size and measurement of the tie or post produced. He was admittedly an employee of the company under this oral agreement and was entitled to hospital service, social security benefits and workman's compensation. This form of employment continued until some time in 1940, when Mr. Skiffington, who had charge of the split products department of the company, came to Turkovich and told him that the company was going to adopt a new system under which the tie makers were to produce split products from the timber belonging to the company. Under this new system the tie makers were to operate under a written contract and were to be without hospital service, social security benefits and workmen's compensation. To quote the testimony of Mr. Skiffington, when asked what Turkovich said when he was asked to sign the contract, "Well, he didn't like it too well, but he signed the contract and went on to work." This statement in a way agrees with that of Turkovich, who, when asked what he said on that occasion, stated "Well, what can I say? I was against it, you know, but I got to do something. I got a family to support it, but I can't get no other work because I am old age." Turkovich signed three of such contracts, each providing for the conversion of a certain number of designated trees into ties and posts. The first was dated October 24, 1940, and second December 14, 1940, and the third March 18, 1941. It was while working under this third contract that he was injured on June 21, 1941.

Petitioner, the Pacific Lumber Company, concedes that prior to the adoption of the plan providing for a written contract, Turkovich was in its employ and entitled to workmen's compensation and other benefits now enjoyed by employees. Turkovich testified that after the adoption of the new plan and the signing by him of the first of the three written contracts, as stated above, and during the entire time he was working under said contracts, he carried on his work as he had while he was admittedly an employee. He cut the trees covered by his contracts and converted them into ties and posts, and left the ties and posts on the ground as he did while working as an employee, and the company sent its trucks and hauled them away as it did previously. He received practically the same pay for his services after as he did before he signed any written contract. Before he worked under the new plan, he was paid as an employee every two weeks, and the written contract called for a settlement on the 1st and 16th of each month. He worked the same hours both before and after the new plan was put into operation. He never paid any money on the so-called purchase price of the timber. The company took all ties and posts which he made from the company's trees, and he sold none of them to anyone. There is no evidence that the company ever agreed to pay him any stated amount for these ties and posts, or that he ever agreed to accept any price for the ties and posts which he had made. The company, so far as the records show, just assumed either that the ties and posts were its property or that under the terms of the contract between it and Turkovich it had bought the ties and posts from him. Mr. Skiffington testified that he paid Turkovich $15.50 per thousand board feet for ties of a certain length, but there is nothing in the record to show that he ever told Turkovich that he was to receive that amount, or that Turkovich ever knew what price he was receiving for "his" ties and posts. There are in evidence two checks from the company to Turkovich with certain notations thereon indicating that they were given for "Split Stock Purchases," but neither the amount of the stock "purchased" nor the price at which it was purchased is shown on either of these checks or on any other exhibit or testimony before the commission. He accepted the checks and, as they were practically the same in amount as those received by him before he started work under the written contracts, he asked no questions regarding them.

If we view this contract in the light of the situation of the parties at its inception, we have this situation. The company was in the business of converting its timber into ties and posts, and other redwood split products, and selling the finished products to the trade. Mr. Skiffington, in charge of the split products department of the company, so testified. He also testified that the company obtained its principal supply of such products from timber growing upon its own lands, but that the company frequently found it necessary, in order to meet the demands of the trade, to purchase such products from outside sources. It does not seem reasonable that the company, in entering into these contracts with its tie makers, ever intended that these products from its own timberlands would be sold by the tie makers to outside parties. Especially would this seem to be so when the supply from its own timber was insufficient to meet its own needs.

Reading the written contract in the light of this evidence, it would seem that the commission could reasonably have drawn the inference that the underlying purpose of said contract on the part of the company was to have its timber made into redwood split products for its own use, and for the purpose of meeting the demand of its trade, rather than to sell them to the tie makers, to be resold by the latter to third parties. Furthermore, we think that this was the construction placed on the contract by the acts of the parties subsequent to its execution. Turkovich testified that he worked the same after this new plan was adopted as before. He worked the same hours and received the same pay; that he cut and split the trees into ties and posts as he did when he was admittedly an employee, and that the company came with its trucks and hauled them away as it did before. The written contract under which he was working at the time of his injury required that Turkovich should begin to cut the timber so marked and designated on or before March 18, 1941, and should complete all of the cutting, reducing and manufacture, storage and removal of the resulting redwood split products therein referred to from the premises described in the contract not later than June 30, 1941.

The construction placed upon this provision of the contract is shown by the evidence just narrated. Turkovich removed none of the manufactured products from the company's premises. In fact it is doubtful whether he ever had a chance to do so, as by his testimony, which is undisputed, after he cut and split the trees into ties and posts, the company came with its trucks and hauled them away as it did when he was working as an admitted employee of the company. The company treated the ties and posts produced under the written contract as its own property in the same manner as it did those previously produced by Turkovich as its employee, and so did Turkovich. He never assumed ownership over them. He paid nothing on the contract. He made no attempt to sell them nor to dispose of them in any manner, nor did he object at any time to their being hauled away by the company as it had previously done.

These acts of the parties under the contract after its execution justified an inference on the part of the commission that the parties thereto did not regard the ties and posts after their manufacture as the property of Turkovich, for the reason that the company assumed control of them and treated them the same as when they were produced by Turkovich as an admitted employee of the company, and this was done with the consent and concurrence of Turkovich.

Therefore, whether we consider the situation of the parties at the time of their entry into the written contract or the construction placed on the contract by the subsequent acts of the parties, we find ample justification for holding that the parties contemplated that these products of the company's timber in the shape of so-called "redwood split products" were to become the property of the company when produced under the terms of the contract. The contract therefore, as construed by the situation of the parties at the time of its execution and by the subsequent acts of the parties, was nothing more nor less than a method employed by the company to have its timber converted into split products for its own use to be used in its own business, and that it never intended that Turkovich should own the products or have any right to sell them. In legal effect it was a contract of employment of Turkovich by the company.

[4] Before closing this opinion, we wish to call attention to some further points discussed in the briefs filed in the case.

The first of these concerns the compensation received by Turkovich while working under the written contracts. We have made the statement that Turkovich received practically the same compensation after he operated under the written contract as he did while working for the company as an admitted employee. Turkovich so testified. At the close of the hearing before the commission the referee asked for a statement from the company showing the amount received by Turkovich before and after the written contract was entered into. The company, in answer to the request, mailed to the commission a letter of date October 1, 1941. This letter purported to give the receipts of Turkovich for one year prior to the execution of the first of said contracts, which showed that he received only a little over $100 per month. The letter also purported to give his receipts for ten months during which he was working under the written contracts and it showed that his monthly receipts were over $190 per month. In this letter the receipts of Turkovich were given for the month of April, 1941, at $367.11 and for the month of May, 1941, at the sum of $403.88. The company also introduced in evidence during the hearing, its Exhibit 6, which contained two checks given to Turkovich by it for the two months of April and May, 1941. The check for the month of April contained a notation as follows:

"Split Stock Purchases $367.11
$180.75"

The check was for $180.75 only. A similar situation is shown on the check given for the month of May and is as follows:

"Split Stock Purchases $403.88

This check was only for said amount of $202.60. As we interpret the notations on these checks, the item "Split Stock Purchases," from the company's standpoint, represents the amount the company paid Turkovich for the split products produced by him for the respective months, and the item "Less Your Trade Ledger Account" represents the amount Turkovich owed the company under the conditional sales contract for the timber used by him in producing said products. If we are correct in this interpretation of the checks, then Turkovich for these two months received only about one-half the amount which the letter of October 1 purports to show he did receive. As to the remaining months during which Turkovich operated under written contracts, there is nothing in the record to show directly that they are incorrect, nor is there anything to show that they are correct, as the company only offered in evidence the two checks for the months of April and May. As the statement in the letter of October 1 is shown to be decidedly incorrect for these two months, we do not feel justified in giving it full credit in respect to amounts paid Turkovich for the remaining months. This letter of October 1 simply produces a conflict in the evidence as to Turkovich's receipts under the written contracts. The commission evidently accepted Turkovich's testimony upon that issue and we are bound by its finding.

[5-8] Some stress is laid by the company upon the fact that prior to the time Turkovich entered its employ as a tie maker, it had operated under written contracts similar to those employed by it and under which Turkovich was working at the time of his injury. We are unable to perceive how that fact can have any particular bearing upon its relations with Turkovich. It makes the further point that it changed its plan of operations from the relation of employer and employee to that set forth in the written contract for reasons other than to avoid the benefits and privileges that the law now accords to an employee. It undoubtedly had these latter in mind, as its representative informed Turkovich that under the newly adopted plan, the company would not be liable for either hospital privileges, social security or workmen's compensation. The reason for the change of plan is in no way controlling, for if, under the new plan the status of employer and employee still continued, the reason for adopting the written contract plan is not material. The written contract under which Turkovich was operating at the time of his injury was prepared entirely by the company, and, therefore, according to the well established rule of construction, is to be construed in favor of Turkovich and against the company. Laidlaw v. Marye, 133 Cal. 170, 65 P. 391. Furthermore, the provisions of the Labor Code are to be liberally construed by the courts with the purpose of extending their benefits for the protection of persons injured in the course of their employment. § 3202, Labor Code, St.1937, p. 265. See, also, Liptak v. Industrial Acc. Comm., 200 Cal. 39, 251 P. 635; Harris v. Industrial Acc. Comm., 204 Cal. 432, 268 P. 902; La Franchi v. Industrial Acc. Comm., 213 Cal. 675, 3 P.2d 305.

[9-11] The commission under the facts before it found that Turkovich was an employee of the company at the time of his injury, and that the injury sustained by him arose out of and in the course of his employment. Whether Turkovich was an employee or not was a question of fact for the determination of the commission. Schaller v. Industrial Acc. Comm., 11 Cal.2d 46, 51, 77 P.2d 836. In reviewing the findings of the commission, the courts are without power to disturb them unless there is a lack of substantial evidence. The courts are not concerned with conflicts. Associated Indem. Corp. v. Industrial Acc. Comm., 18 Cal.2d 40, 42, 112 P.2d 615. Where there is substantial evidence to support the findings and order of the commission, the reviewing court may not substitute its views for those of the commission and annul the award. Morris v. Industrial Acc. Comm., 40 Cal.App.2d 94, 104 P.2d 408. If the findings of the Industrial Accident Commission are supported by inferences which may fairly be drawn from evidence, even though the evidence is susceptible of opposing inferences, the reviewing court will not disturb the award. Schaller v. Industrial Acc. Comm., supra.

In view of these authorities as applied to the evidence before the commission, we are of the opinion that the commission was justified in finding that Turkovich was an employee of the company at the time of his injury. Accordingly, the award in his favor should be affirmed and it is so ordered.

SCHAUER, Justice (dissenting).

I dissent. I recognize the social desirability of reaching the conclusion declared in the majority opinion insofar as some of the ends to be thereby attained are concerned, but am, regretfully, unable to join the majority of the members of this court in their view of the factual record in such a quantity of its aspects as to make it impossible for me to reach their conclusion. It therefore becomes necessary for me to set out my own impression of a fair and accurate portrayal of the factual record as well as my conclusion of law.

The primary question involved in this proceeding is the sufficiency of the evidence to support the critical finding (or conclusion) of the commission that the applicant, Turkovich, at the time of his injury, was an "employee"; i. e., was "in the service" of petitioner. (See definitions of "employer" and "employee" as stated in section 3300(c) and 3351, respectively, of the Labor Code, St.1937, pp. 266, 267.) This primary question is to be considered in the light of another finding of the commission; viz., that "At the time of [the injury] * * * applicant was working for Pacific Lumber Company* under the terms of a 'Conditional Sales Agreement'." Also very definitely involved, in any realistic view of the case, is a question as to whether parties may make and be protected in the integrity of lawful contracts or whether the Industrial Accident Commission and this court shall examine a contract which the parties are found to have made, and being dissatisfied with its terms, although lawful and free from fraud and concealment, rewrite the contract to effect a substantial change in the relationship of the parties and enforce it as rewritten.

It appears without dispute that Turkovich received the injuries while working as a split products maker on June 21, 1941, at Redcrest, California, on timberland owned by petitioner; that the work consisted of felling trees, cutting them into logs and splitting the logs into ties, fence posts, etc., known as "split products"; and that approximately four and one-half years prior to the date the injuries were received Turkovich had been orally employed by petitioner, through the agency of its employee, one P. B. Skiffington, as a tie maker, had thereafter, during the period of employment, received his pay every two weeks on an agreed piecework basis, and incident to such employment had received social security and hospital benefits. This arrangement continued until the fall of 1940, at which time the same Mr. Skiffington, who was in charge of the split products department of petitioner company, informed Turkovich that the company was inaugurating a "new system," that Turkovich would thenceforth be "on his own," and that hospital and social security benefits would cease. Skiffington then presented and Turkovich thereupon signed a contract which purported to effect a conditional sale to Turkovich by the company of certain specified trees on the company's timberland, which Turkovich was to convert into split products. Thereafter the parties entered into at least three additional contracts, all identical with the first contract except for dates and trees sold. It was on trees covered by a contract dated March 18, 1941, that Turkovich was working at the time of his injury on June 21, 1941.

Although a written contract, unambiguous in terms, does not conclusively establish the relationship between the contracting parties in a proceeding before the Industrial Accident Commission wherein it is sought to show that the true relationship of such parties, contrary to that purportedly established by the contract, is that of employer and employee, it is nevertheless prima facie proof of the relationship it purports to establish and must prevail unless the circumstances under which it was made and the subsequent conduct of each party, known to and acquiesced in by the other, show that a different relationship existed at the time the injuries were received. (See Luckie v. Diamond Coal Co., (1919) 41 Cal.App. 468, 479, 183 P. 178; Carlson v. Industrial Acc. Comm., (1931) 213 Cal. 287, 290, 2 P.2d 151). Here the contract involved is unambiguous in its terms, and the commission found that the applicant was working under those terms. Under its terms Turkovich clearly was neither an employee nor an independent contractor; he was an independent operator. Such finding of the commission appears, then, on its face, to be determinative of this litigation. The commission, however, received in evidence not only the contract under which the parties were operating at the time of Turkovich's injury but also proof of the execution of previous contracts between them, proof of a prior employee-employer relationship, and proof of the circumstances under which the several contracts were executed and performed, and upon all of this evidence also found or concluded that Turkovich was an employee of petitioner at the time of the injury. Hence, it becomes proper to examine all of the evidence to ascertain whether the commission's conclusion as to the employee-employer relationship can be sustained, notwithstanding its express finding as to the contractual relationship.

The contract here involved provided, in material part, as follows:

"1. Seller hereby agrees to sell the redwood trees or strips or groups of redwood trees * * * designated * * * to Buyer at and for the price of Seven and 50/100 dollars ($7.50) per thousand board feet on the basis of board measure content of such timber suitable for manufacture by Buyer [Turkovich] of * * * redwood split products (the decision of Seller's [petitioner's] representative as to such suitability and measure to be conclusive on both parties hereto), and Seller hereby grants to Buyer a limited license of ingress into and egress from and occupancy of the portions of the real estate hereinabove described solely for the purpose of cutting said timber, so marked and designated, manufacturing or reducing the same into such redwood split products, storing such products * and removing the same for sale and delivery elsewhere * * *; provided that this agreement is upon the condition that Buyer shall begin to cut or cause to be cut said timber so marked and designated on or before * * * [specified date] and shall have completed all of the cutting, reducing, manufacture, storage and removal of the resulting redwood split products herein referred to from the premises hereinabove described not later than [specified date] * * *.

"2. All of the * * * operations herein provided for are to be at the sole cost and expense of Buyer and Seller is to be under no obligation to furnish any tools, appliances, facilities or materials necessary for any of said operations.

"3. Payment by Buyer to Seller of the purchase price of said * * * timber at the rate hereinabove specified shall be made as follows:

"On the 1st and 16th day of each month, or at such other times as mutually agreed upon between Buyer and Seller.

"4. Buyer agrees to take all necessary precautions for the prevention of fires, and to comply with all public laws and regulations relating to said real property and the work to be performed by him hereunder.

"5. Seller may at all reasonable times send inspectors on the premises in order to determine whether or not Buyer's operations are being conducted in a wasteful manner or are unnecessarily wasteful and destructive of the timber or the real property on which it is located. Buyer agrees to abstain from any practice which in the judgment of the Seller or its inspectors is wasteful or destructive. For the purpose of preventing unnecessary waste Seller shall have the right to demand that all portions of each tree suitable for manufacture into split stock products be so utilized by Buyer.

* Emphasis added.

"6. Buyer further agrees to indemnify and hold Seller harmless of and from all liability, cost, or expense of every kind or nature which Seller may suffer or incur on account of or in connection with any damage to property, or injuries to or death of persons which relate to or result from the carrying out of this agreement by Buyer.

"7. Buyer agrees to remove from the real property, leaving the same in as good condition as it was at the time he went upon it for the purpose of performing this agreement, reasonable wear and tear and the changes incident to the carrying out of this agreement excepted.

"8. This agreement, or any right thereunder, may be assigned by the Seller but shall not be assignable by the Buyer without the consent of the Seller.

"9. Title to and ownership of said * * * timber, * * * and of all of the products into which the same is converted by Buyer, shall remain * * * in Seller until the purchaser has fully paid the purchase price * * *; provided that Buyer shall have the right to have vested in him or his assigns the title to such portions of said timber in lots of not less than One Thousand (1000) feet, board measure, upon payment at the rate hereinabove specified of the purchase price thereof; and provided, further, that the entire purchase price for all of said * * * timber shall be paid by Buyer to Seller not later than said * * * [specified date], on or before which * * * Buyer must have completed all of his operations hereunder."

It further appears that although Turkovich was told by Skiffington that the trees designated in the contracts were his (Turkovich's) trees and he could sell the products thereof to whomever he wished, petitioner company actually purchased all of such products, paying Turkovich therefor by check at such times as he made delivery; that no deductions for unemployment insurance, social security, or hospital benefits were made from such checks; that Turkovich paid no money to petitioner for the trees "sold" to him under the contracts, but, instead, received from petitioner the difference between the price specified in the contracts and the price at which petitioner purchased the split products from him; that both before and under the contracts Turkovich furnished his own tools, and petitioner company came to get the split products at its own convenience, but, while the operations were under the contract system, as often as Turkovich announced that he was ready to make delivery of finished products.

Turkovich testified that he was fifty-nine years old; that he was against signing the contracts, but that he signed because of the difficulty of getting other work at his age; that Skiffington told him the company "got kind of new system, * * * kind of contract" and that there would be no more hospital or social security benefits. He further testified that he knew he had been protected by the Workmen's Compensation Law before the contracts and that nothing was said about workmen's compensation when Skiffington told him about the new system; that he did the same work under the contracts as he had done for the company before; that before the contracts he was not told what trees to cut, but under them he could cut only the designated trees, in the selection of which he participated with Skiffington and which were thereupon marked with his identification symbol; that he "never refused" a tree but cut it down and left it "if I can't make nothing out of it"; that before the contracts Skiffington told him what kind of stock or split product to make, but under the contracts he was not told "anything"; that both before and during the contracts Skiffington told him "where to work," his total hours of work were approximately the same, and he went to work when he felt like it and when the weather permitted; that before the contracts Skiffington had told him he should not work more than 40 hours a week, but after he signed the first contract he received no further instructions as to his hours of work; that nobody told him how to do his work because "I am old tie maker, nobody can tell me about that"; that he made about the same amount of money under the contracts as before he signed them.

A report of petitioner company, furnished at the request of the commission, showed that Turkovich's average earnings were $102.41 per month during his last year as petitioner's acknowledged employee, but that it had paid him, after deducting the price of trees he purchased, a net average of $193.65 per month under the contracts. This was his average monthly earning or profit derived from petitioner for the entire calendar period subsequent to termination of the original employee relationship despite two intervals between contracts when he apparently had no business connection with petitioner. The accuracy of this report was not challenged at the oral argument and should be accepted by us as true for what it purports to establish. The "Trade Ledger Account," referred to in the majority opinion, does not purport to show the conditional sale contracts accounts.

Derby Bendorf, an industrial engineer employed by petitioner company, testified that prior to March, 1937, the company considered its split stock workers to be independent contractors, made no hospital benefit deductions from their pay checks and gave them no "continuous service bonuses" such as were received by regular employees of the company; that in March, 1937, such workers were required to take the regular company physical examination and those who passed were taken on as employees and continued in that status for approximately three years, receiving hospital benefits and service bonuses; that because of the difficulty of checking on the working hours of the men in the woods in order to comply with the Federal Wages and Hours Act [officially designated as the Fair Labor Standards Act (U.S.C.A. tit. 29, ch. 8 § 201 et seq.) which became effective in 1938] the company decided in about April, 1940, to change over to "the selling of the timber to purchasers, who make the stock for themselves"; that thereafter the company "did away with the physical examination, and we did away with any hiring cards, and we discontinued the hospital deductions, and also the continuous service plan was abandoned; in other words, we abandoned all of the employee relationship"; that the company no longer kept records of the men's working hours; that the men were not instructed that they "were not to resell their products to anyone except Pacific Lumber Company"; that it was common for split products workers to sell their products to third parties; that he could (and he did) name one split products operator, working on petitioner's land, who sold his manufactured product to a buyer other than Pacific Lumber Company; that petitioner company purchased split products from workers not working on petitioner's own land (this fact was established by stipulation); that payment to the company by the purchasers of the timber was made "as it is cut out, on a depletion basis or on a finished product basis"; and that the only supervision exercised by the company over the workers on its land was to see that timber was not unnecessarily destroyed or wasted. None of the foregoing epitomized testimony was denied.

Patrick Skiffington, in charge of the split products department of petitioner company, testified that certain of the conditional sale contracts for timber were made by the company with individuals and others with partnerships; that the buyers were free to and occasionally did hire men to help them in the work, paying such men themselves; that after the contracts were entered into no effort was made to keep a record of the men's time; that Turkovich was given no instructions as to what kind of split products he should make, although from time to time he was informed that the company was in the market for some specified product and Turkovich would then manufacture it, and that Turkovich was free to make whatever his trees were suitable for; that before the contracts were signed the company occasionally "fired" certain of the split products workers, but that it had never attempted to terminate any of the work under any contract until the contract expired; that the men, including Turkovich, chose the trees they wished to work under the contracts; that before the contract system was inaugurated Skiffington assigned the men, including Turkovich, a strip of trees and they worked the whole strip rather than, as under the contracts, individual trees.

Charles R. Barnum, a real estate broker from the community in which Turkovich worked, testified that he was familiar with the practices of the local lumber companies in selling their timber to split products makers; that ordinarily a contract was entered into requiring only a small, if any, down payment to the company with the balance of the payments being made upon sale of the finished products; that it was customary for the company to see that the manufacturing was efficiently done so that "all possible can be got out"; that the price received by the company for its trees was in many cases "determined by footage received, if the claim is on a yield basis;" that usually the companies retained title to the finished product until they had received payment for the trees; that when the split products worker sold his products he would commonly direct that payment therefor be made to the seller of the trees, who would then deduct the price of the trees and remit the balance to the worker; that it was not usual in such cases for the company to secure workmen's compensation insurance on the buyer of the timber, or to specify or keep track of the buyer's hours of work; that he had been acquainted with this practice for the past 11 years and it had "been going on for a long time ahead of my time."

The commission found that: "1. John Turkovich, while employed as a tie maker on June 21, 1941, * * * by Pacific Lumber Company, sustained injury arising out of and in the course of aforesaid employment * * *.

"2. At the time of aforesaid injury, applicant was working for Pacific Lumber Company under the terms of a 'Conditional Sales Agreement.'* The terms of said 'Conditional Sales Agreement' are not sufficient to constitute applicant an independent operator or independent contractor at the time of said injury."

In Burlingham v. Gray, (Cal.Sup.1943), 137 P.2d 9, the rules for determining whether one rendering service to an employer is an employee or an independent contractor are assembled and authorities in support thereof are set forth. Such rules may be summarized as follows: An independent contractor is one who renders service in the course of an independent employment or occupation, following his employer's desires only in the results of the work, and not the means whereby it is to be accomplished, whereas the relationship of employer and employee exists whenever the employer retains the right to control or direct how the work shall be done as well as the result to be accomplished. One means of ascertaining whether or not the right to control exists is the determination of whether, if instructions were given, they would have to be obeyed. A strong factor tending to show the relationship of an employee is the employer's right to terminate the work at his pleasure. Neither the manner of payment nor the choosing by the employee of his own hours of work is conclusive of the relationship.

In determining that Turkovich was injured while "employed * * * by Pacific Lumber Company" I recognize that the commission was entitled to consider evidence showing "the inception of the agreement, the understanding of its purport by * * * the * * * parties concerned with it, and the practical construction thereof by such parties in their subsequent acts." (Carlson v. Industrial Acc. Comm., supra, (1931), 213 Cal. 287, 289, 290, 2 P.2d 151, 152; see S. A. Gerrard Co. v. Industrial Acc. Comm., (1941) 17 Cal.2d 411, 414, 110 P.2d 377.) For that reason it has been necessary to review the evidence in all its material entirety, as above set forth. It is also true that it is only where such evidence, coupled with reasonable inferences therefrom, offers no support to the findings of the commission that the award may be annulled. (Carlson v. Industrial Acc. Comm., supra; La Franchi v. Industrial Acc. Comm., (1931) 213 Cal. 675, 676, 3 P.2d 305; Murray v. Industrial Acc. Comm., (1932) 216 Cal. 340, 345, 14 P.2d 301; S. A. Gerrard Co. v. Industrial Acc. Comm., supra.) "Whether a workman is an employee within the Workmen's Compensation Act or an independent contractor [the same principle would apply to an independent operator] is a question of fact upon which the judgment of the Industrial Accident Commission is conclusive, where the facts are in dispute, and becomes a question of law only when but one inference can reasonably be drawn from the facts." (Roman Catholic Archbishop v. Industrial Acc. Comm., (1924) 194 Cal. 660, 667, 668, 230 P. 1, 4). But neither the Industrial Accident Commission nor this court may arbitrarily disregard undisputed evidence and only fair and reasonable inferences should be drawn.

I find no substantial conflict in the evidence in the record establishing the relationship between Turkovich and petitioner company. The established facts appear to me to require the conclusion that Turkovich was not "in the service" of the company as either an employee or an independent contractor, but was, instead, an independent operator. His hours of work were of his own choosing; he could employ such assistants as he wished; his products were purchased by petitioner company because he chose to sell to it as well as because it wished to buy them; he was paid for such products whenever he chose to make delivery of them; he was free to make such products as he wished and to dispose of them to whomever he pleased, subject only to the company's "right [under the contract] to demand that all portions of each tree suitable for manufacture into split stock products be so utilized," and provided that the company received the contract price for the trees sold. The only control or right to control retained by the company over Turkovich was the contract provision just quoted, and that control, even if Turkovich could be said to have been performing service for the company, would obviously relate only to the results of the work, and not to the means of its accomplishment. It would tend, therefore, to make him an independent contractor but not an employee. The reservation by the company (as security) of title to the trees sold, as well as the right to inspect the premises to protect itself from wasteful destruction of the timber, constituted no such control over Turkovich or his work as to render him its employee, but, as pointed out by petitioner, simply limited Turkovich's use of petitioner's own property.

Perhaps the most plausible argument that has been advanced in favor of respondent's finding is the suggestion that admittedly, immediately prior to the inauguration of the conditional-sale-contract system, Turkovich was an employee "in the service" of petitioner; that the service rendered consisted in his felling trees belonging to petitioner and in converting them into split products so that petitioner could market such products; that under the contract system the same result was accomplished and, hence, that he continued to render the same service. But the flaw in any pertinent syllogism which can be constructed out of such propositions is the fact that one can render service to another without necessarily being "in his service" as an employee. Under our constitutional system of government the freedom of contract, subject to reasonable regulation, is guaranteed. There was more than one lawful method by which petitioner could market its trees. It could sell the land with the trees standing, it could retain the land and employ men to fell its trees and convert them into lumber products for its own account, or it could sell the trees, standing or fallen, to another person to convert into lumber products for his account. In the open market it could bid for such products. The fact that in the competition for purchase of such products it might have had the advantage of some establishment or organization in proximity to the place of manufacture, fails to change the quiddities of the transaction. Upon the contract which the respondent commission specifically found that Turkovich and petitioner were operating under Turkovich was free to sell his products to whomever he wished. Hence, in manufacturing them he was acting in his own service and not in the service of petitioner. The fact that petitioner's interest also was served by the transaction is but incidental; it is not to be expected that in a free country an owner will sell his property (or a workman his services) unless his interest is thereby served.

There is nothing in the record which justifies the conclusion that the contract system was but a subterfuge to conceal an actual employee relationship. It is undisputed that that system was an old, established business procedure which had been in common usage in the district for many years. Upon the facts as reflected in this record, and the law as now constituted, we cannot consistently hold that petitioner and Turkovich were not free to make the contracts they made.

I hasten to emphasize that the freedom of contract is not absolute but is subject to laws protecting the weak against the strong (see Chicago, B. & Q. R. Co. v. McGuire, (1911) 219 U.S. 549, 567, 31 S.Ct. 259, 55 L.Ed. 328, 338; Max Factor & Co. v. Kunsman, (1936) 5 Cal.2d 446, 458–462, 55 P.2d 177; People v. McEntyre, (1938) 32 Cal.App.2d Supp. 752, 754, 755, 84 P.2d 560; State, etc., Bureau v. Pomona, etc., Ass'n, (1940), 37 Cal.App.2d Supp. 765, 770, 98 P.2d 829). Social progress may well demand that men engaged in independent operations of the type depicted here be protected by some adequate form of insurance, but the absence of or need for laws covering such situations does not give us authority to engraft onto the Labor Code a provision creating and placing on one person liability for the misfortune of another who is not his employee, even though the former was being benefited incidentally by the independent operations of the latter.

Upon the record here, even if we could properly hold that Turkovich was "in the service" of petitioner at the time of the injury, it should avail him nothing as, under heretofore recognized principles, he would be, at best, an independent contractor rendering "service for a specified recompense for a specified result, under the control of his principal* as to the result of his work only and not as to the means by which such result is accomplished." Labor Code, sec. 3353, St.1937, p. 267; see, also, for rules governing the determination of what constitutes an independent contractor, Burlingham v. Gray, supra, (1943) 137 P.2d 9. As an independent contractor he would not be entitled to workmen's compensation under the Labor Code.

* Emphasis added.

Respondent argues that the contract in this case is comparable to purported written "leases" involved in Carlson v. Industrial Acc. Comm., supra, (1931) 213 Cal. 287, 2 P.2d 151, and S. A. Gerrard Co. v. Industrial Acc. Comm., supra, (1941), 17 Cal.2d 411, 110 P.2d 377, in each of which this court affirmed the commission's award in favor of the claimed employee. In the Carlson case both the "lease" and the interpretation thereof by the parties demonstrated such an extensive right of control reserved in the "lessor" of ranch property over the work of the "lessee" as to establish an employment relationship. In the Gerrard case the "lease" itself was found to have given the "lessee" of farm lands (page 414 of 17 Cal.2d page 378 of 110 P.2d) "no right to do anything with the * * * crop, from planting to sale," without consent of the "lessor," and to have constituted the "lessee" an employee. Neither of those cases constitutes authority for affirmance of the award here.

Lastly, and as previously noted, the commission specifically found that "At the time of aforesaid injury applicant was working * * * under the terms of a 'Conditional Sales Agreement'." The terms of that agreement, as hereinabove set forth, are unambiguous and clearly create a relationship other than that of employee-employer. The conclusion of the commission with respect to that agreement, in the light of all the evidence above narrated, is not that it was a subterfuge or that it was procured by fraud or deceit. Neither does it find that such agreement failed to state the true contract of the parties. It merely concludes as a matter of law that "The terms of said '* * * Agreement' are not sufficient to constitute applicant an independent operator or independent contractor," and in the light of such conclusion of law on its part finds that applicant was an employee of petitioner. If we were to assume a jury trial, an instruction of the court that "The terms of said '* * * Agreement' are not sufficient to constitute applicant an independent operator or independent contractor," a special verdict that the parties were operating under the agreement, and a general verdict based implicitly on a finding that the employee-employer relationship existed, I think there should be no hesitancy in reversing the judgment. That is the case we have here.

The award should be annulled.

GUARANTEE INS. CO. LIMITED MUTUAL v. INDUSTRIAL ACCIDENT COMMISSION et al.

L. A. 18614.

July 14, 1943.

1. Workmen's compensation 🔑210

If mother had right to exercise control over son's employees by terms of oral agreement with son to have his employees haul certain pipe for mother, mother would be "special employer" of son's employees, regardless of whether she actually exercised the control, as respects whether mother's insurance carrier was liable for compensation for death of one of son's employees resulting from accident while hauling pipe.

See Words and Phrases, Permanent Edition, for all other definitions of "Special Employer".

2. Workmen's compensation 🔑237

Mere payment of wages is not sufficient to establish "employer and employee relationship", as regards workmen's compensation.

See Words and Phrases, Permanent Edition, for all other definitions of "Employer and Employee Relationship".

3. Workmen's compensation 🔑1432

Evidence supported finding that mother had right to exercise control over son's employees by terms of oral agreement with son to have his employees haul certain pipe for mother, so as to render mother "special employer" of son's employees as regards compensation for death of one of employees as result of accident while hauling pipe.

4. Workmen's compensation ⚷1939

Where there was sufficient evidence to support finding that mother was special employer of son's employees while they were hauling pipe for her under oral agreement with son, even if evidence was also subject to inference that son acted as independent contractor or as sole employer, Supreme Court could not say as matter of law that inference drawn by Industrial Accident Commission was incorrect.

5. Workmen's compensation ⚷1062

Where mother seeking workmen's compensation insurance for her son's business paid premium, and soliciting agent stated that son "was covered", and thereafter an accident happened to one of son's employees before insurance company had received application for policy, and insurance company promptly rejected application, insurance company was not liable for compensation to injured employee as son's insurance carrier.

Petition by Guarantee Insurance Company Limited Mutual to review an order of the Industrial Accident Commission awarding compensation for death to the dependents of Lowell Havener, which was opposed by Bessie Novak and another.

Award affirmed in part and annulled in part.

Prior opinion, 130 P.2d 436.

J. L. Kearney and Herbert S. McCartney, Jr., both of Los Angeles, for petitioner.

Everett A. Corten, of San Francisco, for respondents.

SHENK, Justice.

The petitioner, the Guarantee Insurance Company, seeks the annulment of an award of the Industrial Accident Commission holding it as the insurance carrier of Al Novak as general employer, and Mrs. Bessie Novak as special employer, of Lowell Havener, deceased.

Mrs. Bessie Novak and her son, Al Novak, were engaged in the junk business. Mrs. Novak's establishment, the Gate City Junk Company, was located at San Bernardino, while her son operated a similar but much smaller business, the Gate City Wrecking Company, in Ontario. Mrs. Novak heard of an auction in Sacramento and requested her son to attend it and buy pipe for her. This he did, paying part of the purchase price in cash furnished by his mother, and the remainder by a trade acceptance on which Mrs. Novak was obligor. Mr. Novak then telephoned his mother in San Bernardino to send her men after the material. She stated that she had no truck available at the time and requested him to send his own trucks. He objected to the use of his trucks on a haul of that length, as he did not then have workmen's compensation insurance. She replied that she had compensation insurance, saying, "I can take care of that from this end." In the same conversation Mrs. Novak asked Al why he did not have compensation insurance. He informed her that he was short of money, whereupon she assured him that she would lend him the necessary funds and that she would immediately call her insurance agent and request a policy covering his business. This she did on October 14, 1941, paying $195 on account of the premium to Mr. Carroll Strachota, the same agent who had procured the policy issued by the petitioner on Mrs. Novak's business.

Following the conversation with his mother, Mr. Novak called his manager, a Mr. Renek, in Ontario, asking him to send two men with a truck to transport the material purchased for his mother. The men were to take the material to Ontario where Mr. Renek would give further directions. Mr. Novak instructed Mr. Renek to keep time commencing when the men left until they returned so that it could be charged to his mother's business.

On October 16, 1941, while Mike Williams and Lowell Havener were hauling the pipe from Sacramento to Ontario, an accident occurred which resulted in the death of Lowell Havener.

Mr. Strachota, the insurance agent, wrote to the petitioner on October 17, 1941, requesting an insurance policy on Mr. Novak's business, to be dated back to October 14, the day on which he had received the premium. The company refused to write the policy and it has never been issued.

The petitioner attacks the finding of the Commission that Mrs. Novak was a special employer, contending that Mr. Novak was the sole employer of the deceased; and urges that there is no evidence to support the finding that petitioner is the insurance carrier of Mr. Novak since no policy had been issued prior to the accident.

The petitioner contends that the test in determining special employment is not met by the facts of this case. Mr. Campbell in his work on compensation (Workmen's Compensation, vol. 1, § 454) states: "The real test of what constitutes special employment lies in the character of the control and supervision exercised by the alleged special employer over the work and the employee engaged in its performance. It must appear, either by the terms of the contract or during the course of its performance, that the employee of the general employer came under the direction and control of the other party to the contract and suffered injury as the result of such direction and control. The right to or the actual exertion of control must exist. The alleged employer must be in control of the work so that he can at any time stop or continue it and determine the way in which it shall be done, not merely in reference to the result to be reached but as to the method of reaching the result."

[1] The petitioner insists that the evidence definitely establishes that the employees did not come under the direction or control of Mrs. Novak; that it does not appear that she was in control of the work nor that she could at any time stop or continue it or determine the manner in which it should be done; that her only interest was in the final result; that Mr. Novak retained the right of control and directly and through his manager exerted the physical control which identified him as the employer. It is true, as petitioner states, that all of the actual contacts with the employees were made by Mr. Novak, and that he attended to the details of getting the pipe loaded, and delivered instructions to the men. These facts, of course, are not inconsistent with the holding that he acted as general employer, but the petitioner urges that they are inconsistent with the holding of Mrs. Novak as special employer since they preclude the exercise of control or supervision on her part. It is noted that Mr. Campbell states that the right to control or the actual exertion of control must exist to constitute the relation of special employment. If Mrs. Novak had the right to exercise control by the terms of her agreement it would be immaterial whether she actually exercised the control. Press Pub. Co. v. Industrial Acc. Comm., 190 Cal. 114, 210 P. 820; Claremont C. Club v. Industrial Acc. Comm., 174 Cal. 395, 163 P. 209, L.R.A. 1918F, 177. Evidence of direction and control are often important factors in determining the factual question of what the understanding between the parties really was.

[2, 3] There was no written agreement between Mr. Novak and his mother. The terms of the agreement must be derived from their testimony before the commission. Their testimony, if believed, makes it clear that Mr. Novak had no interest in the transaction other than accommodating his mother. At some inconvenience to himself he made the trip to Sacramento, acted as her agent at the auction, and then consented that his truck and men be used for the procurement of the material purchased on her behalf. He satisfied himself that his mother was to pay the men. He instructed his manager that this transaction was to be charged against his mother's business. The petitioner contends that Mr. Novak in fact paid wages to Mike Williams and to Lowell Havener's widow after the accident, but there is no contradiction of Mr. Novak's testimony that the money he gave them was in the nature of advancements to tide them over until all claims had been settled. Mrs. Novak testified that she was to put their names on her payroll, but because of the accident she did not do so, suspending all activities pending the hearing before the commission. Petitioner lays some stress on the question of whose payroll was actually to carry the names of the employees, but that factor would not alone be determinative of the issue of special employment, as it has been held that mere payment of wages is not sufficient to establish the relation of employer and employee. Independence Indemnity Co. v. Industrial Acc. Comm., 203 Cal. 51, 262 P. 757. Petitioner points out that Mrs. Novak could not have interrupted or controlled the activities of the men after they had se out on their trip, and that they probably would not have recognized her authority had she been able to reach them. But neither could her son do so. See Drillon v. Industrial Acc. Comm., 1941, 17 Cal.2d 346, 110 P.2d 64. From the terms of the understanding the commission could justifiably conclude that the mother had the right to issue instructions concerning the details of the transaction.

[4] Whether the right to control this venture and to direct the manner in which it was to be carried out rested in Mrs. Novak or her son was a question of fact. The accounts of the transaction as related by Mr. Novak and his mother were essentially the same. We cannot say that there was no substantial evidence on this issue, nor was the commission bound to infer collusion from the fact that the witnesses were mother and son. On the contrary, there was abundant evidence from which the commission could infer that the elements of a special and general employer relationship were present, some of which were (1) a loaned employee situation, (2) a joint participation by the alleged general and special employers, (3) some power, not necessarily complete, of direction and control in each. Campbell, Workmen's Compensation, vol. 1, § 457. If the evidence before the commission was also subject to the inference that Mr. Novak acted as an independent contractor or as the sole employer, we are not permitted to say as a matter of law that the inference drawn by the commission is incorrect. George L. Eastman Co. v. Industrial Acc. Comm., 186 Cal. 587, 598, 200 P. 17; Western Pac. R. Co. v. Industrial Acc. Comm., 193 Cal. 413, 224 P. 754. We therefore find no error in the commission's conclusion that Mrs. Novak was the special employer and Mr. Novak the general employer of Lowell Havener.

[5] We come now to the question of whether Mr. Novak was insured by the petitioner at the time of the accident. Mrs. Novak testified that on October 14 she called Mr. Strachota and arranged for workmen's compensation insurance for her son's business. She paid to Mr. Strachota the same amount toward the premium as she was accustomed to pay for her own business. This agent had on previous occasions written insurance for Mr. Novak. Mr. Strachota admitted that he stated to Mrs. Novak on the day when the premium was paid that her son "was covered." The accident happened October 16, and on October 17 Mr. Strachota wrote to the petitioner requesting that a policy dated back to October 14, be issued to Al Novak. This the company refused to do. Mr. Strachota stated that he had not immediately forwarded the premium upon its receipt by him, as there was certain additional information to be procured from Mr. Novak before the application could be completed. It was not until after the accident that he secured this information. From all the evidence offered at the hearing, Mr. Strachota appeared to be merely a soliciting agent, in so far as workmen's compensation insurance was concerned. He solicited such business for several insurance companies, sending all requests for policies in to the companies, and delivering the policies when issued. He wrote no policies of this kind in his own office and had no authority to write them for the petitioner.

The evidence fails to support a finding that a contract of insurance was completed between Mrs. Novak and the petitioner on behalf of her son, and the company cannot be held as his insurance carrier unless there is evidence of estoppel. The soliciting agent did not submit the application for the policy until after the accident occurred. The application was promptly rejected by the company and it received no money on account thereof. There is no question of unreasonable delay on the part of the company. No evidence was produced to indicate that the company had done anything to hold Mr. Strachota out to the public as its agent with power to issue policies or otherwise bind the company. No element of estoppel is present. We must therefore conclude that the petitioner was not the insurance carrier of Al Novak at the time of the accident.

That part of the award is annulled which holds the petitioner as the insurance carrier of Al Novak. In other respects the award is affirmed.

CAMINETTI, Insurance Commissioner, v. PACIFIC MUT. LIFE INS. CO. OF CALIFORNIA et al.

L. A. 17678.

June 25, 1943.

Rehearing Denied July 22, 1943.

1. Statutes 🔑263

The rule that statutes are ordinarily construed to operate prospectively is based upon the presumed intent of the legislature, and has no application where the legislature manifests a contrary intent.

2. Insurance 🔑4

Quoted words of statute authorizing insurance commissioner to transfer to a trustee under a voting trust agreement the stock of an insurer "heretofore or hereafter issued" to him as a conservator under a rehabilitation agreement clearly indicate the legislature intended a retrospective operation. St.1937, p. 2565, § 1037(e).

3. Insurance ⚷44

The statute authorizing insurance commissioner to transfer stock to voting trustees specifically referred to stock issued to insurance commissioner as conservator or as liquidator in connection with the rehabilitation or reinsurance agreement, was applicable to stock of an insurance company organized as a medium for rehabilitation of a delinquent insurer. St.1937, p. 2565, § 1037(e).

4. Statutes ⚷181(1), 190

Intent of the legislature must be ascertained from language of the enactment, and where language is clear there can be no room for interpretation.

5. Appeal and error ⚷1056(1)

Where statute authorizing insurance commissioner to transfer stock to voting trustees specifically applied to stock of a new insurance company organized as a medium to rehabilitate old insurance company, exclusion of evidence that at time of enactment of statute insurance commissioner, who now desired retransfer of new insurance company's stock, held stock of other insurers to which the statute assertedly was intended to apply was not prejudicial. St.1937, p. 2565, § 1037(e).

Where there was nothing in rehabilitation agreement or court orders approving agreement to indicate that stock issued thereunder to insurance commissioner was issued to him in any capacity other than conservator or liquidator as contemplated under statute authorizing insurance commissioner to transfer stock issued to him as conservator or liquidator to voting trustees, commissioner held stock of new company in his capacity as conservator or liquidator and not as a special contractual trustee permitted to obtain retransfer of stock. St.1937, p. 2565, § 1037(e).

The insurance commissioner acts as an officer of the state in the public interest regardless of the fact that his duties as conservator are in the nature of those of a receiver or trustee.

8. Insurance ⚷44

Where under rehabilitation agreement, stock of new insurance company organized to rehabilitate old insurance company was issued to insurance commissioner who transferred stock to voting trustees but retained entire beneficial interest for benefit of creditors of old company and interested parties, and voting trust agreement gave only administrative duties relating to stock and recited that covenants therein contrary to rehabilitation agreement were void, the two agreements were not inconsistent so as to invalidate voting trust.

9. Contracts ⚷152

Words used in a certain sense in one part of an instrument are deemed to have been used in the same sense in another.

10. Insurance ⚷44

Under rehabilitation agreement providing for the issuance to insurance commissioner of stock in a new insurance company organized to rehabilitate old insurance company and providing that commissioner should not "dispose of" stock, transfer of stock to voting trustees did not "dispose of" stock within meaning of agreement so as to invalidate voting trust where commissioner reserved beneficial ownership of stock, voting trust could be terminated under agreement and commissioner retained supervisory powers given in rehabilitation agreement.

See Words and Phrases, Permanent Edition, for all other definitions of "Dispose Of".

Where voting trust created by insurance commissioner's transfer to voting trustees of stock of new insurance company organized to rehabilitate old insurance company was consistent with rehabilitation agreement, and court order approved rehabilitation agreement and prior actions of commissioner, and provided for enforcement of agreement without purporting to prohibit future changes in commissioner's title, voting trust was consistent with court order and hence valid.

Under rehabilitation agreement providing for issuance to insurance commissioner of stock in insurance company organized for rehabilitation purposes, transfer of stock to voting trust under statute providing therefor, was not invalid on ground that continued exercise of voting right by commissioner was substantive right of creditors acquired under court order approving rehabilitation agreement, where there was no attempt to alter substantive rights of parties, voting trustees were state agency, and neither rehabilitation agreement nor court order restricted power of legislature to transfer duties of commissioner to another state agency. St. 1937, p. 2565, § 1037(e).

13. Constitutional law ⚿106

There is no constitutional right to a particular form of remedy or to the enforcement of such remedy by a particular state official.

14. Insurance ⚿44

Where insurance commissioner serving as liquidator of delinquent insurer transferred stock of insurance company organized for rehabilitation purposes to board of trustees under statute providing therefor, board of trustees could properly serve as state agency although its members were private persons. St.1937, p. 2565, § 1037(e).

Where rehabilitation of delinquent insurer was of general public concern, and statute authorizing transfer by insurance commissioner to voting trust of stock of insurance company organized for rehabilitation purposes was reasonable means for promoting management continuity and policy uniformity in company, such statute did not violate constitutional inhibitions against impairment of contract and taking property without due process. St.1937, p. 2565, § 1037(e).

16. Constitutional law ⚿117

Contract and property rights must yield to legislation in the interest of the general welfare.

17. Insurance ⚿44

The power of the insurance commissioner with respect to statutory proceedings against insolvent or delinquent insurers is of general public concern, as affecting validity of legislation claimed to impair contract and property rights.

18. Constitutional law ⚿70(3)

With respect to statutory proceedings against insolvent or delinquent insurer, it is for the legislature to determine what the interests of the public require and what measures are necessary for their protection.

19. Constitutional law ⚿117

The state cannot abdicate or bargain away its police power even by express grant, and rights under a so-called public contract are subject to further exercise of the power to which they owe their existence.

Where rehabilitation agreement provided for the issuance to insurance commissioner of stock in new insurance company organized to rehabilitate old insurance company, statute authorizing transfer of stock to voting trustees, was not invalid as a legislative encroachment upon the powers of the judiciary. St.1937, p. 2565, § 1037(e).

21. Constitutional law ⚿152, 315

Generally, the judgment of a court may not be modified or altered by legislative action, because a judgment is a form of "contract" protected by the contract and due process clauses of the state and federal constitutions.

See Words and Phrases, Permanent Edition, for all other definitions of "Contract".

Statute authorizing a voting trust with respect to stock issued to insurance commissioner as conservator or liquidator was not an invalid delegation of legislative power for lack of standards by which commissioner was to be guided in determining when to set up voting trust. St.1937, p. 2565, § 1037(e).

Under statute authorizing a voting trust with respect to stock issued to insurance commissioner as conservator or liquidator, court approval was not required to enable commissioner to transfer to voting trust stock of new insurance company organized to rehabilitate old insurance company. St.1937, p. 2565, § 1037(e).

Requirement for permission of court to sell property with market value of over $1,000 in statute relating to insurance commissioner's authority as liquidator or conservator over property of insurance company did not apply to the creation of a voting trust under a separate provision of the statute which made no specific requirement for court approval, where under provision referring to voting trust, substantive rights of parties and corpus of trust were not disturbed. St.1937, p. 2565, § 1037(d, e).

Where stock of new insurance company organized to rehabilitate old insurance company was issued to insurance commissioner under rehabilitation agreement, and statute authorized commissioner to enter into rehabilitation agreement upon court order, transfer of stock to voting trust, not altering substantive right, did not constitute a new rehabilitation agreement for which court approval was required under statute. St.1935, p. 547, § 1043; St. 1937, p. 2565, § 1037(e).

26. Insurance ⚷44

Fact of ownership by insurance commissioner of policies in delinquent insurer did not disqualify commissioner from transferring stock of company organized for rehabilitation purposes to voting trust. Pol. Code, §§ 920, 922; St.1935, pp. 547, 773, §§ 1043, 12901; St.1941, p. 2935, § 12901.

27. Officers ⚷103

An officer, otherwise disqualified by personal interest, may still act, if his failure to act would necessarily result in a failure of justice.

28. Insurance ⚷44

Under rehabilitation agreement providing for issuance of stock of new insurance company to insurance commissioner, transfer of stock to voting trust and provision in voting trust agreement granting commissioner fees and expenses did not give commissioner personal interest in voting trust so as to invalidate trust where allowances to commissioner were expressly limited to his expenses. St.1937, p. 2565, § 1037(e).

29. Insurance ⚷44

Amendments of statutes relating to orders and authority of insurance commissioner as liquidator of delinquent insurer did not repeal authority of commissioner to hold title to property of delinquent insurer as liquidator, and did not terminate rehabilitation proceeding where statute relating to authority of commissioner in liquidation, after amendment, furnished sufficient statutory basis for exercise of commissioner's duty under court order as liquidator of delinquent insurer. St.1937, pp. 2564, 2565, §§ 1016, 1037; St.1935, p. 547, § 1043.

30. Statutes ⚷158

Repeals by implication are not favored in the law.

31. Insurance ⚷44

Under rehabilitation agreement providing for issuance to insurance commissioner of stock in new insurance company organized to rehabilitate old insurance company where issues raised in law action to compel retransfer of stock from voting trustees to insurance commissioner and in equity action with respect to voting trust were heard together with permission of complaining parties, error in determining the law action before completion of the equity case was deemed "waived".

GIBSON, Chief Justice.

In 1936, the business and assets of the Pacific Mutual Life Insurance Company of California (hereafter called the "old company") were taken over by the Insurance Commissioner of this state pursuant to statutory authority. Ins. Code, §§ 1011 and 1013, St.1935, pp. 540, 541. Thereafter, respondent Pacific Mutual Life Insurance Company (hereafter called the "new company") was organized as part of a plan of rehabilitation of the old company by the commissioner who purchased its entire capital stock with assets of the old company. Pursuant to section 1043 of the Insurance Code, St.1935, p. 547, a "Rehabilitation and Reinsurance" agreement was entered into between the new company and Samuel L. Carpenter, Jr., the then Insurance Commissioner, as conservator of the old company. The agreement contemplated a transfer to the new company of the assets of the old company (except certain claims against officers and directors of the old company) and the assumption by the former of the obligations of the latter, excluding what is known as "non-can" policies. The new company also assumed a limited obligation with respect to the non-can policies and agreed to set up a special fund for the restoration of benefits thereunder. The capital stock of the new company was to be held by the commissioner as conservator or liquidator for the benefit of the creditors, policyholders, and stockholders of the old company. On December 4, 1936, the agreement received court approval. The legality of the original seizure and the lawfulness of the plan of rehabilitation were upheld on appeal. Carpenter v. Pacific Mutual Life Ins. Co., 10 Cal.2d 307, 74 P.2d 761, affirmed in Neblett v. Carpenter, 305 U.S. 297, 59 S.Ct. 170, 83 L.Ed. 182. On February 2, 1937, an order was made providing for the liquidation of the old company and appointing the insurance commissioner as liquidator. The legality of this order was likewise upheld on appeal. Carpenter v. Pacific Mutual Life Ins. Co., 13 Cal.2d 306, 89 P.2d 637. The factual background of this prolonged litigation is set forth in the prior decisions and will be repeated here only insofar as is necessary to an understanding of the problems raised on the present appeals. Cf. Carpenter v. Pacific Mutual Life Ins. Co., 14 Cal.2d 704, 96 P.2d 796.

On April 4, 1938, the stock of the new company was transferred by the then commissioner by a voting trust agreement to five persons named as voting trustees. Commissioner Caminetti succeeded to the office in June, 1939, and in June, 1940, sought an order directing respondents to show cause why the voting trustees should not be directed to retransfer the stock to him upon the ground that the voting trust was invalid. Prior thereto, and in December, 1939, a motion had been noticed upon similar grounds by William H. Neblett and others. On May 8, 1940, the superior court denied both applications. Appeals were taken from these orders of denial and are presented upon a single bill of exceptions. Certain contentions are made which are common to all appellants. Other contentions are made by Neblett et al. in which the commissioner does not join. For purposes of clarity they will be grouped under separate headings.

A. Contentions common to all appellants.

Appellants advance three main contentions in support of their claim that the voting trust is invalid. It is urged (1) that section 1037 (e) of the Insurance Code, St. 1937, p. 2565, relied upon by respondents as authority for the creation of the voting trust, is inapplicable to the stock of the new company; (2) that the section is unconstitutional if construed to authorize the voting trust; and (3) that court approval, not obtained in the present case, is required under the code for the creation of a voting trust.

(1) Applicability of section 1037 (e).

Section 1037 (e), enacted in 1937, provides: "Upon taking possession of the property and business of any person in any proceeding under this article, the commissioner, exclusively and except as otherwise expressly provided by this article, either as conservator or liquidator: * * * (e) Shall have authority to transfer to a trustee or trustees, under a voting trust agreement, the stock of an insurer heretofore or hereafter issued to him as conservator or as liquidator in connection with a rehabilitation or reinsurance agreement, or any other proceeding under this article. Such voting trust agreement shall confer upon the trustee or trustees the right to vote or otherwise represent such stock, and shall not be irrevocable for a period of more than twenty-one (21) years." Appellants contend that this section must be construed to operate prospectively to the exclusion of the stock of the new company which had been issued prior to its enactment, and further that the section was not intended to apply to stock of an insurer organized, as was the new company, as a medium through which rehabilitation of the business of a delinquent insurance company was to be accomplished.

[1, 2] The rule that statutes are ordinarily construed to operate prospectively is based upon the presumed intent of the Legislature. Jones v. Union Oil Co., 218 Cal. 775, 25 P.2d 5; Krause v. Rarity, 210 Cal. 644, 293 P. 62, 77 A.L.R. 1327; Anderson v. Ott, 127 Cal.App. 122, 15 P.2d 526; Addiss v. Selig, 264 N.Y. 274, 190 N.E. 490, 92 A.L.R. 1384. It has no application where the Legislature manifests a contrary intent. McCann v. Jordan, 218 Cal. 577, 24 P.2d 457; Krause v. Rarity, supra; Addiss v. Selig, supra; In re Bond & Mortgage Guarantee Co., 157 Misc. 240, 283 N.Y.S. 623. Section 1037(e) expressly includes "stock of an insurer heretofore or hereafter issued" to the commissioner. Its language is unambiguous and clearly indicates the Legislature intended a retrospective operation. Cf. Addiss v. Selig, supra; Westervelt v. Gregg, 12 N.Y. 202, 62 Am.Dec. 160.

[3, 4] To adopt the contention that section 1037 (e) was not intended to apply to stock of an insurance company organized as a medium through which rehabilitation of the business of a delinquent insurer was to be accomplished would require us to disregard the clear language of the statute. Section 1037 (e) specifically refers to stock issued to the commissioner "as conservator or as liquidator in connection with a rehabilitation or reinsurance agreement." The intent of the Legislature must be ascertained from the language of the enactment and where, as here, the language is clear, there can be no room for interpretation. First Congregational Church v. County of Los Angeles, 9 Cal.2d 591, 594, 71 P.2d 1106; Riley v. Robbins, 1 Cal.2d 285, 287, 34 P.2d 715; People v. Stanley, 193 Cal. 428, 431, 225 P. 1.

[5] In view of our conclusion that the statute applies here, no prejudice could have resulted from the rejection of evidence offered by the commissioner to show that at the time of its enactment he held stock of other insurers to which the statute assertedly was intended to apply.

[6, 7] Section 1037 (e) authorizes a voting trust with respect to stock issued to the commissioner as "conservator or as liquidator." It has been suggested that the stock of the new company was issued to the commissioner not as "conservator or liquidator" but as a special contractual trustee. There is nothing in the rehabilitation agreement or court orders to indicate that this stock was issued to the commissioner in any capacity other than that of conservator or liquidator as contemplated by the section. The rehabilitation agreement refers only to stock held by the commissioner as "conservator or liquidator", and paragraph 25 provides that he is bound by the provisions of the agreement "only in his capacity as * * * Conservator or Liquidator of the Old Company." The court order of December 4, 1936, approving the agreement provides that the commissioner "as conservator * * * or * * * liquidator" is authorized to carry out its covenants. On appeal from that order, this court stated: "The plan * * * provides that the commissioner, either as conservator or liquidator, shall continue to hold all of the stock of the new company * * *." Carpenter v. Pacific Mutual Life Ins. Co., 10 Cal.2d 307, at page 322; 74 P.2d 761, at page 771. Finally, the order for liquidation of February 2, 1937, provides: "That title to all property and assets of respondent corporation * * * together with all right, title, and interest of said Commissioner as Conservator in said stock of [the new company] shall remain and be vested in said Commissioner * * * as liquidator of [the old company]." (Italics added.) It necessarily follows that the commissioner held the stock of the new company in his capacity as conservator or liquidator and not as a special contractual trustee. It has been held that the commissioner acts "as an officer of the state * * * in the public interest" regardless of the fact that his "duties * * * as conservator are in the nature of those of a receiver or trustee." Anderson v. Great Republic Life Ins. Co., 41 Cal.App.2d 181, 188, 106 P.2d 75, 79. See, also, Insurance Code, §§ 1057, 1059, St.1935, p. 552; Mitchell v. Taylor, 3 Cal.2d 217, 43 P.2d 803; Carpenter v. Pacific Mutual Life Ins. Co., 10 Cal.2d 307, 330, 335, 338, 340, 74 P.2d 761; Garris v. Carpenter, 33 Cal.App.2d 649, 654-656, 92 P.2d 688; cf. (2) Constitutionality of section 1037 (e).

[8] It is next contended that section 1037 (e) as here construed is unconstitutional as a legislative impairment of contract obligations, as a taking of property without due process, as a legislative encroachment upon the powers of the judiciary, and as an unlawful delegation of legislative power. This follows, it is argued, because the voting trust assertedly violates the terms of the rehabilitation agreement and the orders of the superior court approving the same and providing for the liquidation of the old company. The contention that contract and property rights are impaired requires a consideration of the terms of the rehabilitation agreement and court orders, the rights thereunder, and the effect of the voting trust agreement thereon.

The rehabilitation agreement provides that the stock of the new company, which already had been organized as the corporate agent of the commissioner, shall continue to be held by the commissioner as conservator. Carpenter v. Pacific Mutual Life Ins. Co., 10 Cal.2d 307, 321, 325, 74 P.2d 761. The assets of the old company were to be transferred to the new company and, in return, the new company was to assume the obligations of the old company except with respect to the non-can policies. The new company also assumed a limited obligation with respect to such non-can policies and agreed to set up a special fund for the restoration of full benefits under those policies. Paragraph 20 of the agreement, entitled "Mutualization and Disposition of Stock of New Company," relates to the ultimate status and ownership of the new company. It provides that neither the conservator nor liquidator shall "dispose of" the stock of the new company except as follows:

Subdivision (a) authorizes the commissioner to dispose of the stock in accordance with any plan of mutualization thereafter adopted by the policyholders of the new company, and such a disposition may include a transfer to voting trustees if the plan of mutualization so provides. Subdivision (b) authorizes merger, consolidation, reorganization or reinsurance. Subdivision (c) gives the old company the option to pay the full amount needed to restore benefits under the non-can policies and authorizes the commissioner in that event to distribute the stock upon court order. Subdivision (d) authorizes the commissioner to sell the stock upon court order if, at any time, he determines that such a sale is required for the protection of the estate in liquidation. Subdivision (e) states that "It is the purpose, spirit, and intent of this agreement that, unless the provisions for mutualization are eliminated pursuant to the provisions of subparagraph (b) of this paragraph 20, the stock of the New Company shall not be sold or disposed of prior to the full restoration of benefits under Non-Can Policies except by proceedings for mutualization, so long as a reasonable probability of completing restoration of benefits under Non-Can Policies shall continue. * * *" Subdivision (f) contains the usual severability clause.

The affairs of the new company are placed in charge of a board of directors to whom the agreement expressly confides a large measure of discretion. Supervisory powers, however, are reserved to the commissioner, independent of and in addition to his statutory powers over delinquent insurance companies. For example, no investment or reinvestment of the assets of the old company may be made without written approval of the commissioner. Payments to the restoration fund for non-can policies are subject to the approval of the commissioner who, in addition, may require further payments thereto. The determination by the board of directors of the apportionment of expenses and the exchange of assets among the several departments of the new company is subject to adjustment by the commissioner. Reserves against policies of the old company subject to assumption of reinsurance under the agreement were to be established by the new company with the approval of and in accordance with the requirements of the commissioner. While as holder of the stock the commissioner possessed the voting rights incident thereto, the agreement contains no express provision with respect to the exercise of the voting power.

The voting trust, on the other hand, is a contract between the commissioner as conservator or liquidator and named trustees. It recites that "it is one of the primary purposes of this agreement to assure the full accomplishment of all of the intents and purposes of the Rehabilitation Agreement in accordance with its terms. The parties hereto therefore declare that no provision of this agreement is to be construed in any manner which would result in a violation of any of the terms, agreements, or provisions of said Rehabilitation Agreement; and if any covenant or agreement provided *herein * * * should be contrary to any express provision of said Rehabilitation Agreement, or contrary to the policy of said Rehabilitation Agreement * * * then such covenant or covenants, agreement or agreements, shall be null and void, and shall be deemed separable from the remaining portions hereof. * * " [Italics added.]

The trustees are given legal title to the stock of the new company with the power to exercise all the rights of ownership. The commissioner, however, retains the entire beneficial interest for the benefit of creditors of the old company and others interested. The voting trust undertakes to transfer to the trustees only administrative duties relating to the stock, principally the right to vote the same. The trust is made irrevocable for a period of slightly less than twenty-one years, except that it may be terminated sooner in accordance with the provisions of paragraph 20 of the rehabilitation agreement. Moreover, it must be conceded that the Legislature may terminate the trust at an earlier date.

The two agreements are not inconsistent, as contended by appellants, but on the contrary the voting trust agreement, as declared therein, is intended to and does supplement and facilitate the carrying out of the provisions of the rehabilitation agreement. The intent of the parties is apparent from that portion of the voting trust agreement, quoted above, which declares that if any of its covenants are contrary to the rehabilitation agreement such covenants "shall be null and void."

[9] Appellants contend that the restriction against disposal in paragraph 20 of the rehabilitation agreement precludes the creation of a voting trust. This provision, they argue, gave the policyholders a right to have the commissioner administer the new company, by means of the power to vote its stock. Neither the language nor the purpose of the restriction supports the interpretation. Paragraph 20 relates only to the ultimate status and ownership of the new company including possible mutualization and full restoration of benefits to non-can policies. It does not pertain to the administration of the new company or the supervisory powers of the commissioner which are fully set forth in other paragraphs. As indicated in subdivision (e) of paragraph 20, the purpose of the restriction is to prevent such a sale or disposition of the stock as would permit the transferees to prematurely cut off the rights of the policyholders either to mutualization or to full restoration of benefits under the non-can policies.

The words "dispose of," as used in the paragraph, are directed at any complete alienation of the stock, but do not prohibit transfer of the management of the company by means of transfer of the voting rights of the stock pending rehabilitation. The quoted phrase is used in this sense elsewhere in the agreement (paragraphs 1, 19 (e), 20 (a)).

Words used in a certain sense in one part of an instrument are deemed to have been used in the same sense in another. Pringle v. Wilson, 156 Cal. 313, 319, 104 P. 316, 24 L.R.A.,N.S., 1090; 6 Cal.Jur. 286. It is true that the words "dispose of" are used in subdivision (a) of paragraph 20 in connection with an authorization to the commissioner to transfer the stock of the new company to voting trustees in accordance with a plan of mutualization. But it is clear that under that subdivision the transfer there provided for would require a complete alienation of the stock in order to carry out the plan of mutualization contemplated therein.

[10] The voting trust agreement is not a disposal of the stock within the meaning or purpose of paragraph 20 of the rehabilitation agreement. Although the trust agreement transfers to the trustees the legal title to the stock, it expressly reserves to the commissioner "the entire beneficial interest in such stock." The commissioner therefore retains for the benefit of the stockholders and creditors of the old company the same substantial interest he theretofore possessed as statutory trustee. As said in Smith v. Bramwell, 146 Or. 611, 31 P.2d 647, 648, 649: "Notwithstanding plaintiff had transferred the legal title to his stock to the trustees, he still was the beneficial owner of the same. The trustees had no interest in the stock other than to vote it in keeping with the purpose of the trust agreement. * * * He still, to all intents and purposes, is a stockholder except that he has no personal right to vote his stock." To the same effect, see Application of Bacon, 287 N.Y. 1, 38 N.E.2d 105, 107; In re Morse, 247 N.Y. 290, 160 N.E. 374, 379; State Tax Com'r v. Com'rs of Baltimore Co., 138 Md. 668, 114 A. 717, 721. The reservation of the beneficial ownership of the stock, coupled with the fact that the voting trust may be terminated in accordance with paragraph 20 of the rehabilitation agreement and the further fact that the commissioner retained the supervisory powers given elsewhere in the rehabilitation agreement, is a complete answer to the contention that the commissioner by creating the voting trust had transferred "all that he had."

[11] Nor do we find any inconsistency between the voting trust and the court orders. The order of December 4, 1936, does no more than approve the rehabilitation agreement and the prior actions of the commissioner and provide for its enforcement. If the voting trust is consistent with the rehabilitation agreement, it is equally consistent with the court order. The voting trust does not interfere with the jurisdiction retained by the court over the commissioner. And, as stated in the order, the commissioner was authorized to do whatever was deemed reasonably necessary to effectuate the agreement "either with or without further order of this court." The order for liquidation of February 2, 1937, provides "that title to all property and assets of respondent corporation [the old company] now vested in said Commissioner as said conservator, together with all right, title and interest of said Commissioner as said conservator in said stock of Pacific Mutual Life Insurance Company [the new company], shall remain and be vested in said Commissioner, and his successor in office, as liquidator. * * *" This provision was "obviously * * * inserted in the liquidation order * * * in order to provide that the alteration in the commissioner's duties in carrying on the business of the old company as conservator, to winding it up as liquidator, should not divest nor disturb his titles." Carpenter v. Pacific Mutual Life Ins. Co., 13 Cal.2d 306, 312, 313, 89 P.2d 637, 641. It does not purport to prohibit future changes in the commissioner's title.

[12, 13] The commissioner prior to the creation of the voting trust exercised the voting rights incident to stock ownership. It is contended, in effect, that continued exercise of this power by the commissioner is necessary to safeguard the interests of the creditors and is a substantive right acquired under the court order approving the rehabilitation agreement. The power conferred upon the commissioner to create a voting trust does not authorize him to alter or modify the substantive rights of the parties as set forth in any plan of rehabilitation and no such attempt was made in this case. Rather, it permits a transfer of the administrative duty of voting the stock from one state instrumentality to another. There is no constitutional right to a particular form of remedy or to the enforcement of such remedy by a particular state official. Neblett v. Carpenter, 305 U.S. 297, 305, 59 S.Ct. 170, 83 L.Ed. 182; Gibbes v. Zimmerman, 290 U.S. 326, 54 S.Ct. 140, 78 L.Ed. 342; cf. In re Westchester T. & T. Co., 268 N.Y. 432, 198 N.E. 19. Neither the rehabilitation agreement nor the court orders undertake to restrict the power of the Legislature to transfer the duties of the commissioner to another state instrumentality, and it may well be that any attempt to do so would be improper.

[14] The board of voting trustees created under section 1037(e) may, in our opinion, properly serve as a state agency or instrumentality, although its members are private persons. Similar devices are familiar to the law. For example, the directors of a corporation in the course of dissolution were at one time, by statute, made trustees to wind up its affairs—their powers were derived from the statute alone and court appointment was unnecessary. Rossi v. Caire, 174 Cal. 74, 80, 81, 161 P. 1161; Clark v. Millsap, 197 Cal. 765, 242 P. 918; 6A Cal.Jur. 1490–1493. A privately owned corporation, together with a voting trust, was held a proper instrumentality of the United States for administration of German chemical patents. United States v. Chemical Foundation, 272 U.S. 1, 18, 19, 47 S.Ct. 1, 71 L.Ed. 131. National banks are federal instrumentalities though they are privately owned and controlled. Davis v. Elmira Savings Bank, 161 U.S. 275, 283, 16 S.Ct. 502, 40 L.Ed. 700; First Nat. Bk. v. California, 262 U.S. 366, 368, 43 S.Ct. 602, 67 L.Ed. 1030; cf. McCulloch v. Maryland, 1819, 4 Wheat. 316, 4 L.Ed. 579; 12 U.S.C.A. §§ 24, 51 et seq., 71. The members of the Board of Regents of the University of California are not public officers. Lundy v. Delmas, 104 Cal. 655, 658–660, 38 P. 445, 26 L.R.A. 651. A new bank has been substituted for the state superintendent of banking in the rehabilitation of an insolvent bank. Doty v. Love, 295 U.S. 64, 55 S.Ct. 558, 79 L.Ed. 1303, 96 A.L.R. 1438. And in this proceeding a new corporation was created as the corporate agent of the commissioner in rehabilitating the old company. Carpenter v. Mutual Life Ins. Co., 10 Cal.2d 307, 321, 322, 324, 325, 74 P.2d 761; Neblett v. Car-

The decision of the New York trial court in In re Bond & Mortgage Guarantee Co., 157 Misc. 240, 283 N.Y.S. 623, cited by appellants, is not authority for the contention that section 1037(e) is not a proper exercise of the police power. The case is factually distinguishable. There the Bond & Mortgage Guarantee Company [the old company] had guaranteed mortgage certificates issued by the Title Guarantee & Trust Company and the Bond Company also had a contract to service the mortgages. The Bond Company subsequently was rehabilitated under the Schackno Act, McK. Unconsol.Laws, § 4871 et seq. (similar to Calif. Ins. Code, § 1043). The superintendent of insurance organized the Bond & Mortgage Corporation [the new company] and received its capital stock as rehabilitator of the old company. Pursuant to the court order a servicing contract was entered into between the new company and the Title Company. Subsequently the Legislature enacted the Mortgage Commission Act which purported to authorize the Mortgage Commission to take over from the superintendent certain assets of companies under rehabilitation, including servicing contracts. Holders of mortgage certificates sought to enjoin the Mortgage Commission from taking over the mortgages and the servicing contracts. The court held that the Legislature had no power to take from the new company assets that had been given to it pursuant to contract and approved by the court. Without considering the propriety of the holding in that case, we find it inapplicable here. It would be in point only if the Legislature in the present case had purported to take from the new company assets given to it under the rehabilitation plan.

[19] It is urged that while a private contract fixing private rights is subject to a proper exercise of the police power, a different rule obtains where, as here, the contract was imposed upon the parties in the first instance by the state acting in the interests of the general welfare. We know of no authority holding that in such a situation the state may not thereafter legislate on the same subject. On the contrary, the state cannot abdicate or bargain away its police power even by express grant (Atlantic Coast Line R. R. Co. v. Goldsboro, 232 U.S. 548, 558, 34 S.Ct. 364, 58 L.Ed. 721), and rights under a so-called "public" contract are subject to further exercise of the power to which they owe their existence.

[20, 21] The contention is made that section 1037(e) as here construed results in legislative encroachment upon the powers of the judiciary. This conclusion is based upon the premise that the Legislature's authorization of a voting trust sanctions a modification of the orders approving the rehabilitation agreement and providing for liquidation in which orders the court directed that title to the stock should remain and be vested in the commissioner. As shown above, the voting trust agreement is not inconsistent with those orders. Assuming an inconsistency, however, no encroachment upon judicial power resulted. Ordinarily the judgment of a court may not be modified or altered by legislative action. (Lincoln v. Alexander, 52 Cal. 482, 28 Am. Rep. 639; State v. Wildes, 34 Nev. 94, 116 P. 595; Gilman v. Tucker, 128 N.Y. 190, 28 N.E. 1040, 13 L.R.A. 304, 26 Am.St.Rep. 464), because a judgment is a form of contract protected by the contract and due process clauses of the state and federal Constitutions. Hodges v. Snyder, 261 U.S. 600, 43 S.Ct. 435, 67 L.Ed. 819; Mooney v. Drainage Dist. No. 1, 134 Neb. 192, 278 N.W. 368; In re Bond & Mortgage Guarantee Corp., 157 Misc. 240, 283 N.Y.S. 623. A further reason has been advanced to the effect that such legislation is an infringement upon the functions of the judicial branch of the government. See Lincoln v. Alexander, supra; Mooney v. Drainage Dist. No. 1, supra. Thus, in State v. Wildes, supra, where the Nevada court had assumed jurisdiction in equity to appoint a receiver and conduct the liquidation of a bank, it was held that the Legislature could not by statute transfer that liquidation proceeding into the hands of the state bank examiner. The decision, however, is not controlling here. This proceeding is wholly statutory. The duties imposed upon the commissioner, and the supervision over him vested in the courts, result from the statute. Responsibility for devising procedures of rehabilitation or liquidation rests with the Legislature and the fact that a particular procedure has been approved with respect to a specific plan of rehabilitation does not foreclose further legislative action with respect to procedural matters. In the case of In re Westchester Title & Trust Co., 268 N.Y. 432, 198 N.E. 19, the court denied that infringement of judicial power resulted where the Legislature passed a statute transferring the functions of a court-appointed financing agent to a Mortgage Commission following the insolvency of the former. The court there said (268 N.Y. at page 441, 198 N.E. at page 22): "The Legislature could provide a new method for the administration of these mortgage investments for the benefit of those interested in such investments without invasion of the equity powers of the Supreme Court over trusts." Cf. Estate of Barreiro, 125 Cal.App. 153, 13 P.2d 1017. Nor is the present situation altered because the superior court in its order of December 4 specifically retained jurisdiction over the proceeding. Jurisdiction was not expressly retained for the purpose of controlling or supervising the voting of the stock. The court had jurisdiction to correct any fraud or abuse in the exercise of the voting power by the commissioner. It possesses the same jurisdiction over the voting trustees (1 Restatement of the Law of Trusts, § 187) and the statute has not therefore curtailed the judicial function.

[22] It is also asserted that as here construed section 1037(e) constitutes an invalid delegation of legislative power because there are no standards by which the commissioner is to be guided in determining when to set up voting trusts. The commissioner is given wide discretion and broad powers in the use of voting trusts in rehabilitation proceedings. The guide for the exercise of those powers appears in the concluding provision of section 1037 which authorizes him to do that "which he may deem necessary or expedient for the accomplishment or in aid of the purpose of such proceedings." This is the standard considered controlling by the Legislature and is sufficient under the decisions as against this challenge to the statute's constitutionality. Cf. Gaylord v. City of Pasadena, 175 Cal. 433, 439, 166 P. 348; People v. Globe Grain & Mill. Co., 211 Cal. 121, 124, 294 P. 3; Jersey Maid Milk Products Co. v. Brock, 13 Cal.2d 620, 642, 91 P.2d 577. As said in United States v. Chemical Foundation, 272 U.S. 1, 12, 47 S.Ct. 1, 5, 71 L.Ed. 131, "It [is] not necessary for [the Legislature] to ascertain the facts of or to deal with each case. The act went as far as was reasonably practicable under the circumstances existing." It is peculiarly within the province of the commissioner to know the facts and to determine when a voting trust is expedient or necessary to effectively carry out a plan of rehabilitation.

(3) Court approval.

[23-25] Appellants contend that the voting trust is invalid because court approval thereof was not secured. Section 1037(e), however, contains no requirement for court approval. The absence of such requirement indicates that none was intended. This is suggested by the opening paragraph of the section which grants authority to "the commissioner, exclusively and except as otherwise expressly provided." It is also suggested by the fact that subdivision (d) of section 1037 as well as sections 1035, 1036, 1041, and 1043 St. 1935, pp. 545, 547, expressly require court approval of certain acts of the commissioner. By the subsequent enactment of section 1037(e) without such requirement it must be concluded that the omission was intended. Appellants insist, however, that the creation of a voting trust in this case came within the meaning of sections 1037 (d) and 1043 and therefore required the court approval contemplated by those sections. This contention would compel us to read such requirement into section 1037(e). Section 1037(d) authorizes the commissioner to sell, transfer or dispose of real or personal property of any person whose property and business has been taken over provided that, if the transaction involves property the market value of which is over $1,000, permission of court must be obtained. This requirement has no application to the creation of a voting trust under a separate provision of the statute which makes no specific requirement for court approval. A clear distinction exists between a disposal of assets under section 1037(d) and a transfer of voting power to a board of trustees (another state instrumentality) under section 1037(e) in which the substantive rights of the parties and the corpus of the trust are not disturbed. Section 1043 authorizes the commissioner to enter into rehabilitation agreements upon court order. Appellants contend that the voting trust was a modification of the rehabilitation agreement and was, in effect, a new and different plan of rehabilitation requiring court approval. As stated above, the voting trust does not alter or modify the provisions of the rehabilitation agreement. Even if it does, however, the modification concerns only administrative duties connected with the stock of the new company and does not alter substantive rights in any way. It follows that the voting trust does not constitute a new rehabilitation agreement for which court approval is required under section 1043.

B. Contentions of Neblett, et al.

We now turn to a consideration of the contentions of Neblett and others in which the commissioner does not join.

[26-27] The Neblett motion urged that the voting trust was invalid because it constituted a contract in which Commissioner Carpenter was interested personally through ownership of policies of insurance in the old company, later converted into policies in the new company. Political Code, section 920, provides: "Members of the legislature, state, county, city, and township officers, must not be interested in any contract made by them in their official capacity * * *." Contracts made by a public officer in his official capacity may be avoided at the instance of any party except the interested officer where the officer has any direct or indirect interest therein. Political Code § 922; Moody v. Shuffleton, 203 Cal. 100, 262 P. 1095; Berka v. Woodward, 125 Cal. 119, 57 P. 777, 45 L.R.A. 420, 73 Am.St.Rep. 31. The sole question in the present case is whether section 920 precluded the commissioner from making contracts relating to Pacific Mutual, for it must be conceded that persons may hold the office of commissioner although they own policies in companies subject to the act. (Prior to 1941 section 12901 of the Insurance Code, St.1935, p. 773, provided "An officer, agent, or employee of an insurer is not eligible to the office of commissioner," but it did not render anyone ineligible because of ownership of policies, and in 1941 the section was clarified to specifically permit such ownership, St.1941, p. 2935.) The Legislature has directed that certain provisions of the Insurance Code, including the sections authorizing voting trusts and rehabilitation agreements, are to be carried into effect by the commissioner. If the commissioner were disqualified to act with respect to delinquent insurers in which he holds policies, such insurers and their creditors and policyholders would be deprived of many benefits of the code. No other officer is authorized to perform the commissioner's duties, and if he cannot act, his agents or deputies would likewise be disqualified. In such a situation it must be assumed that the Legislature intended that the commissioner act regardless of the possibility that he might hold policies in the delinquent company. As said in 42 American Jurisprudence 312 "There is an exception, based upon necessity, to the rule of disqualification of an administrative officer. An officer, otherwise disqualified, may still act, if his failure to act would necessarily result in a failure of justice." The rule of necessity has been applied in this state to members of municipal bodies charged with hearing protests in connection with street assessments. Federal Construction Co. v. Curd, 179 Cal. 489, 177 P. 469, 2 A.L.R. 1202; cf. Nider v. Homan, 32 Cal.App.2d 11, 17, 89 P.2d 136. The rule is not confined to officers exercising quasi-judicial functions. Marion Township of Boone County v. Howard, 196 Ind. 167, 147 N.E. 619; cf. Capital Gas Co. v. Young, 109 Cal. 140, 41 P. 869, 29 L.R.A. 463.

[28] Appellant Neblett contends also that the commissioner's personal interest in the voting trust is established by provisions therein granting him fees and expenses not authorized by law. The allowances to the commissioner are expressly limited to his expenses, and this cannot be held to give him a personal interest in the trust.

[29, 30] It is also argued that the 1937 amendments to sections 1016 and 1037, St. 1937, pp. 2564, 2565, had the effect of repealing the authority of the commissioner to hold title to the property of the old company as liquidator and of terminating the entire rehabilitation proceeding. After the amendments, section 1016 contained the following language: "Upon a full hearing of such application, the court may make an order directing the winding up and liquidation of the business of such person by the commissioner, as liquidator, for the purpose of carrying out the order to liquidate and wind up the business of such person." This language furnishes sufficient statutory basis for the exercise of the commissioner's duties under court order as liquidator of the old company, and does not constitute an implied repeal of the authority previously vested in him. Neither does the authority to set up voting trusts, conferred upon the commissioner by section 1037(e), constitute an implied repeal of the provisions of section 1043 authorizing the commissioner to enter into plans of rehabilitation. Appellants contend that the omission of a requirement for court approval in the former section impliedly repeals the provisions of the latter section because, in effect, it authorizes the commissioner to create new plans of rehabilitation without court approval despite the fact that section 1043 requires court approval for plans of rehabilitation. Repeals by implication are not favored in the law (Rexstrew v. City of Huntington Park, 20 Cal.2d 630, 634, 128 P.2d 23; Railroad Commission v. Riley, 192 Cal. 54, 57, 218 P. 415), and no implied repeal need be found under the facts of this case. Section 1037(e) does not authorize new plans of rehabilitation without court approval.

[31] Finally, it is contended that the trial court lost jurisdiction to act in this proceeding by reason of its order made on February 5, 1940, continuing the hearing "until the completion of trial" of a concurrently pending action in equity involving the same issues. It is said that the equity action was not completed until after the orders appealed from herein were made. The record shows, however, that appellants permitted the issues raised in this proceeding and in the equity action with respect to the voting trust to be heard together as a matter of convenience. Any error, therefore, in determining this proceeding before completion of the equity case must be deemed waived.

Additional grounds for reversal are suggested, based upon the alleged disqualification of the trial judge who denied the motions here involved and upon the asserted invalidity of the basic rehabilitation agreement. These questions are considered and determined in companion cases decided herewith. Caminetti v. Pacific Mutual Life Ins. Co., Cal.Sup., 139 P.2d 930; Neblett v. Pacific Mutual Life Ins. Co., Cal.Sup., 139 P.2d 934. The conclusion reached therein that the contentions are unfounded is determinative upon this appeal.

The orders are affirmed.

I dissent.

Two basic questions are presented on these appeals: (1) Is the voting trust agreement so inconsistent with the rehabilitation agreement that it impairs the obligation of contracts? (2) Can such a voting trust agreement be created under section 1037(e) of the Insurance Code without court approval? On the first issue the majority opinion holds that the two agreements are not inconsistent, that there is no impairment of the obligation of contracts, and that even if there is such impairment it is justified under the police power. On the second issue it holds that, properly interpreted, the section authorizes the creation of the challenged voting trust without court approval. It is the position of this dissent on the first issue, that the two agreements are inconsistent; that the voting trust impairs the obligation of contracts by impairing the rights of thousands of policyholders who entered into contracts with the new company on the basis of a reorganization plan approved by them and the courts; that such impairment cannot be justified under the police power; and that the voting trust renders nugatory several judicial orders already made. On the second issue this dissent takes the position that the construction given the section by the majority is not compelled by the language of the amendment; that it renders the section unconstitutional; that it results in the repeal by implication of another subsection of section 1037, and abrogates another section of the Insurance Code; and that such a voting trust can be entered into only after first securing court approval.

Are the provisions of the voting trust agreement so inconsistent with the provisions of the rehabilitation agreement that they impair the obligation of contracts and vested rights?

This question should be disposed of before the section is construed, for if the voting trust impairs the obligation of contracts and abrogates rights vested on the faith of the court approved rehabilitation agreement, the section, as construed by the majority, would be unconstitutional as in violation of both the federal and state constitutions, unless such impairment is justified under the police power. This issue is relevant to the question of construction, because, if two equally reasonable constructions are possible, that which does not make the statute unconstitutional is to be preferred to a construction which accomplishes that result.

A comparison of the provisions of the two agreements demonstrates that they are incompatible. The voting trust provides for a disposition of the stock of the new company in a manner expressly forbidden by the rehabilitation agreement.

The voting trust agreement was entered into by Carpenter on April 4, 1938. Prior to that time Carpenter held the entire capital stock of the new company as a special trustee under the terms of a "Rehabilitation and Reinsurance Agreement" entered into on December 4, 1936, as of July 22, 1936. The history and background of that contract, approved by court order as required by law, have been sufficiently set forth in prior decisions. Carpenter v. Pacific Mut. Life Insurance Co., 10 Cal.2d 307, 74 P.2d 761, affirmed in Neblett v. Carpenter, 305 U.S. 297, 59 S.Ct. 170, 83 L.Ed. 182; Carpenter v. Pacific Mut. L. Ins. Co., 13 Cal.2d 306, 89 P.2d 637; Carpenter v. Pacific Mut. Life Ins. Co., 14 Cal.2d 704, 96 P.2d 796. Suffice it to say that the agreement was approved by the court after careful consideration to make certain that the rights of all persons with claims against the old company would be protected. Among other things, it provided that the commissioner should transfer to the new company all the property and assets of the old company and that, in return, the new company should assume the obligations of the old company except with respect to a particular class of policies known as noncancellable policies. In a subsequent clause the new company also assumed a limited obligation with respect to the so-called "non-can" policies and agreed to set up, as rapidly as possible, a special fund for the restoration of full benefits thereunder. The entire capital stock of the new company was to be held by the commissioner as a contractual trustee for the purpose of carrying out the rehabilitation plan. The permit which authorized the New Pacific Mutual Life Insurance Company to issue 10,000 shares of capital stock, provided that the commissioner should subscribe for and purchase all of the authorized stock of the new company for which he was to pay $3,000,000 in cash. Section 6 of the rehabilitation agreement provides that the $3,000,000 paid by the commissioner for the capital stock is to constitute the capital and paid-in surplus of the new company.

Section 20 of the Rehabilitation and Reinsurance Agreement is entitled "Mutualization and Disposition of Stock of New Company." It provides that the commissioner, as conservator or liquidator of the old company, shall not dispose of any of the capital stock of the new company except as provided therein. The following exceptions are the only ones specified: Subdivision (a) of section 20 provides that the commissioner may dispose of the stock of the new company in accordance with any plan of mutualization which may thereafter be adopted by the policy holders of the new company, and that such a disposition might include a transfer to voting trustees if the plan so provided. Subdivision (b) contains other provisions not involved in the present problem. Subdivision (c) contains a provision giving the old company the option to pay off the amount needed to restore benefits under the "non-can" policies and authorizing the commissioner to dispose of the stock of the new company in accordance with any court order entered pursuant to such a full settlement of the obligations of the old company. Subdivision (d) authorizes the commissioner to sell the capital stock of the new company upon order of court if, at any time, he determines that such a sale is required for the protection of the state in liquidation. Subdivision (e) provides: "It is the purpose, spirit, and intent of this agreement that, unless the provisions for mutualization are eliminated pursuant to the provisions of subparagraph (b) of this paragraph 20, the stock of the New Company shall not be sold or disposed of prior to the full restoration of benefits under Non-Can Policies except by proceedings for mutualization, so long as a reasonable probability of completing restoration of benefits under Non-Can Policies shall continue. * * *" Subdivision (f) contains the usual severability clause. The effect of this plan of rehabilitation was to place in the hands of the commissioner legal title to the stock of the new company in return for which he parted with the assets of the old company. He held legal title as trustee for the benefit of the creditors and policyholders of the old company for whom the capital stock of the new company was the most important remaining asset. Carpenter v. Pacific Mut. Life Ins. Co., 10 Cal.2d 307, 335, 74 P.2d 761.

On February 2, 1937, upon the application of Samuel L. Carpenter, Jr. as Insurance Commissioner, the court made an order of liquidation reciting that the commissioner had transferred all the assets of the old company to the new Pacific Mutual Life Insurance Company except the capital stock of the new company and any claims the old company might have against its past or present officers. The order stated that since any further efforts to conserve the business of the old company appeared futile to the commissioner, he was thereby appointed liquidator and directed to wind up its business. The rights and liabilities of the old company, its creditors, policyholders and share holders were fixed as of July 22, 1936, the date when the rehabilitation plan became effective. Section 8 of the court's order of liquidation provided: "That title to all property and assets of respondent corporation [the old company] now vested in said Commissioner as said conservator, together with all right, title and interest of said Commissioner as said conservator in said stock of Pacific Mutual Life Insurance Company [the new company], shall remain and be vested in said Commissioner, and his successor in office, as liquidator of The Pacific Mutual Life Insurance Company of California."

When the commissioner, under the powers conferred upon him by the Insurance Code, took over the old company in July of 1936 every policy of the company, totalling millions of dollars, was placed in jeopardy. The agency organization and the good will of the old company was in danger of being lost. The rehabilitation plan, resulting ultimately in the court approved rehabilitation agreement, was an attempt by the commissioner, acting pursuant to the provisions of section 1043 of the Insurance Code, to meet this emergency by creating a new company to take over the solvent policies. The basis of that plan was that, acting pursuant to the provisions of the agreement, the commissioner was to hold and control the stock of the new company until all claimants were paid. Pursuant to this fundamental policy the agreement expressly provided in section 20, quoted supra, that the commissioner was prohibited from disposing of the stock except as provided in the plan. Policyholders were given the election of accepting policies in the new company or of filing claims against the old company. As to both assenting and dissenting policyholders, an integral part of the contract was that the state insurance commissioner, until all claimants were paid, would control the policy and management of the new company through ownership of the stock. The inducement held out to secure court approval, and the inducement held out to the policyholders, was that the new company, under this plan, could not be returned into private management, but that the new company would remain under the management and control of the insurance commissioner until all claimants were paid. Carpenter v. Pacific Mut. Life Ins. Co., 10 Cal.2d 307, 332, 74 P.2d 761. The superior court approved that plan on the basis of continued commissioner control, and the court's order of liquidation, quoted supra, expressly provided that the stock of the new company should remain in the commissioner and his successor in office. The action of the superior court in approving the reorganization agreement was affirmed by this court and by the United States Supreme Court, again on the hypothesis that by the agreement every interested person's rights were protected by the provision that control of the stock would remain in the hands of the commissioner and his successor in office. On that basis thousands of policyholders made their election. Direct and continuous commissioner control was the very essence of the court approved contract. Now what happened?

On April 4, 1938, after this agreement had been entered into and approved by the court, and after thousands of policyholders had changed their position in reliance thereon, Carpenter entered into the Pacific Mutual Voting Trust Agreement here challenged. It purports to be a contract between Carpenter as conservator and liquidator of the old company on the one side, and four named trustees on the other. The voting trust agreement recites that the purposes of the rehabilitation agreement of July 22, 1936, will be facilitated by the transfer of legal title in the capital stock of the new company to voting trustees of established character and ability. Paragraph Fourth provides: "All of said stock * * * shall be received by the Trustees in trust, and shall be held, distributed, or otherwise disposed of, by the Trustees as provided in this agreement. While this agreement continues in effect the Trustees shall have full legal title to all shares of the stock of the Corporation [the new company] deposited with or held by them hereunder, and shall be entitled to exercise with respect thereto all rights and powers of every name and nature which the Depositor [the commissioner] had except as may be otherwise herein expressly provided." The trust was made irrevocable for a period of slightly less than twenty-one years except that it could be terminated sooner by the commissioner in the exercise of any of the powers of disposition over the stock reserved to him in Paragraph 20 of the Rehabilitation and Reinsurance Agreement. Paragraph Eighth of the voting trust agreement provides: "The Trustees, during the continuance of this Agreement shall be vested with and shall possess and shall be entitled to exercise in their discretion all the rights and powers of an absolute owner of the stock held by them hereunder. * * *" The trustees agreed to carry out faithfully the obligations of the commissioner as set forth in the rehabilitation agreement. Paragraph Eleventh states: "The Depositor [the commissioner], as herein provided, retains a beneficial interest in the shares of stock which are the subject matter of this Voting Trust. * * *" Paragraph Twenty-third provides: "It is one of the primary purposes of this agreement to assure the full accomplishment of all of the intents and purposes of the Rehabilitation Agreement in accordance with its terms. The parties hereto therefore declare that no provision of this agreement is to be construed in any manner which would result in a violation of any of the terms, agreements, or provisions of said Rehabilitation Agreement. * * *

The obvious purpose and legal effect of this voting trust agreement was to transfer from the commissioner, a state official, to a board of private trustees, the legal title to the stock and all of the responsibilities and duties which devolved upon the commissioner as special trustee and holder of the capital stock of the new company under the rehabilitation agreement.

It does not require extended comment to demonstrate that the voting trust agreement violates the provisions of the Rehabilitation Agreement. Section 20 of the Rehabilitation and Reinsurance Agreement provides that the commissioner shall not dispose of the stock of the new company except as therein provided. The exceptions provided are: (1) Pursuant to the terms of any plan for mutualization of the new company; (2) according to court order if the old company proved able to pay off its obligations under the "Non-Can" policies; and (3) by court order where he deems it necessary to safeguard the interests of the estate in liquidation. The first and third of these alternatives contemplate a change in the corpus of the trust held for the creditors of the old company, the first by mutualization of the new company and the last by exchange of the stock of the new company for a more secure piece of property. The second alternative contemplates a termination of the trust in the event the old company raised sufficient funds to pay off its obligations.

The voting trust agreement transfers full legal title to the board of trustees in a situation where the rehabilitation trust is to continue, but it is not a transfer pursuant to a plan of mutualization nor one made in order to safeguard the estate in liquidation. If the creation of the voting trust were not contrary to the provisions of the rehabilitation agreement then section 1037(e) was superfluous. But the majority concedes that the sole source of power to transfer title to the stock to the voting trustees is to be found in that section.

The majority opinion does not dispute that this transfer is not provided for in the rehabilitation plan. It does, however, argue that the rehabilitation plan does not prohibit this transfer, urging that section 20 of the rehabilitation plan uses "dispose of" in the sense of an absolute disposition of the stock, rather than merely a transfer of legal title in trust. This argument is unsound. The rehabilitation plan by expressly providing that the commissioner shall not dispose of the stock except under certain specific conditions provides the exclusive modes by which the commissioner may dispose of the stock. The attempt to limit the meaning of "dispose" to absolute alienation is met directly by the fact that although one of the exceptions provided in the rehabilitation plan is a transfer to voting trustees, such a transfer must be pursuant to a plan of mutualization of the new company under section 20(a). Furthermore, under the rehabilitation plan the commissioner was a trustee for the creditors of the old company. Thus, all he had was the legal title to the stock. The beneficial interest was in the creditors of the old company. Since all he had was the legal title, the transfer of all that he had is obviously a disposition of the stock within the meaning of the rehabilitation plan.

The majority opinion (139 P.2d 914) lays great stress upon the provision of the voting trust agreement that "if any covenant or agreement provided herein * * * should be contrary to any express provision of said Rehabilitation Agreement, or contrary to the policy of said Rehabilitation Agreement * * * then such covenant or covenants, agreement or agreements, shall be null and void." Since the rehabilitation agreement expressly prohibits the commissioner's disposing of the stock except as specifically authorized, and since the disposition in question is not so authorized, the voting trust is void under its own provisions.

The majority opinion urges, however, that the two agreements are not inconsistent but that the voting trust agreement "is intended to and does supplement and facilitate the carrying out of the provisions of the rehabilitation agreement" (139 P.2d 915), and states that this is made apparent by the provision above quoted that if any covenant of the voting trust is contrary to the rehabilitation agreement it is null and void. The argument is that because the voting trust states that it was intended to facilitate the rehabilitation agreement, and because it states that if any of its provisions are contrary to the rehabilitation agreement such provisions are null and void, none of its provisions can violate the rehabilitation agreement. The non sequitur is obvious. The rehabilitation agreement provided that the commissioner should exercise the voting rights; the voting trust provides that such power should be exercised by the voting trustees. Such provision is "contrary to the policy of said Rehabilitation Agreement" and is contrary to an "express provision of said Rehabilitation Agreement." The provision of the voting trust purporting to transfer this power to the voting trustees is therefore "null and void" under the very terms of the voting trust.

The majority opinion states, however, that "Although the trust agreement transfers to the trustees the legal title to the stock, it expressly reserves to the commissioner 'the entire beneficial interest in such stock.' The commissioner therefore retains for the benefit of the stockholders and creditors of the old company the same substantial interest he theretofore possessed as statutory trustee." 139 P.2d 915. It is true that the voting trust provides that the commissioner retains "the entire beneficial interest" in the stock. But it also provides that "full legal title" thereto is transferred to the voting trustees in order that "they may exercise the rights of stockholders in the control of the Corporation," and that the trustees "shall be entitled to exercise with respect thereto all rights and powers of every name and nature which the Depositor had" except as expressly provided otherwise. A subsequent paragraph provides that the "Trustees, during the continuance of this Agreement shall be vested with and shall possess and shall be entitled to exercise in their discretion all the rights and powers of an absolute owner of the stock held by them hereunder."

The majority opinion in several places states that by the voting trust agreement the commissioner simply transferred the "administrative duties" of voting the stock to the trustees while retaining the "beneficial interest" in the stock. Just what is meant by a transfer of the "administrative duties" of voting the stock is not clear. The power that was transferred to the trustees by the voting trust was the power to vote 100% of the stock of the new company. What does that mean? It means that prior to creation of the voting trust the commissioner had the power to elect the entire board of directors of the new company. Through the exercise of that power he had the power and it was his duty to control the general policy of a corporation with several hundred millions of dollars of assets. It was these powers that he voluntarily transferred to the voting trustees. To characterize such important functions as the mere "administrative" duty of voting the stock does not minimize their importance. Moreover, the commissioner has retained no "beneficial interest" in the stock. He was not the beneficial owner of the stock, and never had a beneficial interest therein. He had the legal title as trustee, and the rehabilitation agreement so provided. In Carpenter v. Pacific Mut. Life Ins. Co., 10 Cal.2d 307, at page 335, [74 P.2d 761, at page 778,] this court, in referring to what the record there showed, stated: "It discloses that as trustee for all creditors of the old company, including dissenters, the commissioner holds all of the stock of the new company * * *." The creditors and policyholders and stockholders of the old company owned and still own the beneficial interest in the stock. The commissioner had the legal title subject to the terms of the trust set forth in the rehabilitation agreement. He transferred all that title, all those rights, and all of his duties to the trustees. There was nothing of a "beneficial" nature or otherwise for him to retain. He transferred everything he had and retained nothing.

The majority opinion then seeks to show that there is no inconsistency between the voting trust and the various court orders. Of course if the voting trust is consistent with the rehabilitation agreement it is likewise consistent with the court orders. If a transfer of all his interest in the stock to the trustees did not violate the express provisions of the rehabilitation agreement prohibiting such transfer, then the transfer did not violate the similar provision in the court orders. But, as already pointed out, the voting trust does violate the provisions of the rehabilitation agreement. For the same reasons it violates the court order heretofore quoted.

The next argument advanced in the majority opinion is that the voting trust merely "permits a transfer of the administrative duty of voting the stock from one state instrumentality to another". 139 P.2d 916. On the next page of the opinion this thought is further elaborated upon, and it is definitely held that the voting trustees are a "state agency or instrumentality" and that all that section 1037(e) and the voting trust do is "to transfer the duties of the commissioner to another state instrumentality." The thought is then expressed that the voting trustees are a state board, agency or instrumentality in the same sense that national banks, although privately owned, are government agencies, or that the Regents of the University of California, although not public officials, constitute a governmental agency. Other illustrations of a similar nature are given. In all of the illustrations given in the majority opinion, however, the agency involved was not only designated by statute, but its duties and functions were fixed by law. (See the provisions of the National Bank Act, 12 U.S.C.A. § 21 et seq.; and the provisions of Art. IX, § 9, of the State Constitution, relating to the Regents of the University.) It is because of duties and functions imposed upon them by the statute that they are state agencies or instrumentalities, and not simply because the statute provides for their appointment. In the instant case neither section 1037(e) of the Insurance Code nor any other provision of law imposes any duties on the trustees. Their duties and functions are fixed by contract—the voting trust agreement. Except as provided in that contract their duties are no different from those of any private trustee, and they no more constitute a governmental agency than do trustees appointed by will or contract.

The argument that the voting trustees constitute a governmental agency overlooks the nature and source of their functions under the voting trust. The commissioner's rights, powers and duties over the stock of the new company were not defined by statute—those rights, powers and duties arose out of and had their sole source in the contractual obligations and provisions of the rehabilitation agreement. It was these rights, powers and duties that were voluntarily transferred to the voting trustees by the commissioner. The rights, powers and duties of the voting trustees over the stock of the new company are not defined by statute. They have their sole source in the rehabilitation agreement. This being so the transfer by the commissioner to the voting trustees of a purely contractual power cannot make the trustees a governmental agency. They are contractual trustees appointed pursuant to statute. The only governmental function the commissioner exercised over the stock of the new company was as conservator or liquidator of the old company. The stock of the new company is the principal asset of the creditors of the old company. The commissioner still possesses all of his powers and duties as conservator and liquidator of the old company. None of those official duties have been transferred to the voting trustees. The commissioner is still the liquidator or conservator of the old company. Certainly it is not to be assumed that by the authorization to create a voting trust the Legislature intended to remove the commissioner as conservator or liquidator, and to substitute in his place the voting trustees. Yet the only way the voting trustees can be held to be a governmental agency is to hold, contrary to the fact, that the voting trustees have been substituted as conservator or liquidator in place of the commissioner. The true fact is that the voting trustees in voting the stock are not performing a governmental function at all, but are performing duties created solely by contract. That being so they are not in any sense a governmental agency.

When the Superior Court was asked to approve the rehabilitation agreement setting up a new company to take over the assets of the old company one of the major problems presented to the court and to the creditors of the old company was the selection of a trustee for the stock of the new company. After due consideration, the parties to the agreement, and the court, determined that it was in the interest of all concerned to select a public official with the qualifications, experience, duties, functions and staff of the insurance commissioner. They could have selected a bank, a corporation, or private trustees, but, as a matter of contract, they selected the insurance commissioner as trustee. The legislature has no more power to permit that selected trustee to appoint another trustee in his place than it would have to provide that a private trustee selected by the trustor and beneficiaries could, without the consent of the trustor and beneficiaries, appoint another trustee. If this statute is constitutional, the trustor and beneficiaries of the trust, without their consent, are compelled to accept trustees that they never have selected, and, as this case demonstrates, that some of them do not want. Viewed in this aspect it makes no difference in result whether the voting trustees be considered a private board or a governmental agency. Where parties have, by contract, selected one public official as a contractual trustee, the Legislature is without power to authorize him to appoint another public agency in his stead without the consent of the contracting parties. The parties selected the insurance commissioner as trustee. They did not select the state corporation commissioner, the fish and game commissioner or any other official to serve as trustee, and the Legislature, against the will of the contracting parties and without their consent, cannot substitute other trustees for the one agreed upon. In fact, the famous Dartmouth College case (Dartmouth College v. Woodward, 17 U.S. 518, 4 Wheat. 518, 4 L.Ed. 629) established this principle. In that case the Legislature of New Hampshire attempted to change the trustees of Dartmouth College and to substitute new and different trustees. It was held, and there has been no deviation from that rule, that such legislative enactment was unconstitutional as an impairment of the obligation of contracts. It is apparent, therefore, that, at least in a case not falling within the police power, the rule that the state may lawfully transfer statutory functions from one state official or department to another, has no application to functions conferred upon the state official or department not by statute but by contract.

The majority opinion next holds that even if it be assumed that the voting trust impairs the obligations of the rehabilitation agreement, such impairment is justified under the police power. The majority opinion states that "it is settled that contract and property rights must yield to legislation in the interest of the general welfare". 139 P.2d 917. It is undoubtedly the law that contract rights are subject to alteration, without violating the impairment of obligation of contracts and due process clauses of the constitution, when such alteration is necessary in the public interest. It is also undoubtedly the law that the state, under its regulatory power, may regulate the insurance business, and under certain circumstances, affect private contract rights. The cases cited in the majority opinion establish these general principles beyond doubt. The principle was clearly stated in Home Building & Loan Ass'n v. Blaisdell, 290 U.S. 398, at p. 434, 54 S.Ct. 231, at page 238, 78 L.Ed. 413, 88 A.L.R. 1481, where the court stated: "Not only is the constitutional provision qualified by the measure of control which the state retains over remedial processes, but the state also continues to possess authority to safeguard the vital interests of its people. It does not matter that legislation appropriate to that end 'has the result of modifying or abrogating contracts already in effect.' Stephenson v. Binford, 287 U.S. 251, 276, 53 S.Ct. 181, 189, 77 L.Ed. 288 [301, 87 A.L.R. 721]. Not only are existing laws read into contracts in order to fix obligations as between the parties, but the reservation of essential attributes of sovereign power is also read into contracts as a postulate of the legal order. The policy of protecting contracts against impairment presupposes the maintenance of a government by virtue of which contractual relations are worth while,—a government which retains adequate authority to secure the peace and good order of society. This principle of harmonizing the constitutional prohibition with the necessary residuum of state power has had progressive recognition in the decisions of this Court." See, also, Brown v. Ferdon, 5 Cal.2d 226, 54 P.2d 712; Birkhofer v. Krumm, 27 Cal.App.2d 513, 81 P.2d 609.

It is imperative, however, that the impairment of contract rights be in the public interest. But what public interest could be served in the present case by relinquishing commissioner control and returning the management to private control? What public interest impelled changing the voting trust from one where the commissioner, as trustee, exercised sole power over the stock, to a private self perpetuating irrevocable voting trust? The Superior Court, this court and the United States Supreme Court approved the rehabilitation agreement because they were of the opinion that it was in the general welfare of the policyholders, creditors and the public that the commissioner retain the stock for the protection of all concerned. No sound reason has been suggested why the public interest would be benefited or the general welfare advanced by a change in this policy. No emergency existed. There was no change in conditions between the time of the rehabilitation agreement and the time section 1037(e) was passed. The majority opinion suggests the possibility that the statute was passed to enable the commissioner to avoid a possible position of "conflicting interests." The argument proves too much. Section 1037(e) is not mandatory. It leaves it to the discretion of the very person in whom the conflict is alleged to exist—the commissioner—to determine whether the assumed conflicting interest shall be continued or settled. Had the legislature been of the view that the general welfare required an impairment of vested rights because of an assumed conflict of interest it would have made the voting trust form of management mandatory and not discretionary. It is also suggested that the amendment might have been intended to permit the commissioner to avoid the burden of exercising the voting power. Had that been the intention of the legislature it would have provided for the appointment of a person or persons responsible to him to perform this duty. But this amendment, according to the majority, permits the creation of a self perpetuating board independent of the commissioner for twenty-one years. Moreover, the time to consider whether the burden of voting the stock was too onerous or whether that duty might conflict with his other duties was when the rehabilitation agreement was under consideration. At that time the commissioner, the Superior Court, this court and the United States Supreme Court determined that the duties under the rehabilitation agreement were not too onerous and that they did not conflict with his other duties. The very basis of the rehabilitation agreement was that the commissioner was the best informed, qualified, and impartial agency in the state to vote that stock. Of course, the legislature could prohibit the insurance commissioner from accepting the position of trustee of such a trust, or could compel him to resign from trusteeships already accepted, if it determined that such duties were incompatible with the commissioner's statutory duties. In that event, however, the Legislature could not compel the contracting parties to accept a new trustee selected by the commissioner without their consent. Until the selection of a new trustee the trust would not fail, but, under accepted principles, would continue under the supervision of a court of equity.

Respondents also suggest the possibility that the Legislature may have believed that from a practical standpoint the commissioner might be unqualified, because of lack of knowledge, to elect competent directors. If the commissioner were unqualified to select directors whom he could replace at pleasure, he would be equally unqualified to select voting trustees, and in this latter situation any error in judgment would be irreparable for twenty-one years. The majority opinion also suggests that the legislation may have been intended to secure continuity in management. Such a contention assumes that the commissioner would arbitrarily and capriciously change the board. Had that concept motivated the legislation, the Legislature would have made the change mandatory and not discretionary.

A case directly in point on this issue is In re Bond & Mortgage Guarantee Co., 157 Misc. 240, 283 N.Y.S. 623, interpreting the New York statutes dealing with rehabilitation from which most of our statutes on this subject were copied. There the New York commissioner of insurance took over the assets of an insolvent insurance company, and from its assets, with court approval, organized a new company as a guarantee corporation. This new corporation was to carry on the business of the old company retaining, as here, all its capital stock for the benefit of creditors. By court order the commissioner was authorized to enter into a contract with the guarantee corporation to service all mortgages of the old company. Thereafter the legislature, purporting to act in an emergency, expressly provided that the Mortgage Commission should take over from the guarantee corporation all of the mortgages being serviced by it under the court's decree. The court held that the legislation, insofar as it purported to be applicable to rights vested pursuant to court decree, was unconstitutional. The court (283 N.Y.S. at page 648) stated: "When the language of a statute clearly requires a retroactive construction, it must be so construed though thereby it is held to be unconstitutional. Westervelt v. Gregg, 12 N.Y. 202, 62 Am.Dec. 160. Retroactive statutes are not of themselves unconstitutional, but when they are in conflict with the provisions of either the Federal or the State Constitutions, a different result may follow. Such result follows where, as here, such a statute violates the right of the parties to such a servicing contract made part of any such order, to perform and to have performed the provisions of such contract, or it interferes with a vested right conferred by an order in the nature of a decree of which a servicing contract is made a part, finally adjudging the rights of the parties and the provisions of such contract. After a final determination of the rights of the parties to such a proceeding has been rendered, such rights 'have passed beyond the legislative power, either directly or indirectly, to reach or destroy. After adjudication the fruits of the judgment become rights of property. These rights became vested by the action of the court and were thereby placed beyond the reach of legislative power to affect.' Gilman v. Tucker, 128 N.Y. 190, at page 204, 28 N.E. 1040, 1044, 13 L.R.A. 304, 26 Am.St.Rep. 464. * * * The provisions of chapter 638 of the Laws of 1935, in so far as they purport to require turning over such servicing contracts made part of any final court order entered prior to May 1, 1935, deprive the guarantee corporation and the certificate holders, the real parties in interest, of their property without due process of law in conflict with article 1, § 6 of the Constitution of this state (Livingston v. Livingston, 173 N.Y. 377, 66 N.E. 123, 61 L.R.A. 800, 93 Am.St.Rep. 600; Gilman v. Tucker, supra; Germania Savings Bank of Kings County v. Village of Suspension Bridge, 159 N.Y. 362, 54 N.E. 33; Burch v. Newbury, 10 N.Y. 374) and are in conflict with the Fourteenth Amendment to the Constitution of the United States. Coombes v. Getz, 285 U.S. 434, 52 S.Ct. 435, 76 L.Ed. 866; Memphis v. United States ex rel. Brown, 97 U.S. 293, 24 L.Ed. 920; McCullough v. Virginia, 172 U.S. 102, 19 S.Ct. 134, 43 L.Ed. 382. Moreover, the aforesaid provisions of said amendment impair the obligations of contracts in violation of article 1, § 10, clause 1 of the Constitution of the United States. Delmas v. Merchants' Mut. Ins. Co., 14 Wall. 661, 81 U.S. [661], 20 L.Ed. 757; Red Rock v. Henry, 106 U.S. 596, 1 S.Ct. 434, 27 L.Ed. 251; County of Clay v. Society for Savings, 104 U.S. 579, 26 L.Ed. 856; Danolds v. State of New York, 89 N.Y. 36, 42 Am. Rep. 277; New York Sanitary Utilization Co. v. Department of Health, 61 App.Div. 106, 70 N.Y.S. 510; In re Cook, 86 App. Div. 586, 83 N.Y.S. 1009." This reasoning is directly applicable to the statute here involved.

The majority opinion attempts to distinguish this case on the ground that all that the New York case decided was that the Legislature could not take assets away from a new company set up pursuant to a court approved rehabilitation plan and turn them over to a state agency created as the result of an existing emergency. The point is that if the due process and contract clauses protect the parties to a court approved rehabilitation contract even in the face of an "emergency" alleged to exist by the Legislature, they certainly protect the parties when, as in the present case, no public interest is served by the impairment.

Independently of the constitutional argument, section 1037(e) requires that there be court approval of any voting trust adopted pursuant to its provisions. There was no such approval of the present voting trust and it is, therefore, invalid.

Subsection (e) of section 1037 of the Insurance Code is but one of six subsections. The entire section enumerates the major powers of the commissioner when acting as conservator or liquidator. Subsection (d), which was part of the section long before subsection (e) was added in 1937, expressly provides "that no transaction involving real or personal property shall be made where the market value of the property involved exceeds the sum of one thousand dollars without first obtaining permission of said court, and then only in accordance with such terms as said court may prescribe." Obviously, the relinquishment of legal title to all the capital stock of the new company for which the commissioner had paid $3,000,000 was a "transaction involving * * * personal property * * * where the market value of the property involved exceeds the sum of one thousand dollars. * * *" The majority opinion emphasizes that subdivision (e), dealing exclusively with voting trusts, has no provision for court approval. This is not conclusive. A separate provision for court approval in subdivision (e) would be redundant in view of the broad provisions of subsection (d). The section must be read in its entirety, and effect, if possible, be given to each part thereof. To give subsection (e) the interpretation given to it by the majority of this court is to read subsection (d) out of the section in one significant type of "transaction"—transfer of title to personal property by the creation of a voting trust.

Court approval of this voting trust is necessary for another reason. Subdivision (e) of section 1037 is a general provision dealing with the powers of the commissioner as conservator or liquidator. It does not deal specifically with reorganizations and rehabilitation agreements. The section permitting such agreements and the section under which the commissioner acted in executing the rehabilitation agreement here involved, is section 1043 of the Insurance Code. That section permits the commissioner, as conservator or liquidator "subject to the approval of said court" to enter into rehabilitation agreements. As already pointed out, the voting trust modified and altered the court approved rehabilitation plan. If a rehabilitation agreement requires court approval to be effective, any modification thereof requires court approval, for a modified plan is, in fact, a new and different plan. Any other construction would permit a material change in the rehabilitation plan without court approval and would thus nullify the requirement of court approval in the first instance. The majority opinion by construction reads the requirement for court approval out of section 1043.

A holding that the voting trust is invalid does not render void the actions of the board of directors elected by the voting trustees.

In the event this voting trust were held to be invalid it would not jeopardize the actions of the board of directors of the new company that had been elected by the voting trustees. There can be no doubt that the acts of the present board after their election are valid, even though the voting trust is void. Under our law the right to vote stock is dependent upon the records of the corporation, and since the voting trustees appeared in the books as shareholders, their right to vote the stock cannot be questioned. § 320a, Civil Code; Lawrence v. I. N. Parlier Estate Co., 15 Cal.2d 220, 100 P.2d 765; Los Angeles v. Owens River Canal Co., 120 Cal.App. 380, 7 P.2d 1064; Dedrick v. California Whaling Co., 16 Cal.App.2d 284, 60 P.2d 551. A stockholder not appearing on the books who asserts his right to vote must seek the aid of a court either to secure a statutory review of the election, or to secure a re-transfer of the stock to himself. § 315, Civ. Code; Moore v. Bowes, 8 Cal.2d 162, 64 P.2d 423; Bowes v. Superior Court, 13 Cal.App.2d 656, 57 P.2d 583; Los Angeles v. Owens River Canal Co., supra; Dedrick v. California Whaling Co., supra; Smith v. California Thorn Cordage, Inc., 129 Cal. App. 93, 18 P.2d 393; Lawrence v. I. N. Parlier Estate Co., supra. Even if it be assumed that the particular election of the board of directors by the voting trustees was invalid, they are at least de facto officers of the corporation, and have the same powers as a de jure board. No attack can be successfully made on their corporate acts or on their status by collateral action. See cases collected 6A Cal.Jur. 1068, et seq.; Storrs v. Belmont Gold Min. & Mill. Co., 24 Cal.App.2d 551, 76 P.2d 197; Farbstein v. Pacific Oil Tool Co., Ltd., 127 Cal.App. 157, 15 P.2d 766; Consumers Salt Co. v. Riggins, 208 Cal. 537, 282 P. 954; 2 Fletcher, Cyclopedia of Private Corporations (1931), p. 142, et seq.; Stevens on Corporations (1936), p. 618, et seq.; California Corporation Laws (1938 Ed.) by Ballantine, p. 90, § 82. Thus no argument of expediency can justify the interpretation given the section in the majority opinion.

The judgment should be reversed.

GIBSON, Chief Justice.

This is an appeal from an order refusing to vacate certain orders affirmed in a companion case decided herewith (Caminetti v. Pacific Mutual Life Ins. Co. of California, Cal.Sup., 139 P.2d 908, all of which orders were made by the Superior Court of Los Angeles County in a statutory proceeding involving the Pacific Mutual Life Insurance Company of California.

As more fully appears in the companion case, Cal.Sup., 139 P.2d 908, in accordance with a plan of rehabilitation of the Pacific Mutual Life Insurance Company of California, a new company known as the Pacific Mutual Life Insurance Company was organized and its entire stock was held by the then insurance commissioner. Later, however, the stock of the new company was transferred by a voting trust agreement to five persons named therein as voting trustees. When the present commissioner succeeded to the office he sought an order invalidating the voting trust agreement. The appellants, Neblett and others, also sought similar relief by motion. On May 8, 1940, the superior court, Judge Vickers presiding, denied both motions. Appellants Neblett, et al., thereupon moved to vacate the above orders on the ground that Judge Vickers was disqualified by reason of relationship to a party, and upon other grounds relating to the jurisdiction of the court. The motion to vacate was heard before a different judge and was denied on June 3, 1940. In the companion case this day filed, Cal.Sup., 139 P.2d 908, we have affirmed the orders made by Judge Vickers denying the motions of the commissioner and of Neblett, et al., to set aside the voting trust agreement. In the present appeal, appellants Neblett, et al., challenge the order denying their motion to vacate Judge Vickers' orders because of his alleged disqualification.

In denying the motion to vacate the orders refusing to set aside the voting trust, the court refrained from determining whether Judge Vickers was disqualified to make such orders and found that such disqualification, if any existed, had been waived by the appellants.

Whether the disqualification was waived turns upon the construction and application to be given to section 170 of the Code of Civil Procedure. The section provides in part that "No justice, judge or justice of the peace shall sit or act as such in any action or proceeding: 1. * * * To which he is a party; or in which he is interested other than as a holder or owner of any capital stock of a corporation, or of any bond, note or other security issued by a corporation; 2. In which he is interested as a holder or owner of any capital stock of a corporation, or of any bond, note or other security issued by a corporation; 3. * * * When he is related to either party, or to an officer of a corporation, which is a party, or to an attorney, counsel, or agent of either party, by consanguinity or affinity within the third degree * * *; provided, however, that if the parties appearing in the action and not then in default * * * or the attorney for any of the above named, or the party or his attorney in all other or special proceedings, shall sign and file in the action or matter, a stipulation in writing waiving the disqualification mentioned in this subdivision or in Subdivisions 2 or 4 hereof, the judge or court may proceed with the trial or hearing and the performance of all other duties connected therewith with the same legal effect as if no such disqualification existed * * *." (Italics added.) Subdivision 4 of section 170 disqualifies a judge who has been an attorney for any party and subdivision 5 a judge who is biased or prejudiced.

Prior to and at the time of making the orders refusing to set aside the voting trust, which orders are here sought to be vacated, there also was pending before Judge Vickers an independent action in equity brought by Neblett and others to vacate and set aside all orders theretofore made in this, the statutory proceeding. The equity action (Neblett v. Pacific Mutual Life Ins. Co., Cal.Sup., 139 P.2d 934, this day decided, likewise challenged the legality of the voting trust. On February 14, 1940, during trial of that action, Judge Vickers announced that he had discovered that his sister was a stockholder in Pacific Mutual. Two days thereafter the parties filed a written stipulation in the equity action waiving any disqualification of Judge Vickers arising under subdivisions 2, 3, 4, or 5 of section 170, supra. The trial of that action was resumed and on March 12, 1940, Judge Vickers delivered an oral opinion in favor of the defendants therein upon all issues except validity of the voting trust, the latter issue having been reserved by agreement of the parties to be tried with the same issue in this statutory proceeding. Thereupon Judge Vickers heard together all matters urged in the equity action and in this proceeding pertaining to the validity of the voting trust. On May 8, 1940, as stated above, he entered herein the orders refusing to set aside the voting trust, affirmed 139 P.2d 908, and on the following day appellants filed their motion to vacate based on disqualification and other grounds. It appears to be conceded for the purposes of this appeal that Judge Vickers' sister, by reason of stock ownership, was a party to the proceeding pending before him within the meaning of subdivision 3 of section 170, supra. Judge Vickers was therefore disqualified, and the orders of May 8 must be vacated unless appellants have waived and are now estopped to assert the disqualification.

In 1927, St.1927, p. 1403, section 170, supra, was amended to provide that "The statement of a party objecting to the judge, on the ground of his disqualification, shall be presented at the earliest practicable opportunity, after his appearance and discovery of the facts constituting the ground of the judge's disqualification, and in any event before the commencement of the hearing of any issue of fact in the action or proceeding before such judge." Appellants did not raise the question of disqualification until May 9, 1940, the day following the adverse orders refusing to set aside the voting trust, although they were aware of the ground of disqualification on February, 14, 1940, which was approximately one month before the start of hearings on validity of the voting trust and some three months before the orders were made. It is contended, however, that regardless of the 1927 amendment there can be no estoppel to show that a judge is disqualified, that the filing of a written stipulation in the action constitutes the exclusive method of waiver, and that in the absence of such a waiver all decisions and orders of a disqualified judge are void. Appellants also assert that they are not bound in this proceeding by the written waiver they filed in the equity action.

[1] The power of the Legislature to permit a waiver of disqualification cannot be questioned. The Constitution does not prevent the exercise of such power, and reasonable legislative regulations with respect to disqualification of judges have been approved by the courts. See Austin v. Lambert, 11 Cal.2d 73, 75, 77 P.2d 849, 115 A.L.R. 849; Daigh v. Shaffer, 23 Cal. App.2d 449, 455, 73 P.2d 927. None of the cases cited by appellants indicates that disqualification arising under subdivision 3 of section 170 cannot be waived by failure to urge it at the "earliest practicable opportunity" as required by the 1927 amendment of the section. Three of the cases, decided before enactment of the amendment, hold that a judgment rendered by a judge disqualified because of personal interest under subdivision 1 of section 170, which, as distinguished from subdivision 3, contains no provision permitting a written waiver, is invalid, and that no waiver or estoppel by conduct could arise under that subdivision. Lindsay-Strathmore Irr. Dist. v. Superior Court, 182 Cal. 315, 187 P. 1056; Hall v. Superior Court, 198 Cal. 373, 245 P. 814; City of Vallejo v. Superior Court, 199 Cal. 408, 249 P. 1084, 48 A.L.R. 610. These decisions are based upon the theory that the subdivision relating to a personal interest of a judge in litigation was intended to protect the state and judiciary as well as the parties to the suit and that therefore a waiver of the provision by a party is immaterial. The reasons of policy there relied upon can have no application to a disqualification arising under subdivision 3 of the section, as the Legislature has declared therein that the parties may avoid its operation by filing a written waiver or consent.

The cases of Briggs v. Superior Court, 215 Cal. 336, 10 P.2d 1003; Giometti v. Etienne, 219 Cal. 687, 28 P.2d 913, and Carpenter v. Pacific Mutual Life Ins. Co., 10 Cal.2d 307, 323, 324, 74 P.2d 761, did not involve questions of waiver, estoppel or construction of that part of the 1927 amendment with which we are here concerned. The decision in Johnson v. German American Ins. Co., 150 Cal. 336, 88 P. 985, was based upon the statute as it existed before waiver by written stipulation was permitted. The case of Cadenasso v. Bank of Italy, 214 Cal. 562, 6 P.2d 944, also relied on by appellants, is distinguishable because the disqualification there involved arose under subdivision 1 of the section and was not discovered until after trial of the action, whereupon the parties took steps to have the judgment vacated at the first opportunity. Thus, the effect of that part of the 1927 amendment here involved was there left undecided. Similarly, in Krebs v. Los Angeles Ry. Corp., 7 Cal.2d 549, 61 P.2d 931, the effect of the 1927 amendment upon subdivision I was left open. No case has been cited or found that renders the amendment inapplicable to subdivision 3.

As stated above, appellants were aware of Judge Vickers' alleged disqualification on February 14, 1940, at which time they joined in a written stipulation waiving such disqualification in the equity action. Appellants failed to challenge Judge Vickers' qualification to preside in this companion statutory proceeding, pending contemporaneously with the equity action, until some three months after discovery of the fact underlying the disqualification and then only after Judge Vickers had ruled adversely to them in denying their motion to set aside the voting trust. The 1927 amendment was aimed at such dilatory tactics.

[3] Appellants cannot excuse their delay in urging Judge Vickers' disqualification by contending that until May 20, 1940, they were unaware that his sister had given proxies to stockholders' committees, one of which had intervened. The record shows that before appellants assertedly first learned of the proxies they had filed a verified statement of disqualification alleging that Judge Vickers' sister "is now and has been at all times since July 22, 1936, a party to the within proceeding." In support of their motion they had urged that "all stockholders are parties to the proceeding." The record also discloses that the stockholders' committee intervened before February 14, 1940, when appellants first learned that the judge's sister was a stockholder, and they could have ascertained at that time that she was one of the stockholders represented by the committee That they were not disturbed by her ownership of stock is, of course, evidenced by the stipulation filed in the equity action two days later specifically waiving any such disqualification.

Under all the circumstances, the following from the concurring opinion in the Lindsay-Strathmore case, supra [182 Cal. 315, 187 P. 1065], appears appropriate: "It would seem * * * intolerable to permit a party to play fast and loose with the administration of justice by deliberately standing by without making an objection of which he is aware and thereby permitting the proceedings to go to a conclusion which he may acquiesce in, if favorable, and which he may avoid, if not." We conclude, therefore, that appellants did not present their objection at the "earliest practicable opportunity" as required by section 170, supra, and that any disqualification of Judge Vickers was waived by their failure to comply with the provisions of the statute.

Others grounds relating to the jurisdiction of the court to make the orders of May 8 have been decided adversely to appellants in the companion case, Cal.Sup., 139 P.2d 908.

The order is affirmed.

Rehearing Denied July 22, 1943.

A final judgment may not be attacked in equity for fraud unless the alleged fraud is extrinsic or collateral, such as where an unsuccessful party to an action has been kept in ignorance thereof or has been prevented from fully participating therein.

2. Insurance 🔑44

Where stockholders and policyholders of old insurance company in statutory rehabilitation proceeding knew of alleged conspiracy and false representations of insolvency which led to rehabilitation agreement, had notice of hearings upon petition for approval of rehabilitation agreement and were represented in court, they were not prevented from fully litigating the question of insolvency so as to establish extrinsic fraud as ground for setting aside orders in the proceeding.

3. Trial 🔑45(1)

In action to set aside orders in statutory proceeding for rehabilitation of insurance company on ground of fraud in instituting statutory proceeding, wherein pleadings disclosed policyholders' knowledge of alleged fraud and there was no explanation of failure to fully litigate issue, offers of proof which did not tend to show that defendants had prevented policyholders from proving the alleged collusion and fraud were properly rejected.

4. Insurance 🔑44

Notice to stockholders and policyholders of order appointing insurance commissioner conservator of insurance company was not essential to validity of proceeding.

5. Insurance 🔑44

Order appointing insurance commissioner conservator of insurance company was not subject to attack for fraud unless subsequent order approving acts of commissioner were first set aside for fraud.

6. Trial 🔑59(2)

In action to set aside orders in statutory rehabilitation proceeding for fraud, trial court properly permitted placing in evidence a printed copy of judgment roll used on appeal from an order approving acts of insurance commissioner as conservator, as against objection that offer was premature, under statute providing that the order of proof is in the sound discretion of the trial court. Code Civ.Proc. § 2042.

7. Appeal and error 🔑1052(2)

Objection that transcript of related appeal was incomplete became immaterial when trial court permitted copies of omitted orders to be placed in evidence.

8. Appeal and error 🔑1052(2)

Where transcript of judgment roll used in related appeal was certified by clerk of Supreme Court as true copy of original transcript which theretofore had been certified by clerk of trial court in related appeal, error, if any, in admitting transcript was not prejudicial.

9. Insurance 🔑44

Where record showed that issue of insolvency or hazardous financial condition of insurance company seized by insurance commissioner for rehabilitation purposes was in fact litigated, orders in statutory proceeding for rehabilitation of insurance company were not void on the ground of absence of jurisdictional fact of insolvency.

10. Insurance ⚷44

In action to set aside orders in statutory proceeding for rehabilitation of insurance company based on insolvency of company, amended answers alleging a good will value of approximately one-third of value alleged in original answer and that good will value did not constitute assets for purpose of determining solvency did not constitute admission of solvency so as to permit setting aside orders.

Fact of ownership by insurance commissioner of policies in delinquent insurer did not disqualify commissioner from transferring stock of company organized for rehabilitation purposes to voting trust. Pol.Code, §§ 920, 922; St.1935, pp. 547, 773, §§ 1043, 12901; St.1941, p. 2935, § 12901.

Pendency of appeals in statutory proceeding for rehabilitation of insurance company did not suspend trial court's jurisdiction to enter judgment in action to set aside orders in statutory proceeding, where no abatement or continuance was sought in the later action.

13. Abatement and revival ⚷16

Pendency of an appeal in one action is not a bar to the maintenance of a second action raising similar issues if no abatement or continuance is sought at trial of the second action.

14. Judgment ⚷9

Where parties to proceedings to set aside orders in statutory rehabilitation proceeding stipulated to waiver of disqualification of judge whose sister owned stock in delinquent insurer under statute relating to disqualification of judges, and waiver was not specifically limited to ownership by sister of stock, unawareness of plaintiff when signing stipulation that sister was a member of two stockholders' committees, one of which was a party to proceedings to set aside orders, did not render judgment void. Code Civ.Proc. § 170, subds. 2–5.

15. Judges ⚷51(4)

In action to set aside orders in statutory proceeding for rehabilitation of insurance company, trial court properly granted a motion to strike statement of disqualification where statement disclosed on its face that it was without substance.

16. Judges ⚷51(4)

A judge has no jurisdiction to pass upon his own disqualification, but where the statement of disqualification is legally insufficient, he may disregard it or strike it from the record.

GIBSON, Chief Justice.

This appeal presents another phase of the protracted litigation which has followed the seizure of the business and assets of the Pacific Mutual Life Insurance Company of California by the insurance commissioner for purposes of rehabilitation or liquidation. Since that time the legality of the seizure, the lawfulness of the plan of rehabilitation through organization of a new company, the propriety of an order providing for liquidation of the old company, and the validity of a voting trust agreement under which the stock of the new company was transferred from the commissioner to five voting trustees, have been upheld in a sequence of decisions on appeal. Carpenter v. Pacific Mutual Life Ins. Co., 10 Cal.2d 307, 74 P.2d 761, affirmed in Neblett v. Carpenter, 305 U.S. 297, 59 S.Ct. 170, 83 L.Ed. 182; Id., 13 Cal.2d 306, 89 P.2d 637; Id., 14 Cal.2d 704, 711, 96 P.2d 796; Caminetti v. Pacific Mutual Life Ins. Co., Cal.Sup., 139 P.2d 908, and Id., Cal.Sup., 139 P.2d 930, this day filed. All prior attacks were made in the statutory proceeding. The present appeal, however, arises out of a contemporaneous, independent action in equity in which certain policyholders and stockholders of the old company seek to annul all orders and steps taken in that proceeding. After an extended trial, judgment went against plaintiffs and they noticed an appeal. The separate appeal of the commissioner from that portion of the judgment sustaining the validity of the voting trust is controlled and determined by our decision in Caminetti v. Pacific Mutual Life Ins. Co., 139 P.2d 908. That decision is also determinative of all questions raised by plaintiffs with respect to validity of the voting trust.

[1, 2] Plaintiffs' principal contention is that all orders in the statutory proceeding should be set aside for fraud. It is well settled that a final judgment may not be attacked in equity upon this ground unless the alleged fraud is extrinsic or collateral, such as where "an unsuccessful party to an action has been kept in ignorance thereof * * * or has been prevented from fully participating therein." Westphal v. Westphal, 20 Cal.2d 393, 397, 126 P.2d 105, 107; see, also, Olivera v. Grace, 19 Cal.2d 570, 122 P.2d 564, 140 A.L.R. 1328; Hammell v. Britton, 19 Cal.2d 72, 119 P.2d 333; Horton v. Horton, 18 Cal.2d 579, 116 P.2d 605. In an effort to bring the present action within this rule plaintiffs urge that certain of the defendants conspired to deprive them of their rights in the assets of the old company by falsely declaring it insolvent and instituting the statutory proceeding wherein court approval was obtained of the commissioner's acts and the rehabilitation plan, and that the stockholders and policyholders were prevented from showing in the statutory proceeding the facts as to the conspiracy and lack of insolvency of the old company.

Portions of the record in the statutory proceeding were introduced upon the trial of this cause. It appears therefrom that the alleged conspiracy and false representations of insolvency here relied on were advanced in that proceeding by plaintiffs herein and other intervening stockholders and policyholders, including appellant Neblett, and were presented to the court on October 8, 1936. Certain of the policyholders and stockholders, however, then withdrew all objections on these grounds. Neblett and others produced no evidence of fraud and conspiracy in support of their objections, which were rejected by the court upon motion of the commissioner. The order of December 4, 1936, approving the rehabilitation agreement and all acts of the commissioner, recites that the court had considered all objections and had afforded full opportunity to all persons to be heard. Even if we were to accept plaintiffs' contention that the issues had been completely withdrawn from the statutory proceeding and that absence of fraud was not a necessary incident to the matters determined by the order of December 4, 1936, it would avail them nothing. The record therein shows that the plaintiffs then knew of the alleged conspiracy and false representations of insolvency, that they had notice of the hearings upon the petition for approval of the rehabilitation agreement, and, further, that they were represented in court. It follows that they were not prevented from fully litigating these matters, and the trial court herein correctly concluded that plaintiffs did not establish extrinsic fraud. (See 3 Freeman on Judgments, 5th Ed. 1925, 2533, § 1218).

[3] Nor do we find any error in the rulings of the trial court in rejecting certain offers of proof directed to the fraud issue. These offers did not tend to show that defendants had prevented plaintiffs from proving the alleged collusion and fraud in the statutory proceeding. And no effort is made to explain the fact that the pleadings in that proceeding disclose that plaintiffs then knew of the alleged fraud, nor do they explain the failure to there fully litigate the issue. Hammell

v. Britton, supra, 19 Cal.2d at page 80, 119 P.2d 333. It must be concluded therefore that no prejudice resulted from the rulings.

[4, 5] Plaintiffs cannot make out a case of extrinsic fraud by asserting that the order of August 11, 1936, appointing the commissioner conservator, was obtained by collusion and false representation and without notice to the stockholders or policyholders. Notice thereof was not essential (Carpenter v. Pacific Mutual Life Ins. Co., 13 Cal.2d 306, 89 P.2d 637), and the order was merely preliminary to the order of December 4, 1936, in which the acts of the commissioner were approved (see Carpenter v. Pacific Mutual Life Ins. Co., 10 Cal.2d 307, 323, 74 P.2d 761), and it is not subject to attack unless the latter order is first set aside for fraud.

[6-8] We find no error in the ruling permitting defendants to place in evidence a printed copy of the judgment roll used on the appeal from the order of December 4, 1936. Carpenter v. Pacific Mutual Life Ins. Co., 10 Cal.2d 307, 74 P.2d 761. Plaintiffs' objection that the offer was premature is disposed of by a reference to section 2042 of the Code of Civil Procedure which provides that the order of proof is in the sound discretion of the trial court. The objection that the transcript was incomplete became immaterial when the trial court permitted plaintiffs to place in evidence copies of the omitted orders. Equally without merit is plaintiffs' contention that the transcript was not properly certified. Examination discloses that it was certified by the clerk of this court as a true copy of the original transcript which theretofore had been certified by the clerk of the trial court, and the error, if any, in admitting it in this form was not prejudicial.

[9] There is no merit in plaintiffs' contention that all orders in the statutory proceeding are void because of the absence of a jurisdictional fact, namely, insolvency or hazardous financial condition of the old company when seized in 1936. Contrary to plaintiffs' argument, the transcript of that proceeding discloses that the issue was there raised and litigated. The initial petition under which the commissioner was appointed conservator alleged insolvency, and the petition for approval of the rehabilitation agreement and of all acts of the commissioner alleged that further transaction of business by the company would be hazardous. The pleadings and objections in opposition thereto alleged solvency of the old company. Evidence was adduced upon the matter, and, finally, the order of December 4, 1936, recited that at the time of its seizure the old company was in such condition that further transaction of business would be hazardous to all concerned. The issue of insolvency was not removed from the statutory proceeding, as contended by plaintiffs, by reason of orders made therein on September 25 and October 8, 1936. The order of September 25, together with a petition filed on the same day, was but a means of amending the petition to approve the rehabilitation agreement and does not evidence an intent to remove the insolvency issue. The order of October 8 merely corrected a prior order nunc pro tunc to conform to the facts by indicating that the issue had not then been determined by the court. The record in the statutory proceeding discloses that the issue was in fact litigated. Cf. Carpenter v. Pacific Mutual Life Ins. Co., 13 Cal.2d 306, 315, 89 P.2d 637.

[10] It is claimed that defendant's answers herein admit the company was solvent, thus bringing this case within the rule that where a party admits facts showing invalidity of a judgment valid on its face it must be set aside. Akley v. Bassett, 189 Cal. 625, 630-639, 209 P. 576; Thompson v. Cook, 20 Cal.2d 564, 569-573, 127 P.2d 909. As originally filed the answers alleged a good will or going concern value but made no mention of the company's liabilities which may have been greater. As amended, the answers alleged that these intangibles were worth approximately one-third of the value first alleged and that they did not constitute assets for the purpose of determining solvency, hazardous condition, etc. It is clear, therefore, that the amended answers do not constitute admissions of solvency.

[11] The contention that ownership of policies in the company by the former commissioner invalidated the rehabilitation agreement is completely answered by our holding in Caminetti v. Pacific Mutual Life Insurance Co., 139 P.2d 908, disposing of a similar attack upon the validity of the voting trust.

[12, 13] Plaintiffs contend that the pendency of appeals in the statutory proceeding served to suspend or terminate the trial court's jurisdiction to enter the judgment in this action. The cases cited by plaintiffs are distinguishable in that they relate to the suspension of a trial court's jurisdiction in the same case in which the appeal was pending. Pendency of an appeal in one action is not a bar to the maintenance of a second action raising similar issues if, as here, no abatement or continuance is sought at trial of the second action. Pellissier v. Title Guarantee etc. Co., 208 Cal. 172, 280 P. 947.

[14] Finally, plaintiffs urge that the judgment is void because entered by a judge who was disqualified by relationship to one of the parties. There is no merit in this contention. Shortly after commencement of the trial the judge announced that he had discovered that his sister owned stock in the old company. Two days thereafter the parties signed and filed a stipulation waiving any disqualification of the judge "which may now exist under subdivisions 2, 3, 4 or 5 of section 170 of the Code of Civil Procedure, or which may arise under those subdivisions * * * specifically including but not limited to, the ownership by his sister of stock" in the company. Plaintiffs attempt to escape the effect of the stipulation by stating that when signed they were unaware that the judge's sister was a "member" of two stockholders' committees, one of which is a party herein. A similar contention was determined adversely in Caminetti v. Pacific Mutual Life Insurance Co., Cal. Sup., 139 P. 2d 930.

The terms of the stipulation are sufficiently broad to embrace any disqualification resulting from such stock ownership, including the sister's participation in the activities of the stockholders' committee. And, as must have been known by plaintiffs, the committee was a party of record at the time the stipulation was signed.

[15, 16] Nor do we find any error in the trial court's action granting a motion to strike the statement of disqualification. It is true a judge has no jurisdiction to pass upon his own disqualification, but where the statement of disqualification is legally insufficient and is based on frivolous grounds, he may disregard it or strike it from the record. People v. Hooper, 16 Cal.App.2d 704, 61 P.2d 370; People v. Sweet, 19 Cal.App.2d 392, 65 P.2d 899; Ephraim v. Superior Court, 42 Cal.App.2d 578, 109 P.2d 378. The statement of disqualification filed in this case recited the stipulation above referred to and disclosed on its face that it was without substance. The trial judge therefore properly granted the motion to strike the statement of disqualification.

I dissent.

By this independent action in equity certain policyholders and stockholders of the Pacific Mutual Life Insurance Company of California seek to annul, on the ground of extrinsic fraud, all orders made in the statutory proceeding by which the commissioner took over the assets of that company and sought to rehabilitate it. These plaintiffs appeal from the judgment upholding all of such orders. The commissioner separately appeals from that portion of the judgment sustaining the validity of the orders relating to the voting trust fully discussed in Caminetti v. Pacific Mutual Life Ins. Co. (Neblett), Cal.Sup., 139 P.2d 908. I agree with the majority opinion insofar as it affirms the judgment holding that none of the orders was affected by extrinsic fraud. I disagree with that opinion insofar as it affirms that portion of the judgment upholding the orders relating to the voting trust. For reasons fully stated in the dissent in Caminetti v. Pacific Mutual Life Ins. Co. (Neblett), supra, 139 P.2d 921, that portion of the judgment should be reversed.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Walter S. Gates, Judge.

Action by Frank Emery Tiffany against George A. Short and others for dissolution of a partnership, for an accounting, and for appointment of a receiver, wherein the defendants filed a cross-complaint. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendants appeal.

SHENK, Justice.

The plaintiff commenced this action for the dissolution of a partnership, for an accounting and for the appointment of a receiver. Defendants filed a cross-complaint seeking rescission of the contract. The court decreed a dissolution of the partnership, and made an order settling the account. On their appeal the defendants contend that the evidence supports the issue raised by their cross-complaint and that the trial court erred in finding that fraud was not committed by the plaintiff. They also urge error in the trial court's division of the assets of the partnership upon dissolution.

On February 17, 1940, the plaintiff, Tiffany, and the defendants Short and Hill, entered into a written "Joint Venture Agreement" for the production and sale of an ultraviolet ray device designed to "prevent and cure and alleviate deafness." The device had been developed by Tiffany and he was to supervise its manufacture in his own laboratory. Short was to advance sums from time to time to carry on the work. Hill was to assist with the sale of the product. The "Net income" was to be shared equally by the parties. Short advanced $2,060 before the dissension arose, which was about four months after the agreement had been signed and work on the enterprise had commenced. In June Hill asked Tiffany for an accounting. The request was not complied with. Tiffany suggested a purchase by him of the interests of Short and Hill for $2,060 plus interest at 7% from March 1, 1940. Tiffany was given an option to purchase until August 20, 1940. The option was not exercised. Negotiations continued until some time in March, 1941, when counsel for Hill and Short demanded an accounting. Tiffany thereupon filed the present action.

The defendants contend that they are entitled to a rescission not only on the ground of fraud but on the additional ground of failure of consideration. They charged fraud in that Tiffany had represented that the instrument or device was already perfected and would be demonstrated at the Hard of Hearing Congress in June 1940, but that no such demonstration was made; that he would obtain Letters Patent covering the ultra-violet ray device, but that no steps were taken to that end; that certain tools were his own property which he had in fact purchased with partnership funds; and that he claimed to have paid prices for tubes and transformers higher than he actually paid. Tiffany's account charged the joint venture with an expenditure of $750 during the first five months of operations for rental of his own laboratory and for his own services. The written agreement did not provide for those items. There was evidence that one of the devices had been sold, but that it was not manufactured from partnership materials. The manufacture of five or six other sets had been completed.

[1] The evidence on the issue of fraud was in substantial conflict. It was therefore an issue for the trial court to determine. It found that there was no fraud in the inducement of the contract and concluded that the defendants were not entitled to rescission.

There is merit in the defendants' contention that the court's division of assets was erroneous. It was found that of the $2,060 advanced by Short, the plaintiff had paid out $1,506.04 with authority, and was chargeable with a balance of $553.96 as unauthorized expenditures, but that the latter expenditures had not been made with fraudulent intent. The court rendered judgment in favor of the defendants for $369.47, a two-thirds share of the $553.96 and allowed the plaintiff to retain one-third thereof. The court appointed a receiver to sell the assets of the partnership and ordered distribution of the proceeds one-third to each party.

[2, 3] The trial court found that the agreement was a joint venture. The general rule applicable to dissolution in such cases is that in the absence of an express agreement to the contrary, the person advancing capital is entitled to its return before there is a division of income or profits. The rule is stated in 47 Corpus Juris 1172, section 861 as follows: "Upon dissolution of a firm the capital remaining after payment of the debts should be divided in accordance with the respective interests of the partners. While it has been said that, in the absence of any evidence showing a contrary intent, capital will be divided equally the general rule is that each partner is entitled to the amount of capital that he contributed, this being regarded as a debt of the firm to be repaid in whole if the firm assets are sufficient, and pro rata if firm assets are insufficient." It is further stated (page 1173) that a partner contributing only services is ordinarily not entitled to a share of capital on dissolution. See also 47 C.J. 1163-1164, secs. 848, 849; 30 Am. Jur. 690, 704, secs. 27, 51, and cases cited. The decision in Guldstrand v. Johnson, Carvell & Murphy (a corporation), 37 Cal. App.2d 610, 99 P.2d 1065, is in accord with this general rule. That was an action for an accounting in a joint venture. The trial court found that the defendant by the terms of the agreement was to furnish the capital necessary to make all purchases of stock and materials and that it was not entitled to a refund of the money spent for that purpose. On appeal the judgment was reversed. The reviewing court concluded from the terms of the agreement and the statements rendered in the previous four and one-half years' business that the funds were to be considered as an advance, and that therefore the defendant was to receive credit and be reimbursed for such expenditures. Since the amount remaining was insufficient to reimburse the defendant, plaintiff recovered nothing. In the present case there was no specific agreement as to division of assets upon dissolution. Therefore a division and distribution into equal parts before the return of capital, all of which had been advanced by one partner, would be improper. None of the manufactured devices had been distributed by the partnership. There had been no sales. It is clear from the terms of the agreement that the funds furnished by defendant Short were in the nature of advances, since they were to be furnished by him "until such time as the revenues and net income from the above-mentioned enterprises shall suffice to make further investment unnecessary." On dissolution the profits could be measured only after Short had been reimbursed. There was no agreement to the contrary and his advancements were therefore a debt of the firm.

The judgment should be and it is hereby modified to provide that, in lieu of the present provision relating to money judgment and division of proceeds from the sale of assets, the defendant George A. Short is entitled to the sum of $553.96 as against the plaintiff Tiffany; that the receiver shall proceed to sell the assets of the partnership and apply the proceeds first to the payment of the sum of $1,506.04 to the defendant Short, and that any remaining proceeds be distributed one-third to each of the parties, the one-third share of the plaintiff to be applied on the judgment of $553.96 in favor of the defendant Short until such judgment is satisfied.

As so modified, the judgment is affirmed.

Appeal from Superior Court, Marin County; Edward I. Butler, Judge.

Action by Robert Humphreys against the San Francisco Area Council, Boy Scouts of America, a corporation, and others, for the death of plaintiff's minor son from injuries sustained while riding in defendant's motor truck from a Boy Scout Camp, at which deceased was attending and employed, to a nearby city. Judgment for defendants and plaintiff appeals.

D. J. O'Brien, Jr., of San Francisco, and John H. Corning, Freitas, Duffy & Keating, Carlos R. Freitas, and Jerome A. Duffy, all of San Rafael, for respondents.

GIBSON, Chief Justice.

This action was brought for damages arising out of the death of plaintiff's 15 year old son, Robert Humphreys, Jr. The boy was attending an encampment of boy scouts conducted by the defendant San Francisco Area Council, Boy Scouts of America, a charitable corporation, at Camp Lilienthal, located about two miles from Fairfax in Marin County. At the time of the accident he was riding in a truck driven by another boy scout, Francis Kuckein, who was employed by defendant council and at the time was operating the truck in the scope of such employment. The court, trying the case without a jury, concluded that although the driver of the truck was negligent, Robert "was a guest * * * and not a passenger," and accordingly rendered judgment for the defendants. Since it is not claimed that the death of the boy resulted from the intoxication or wilful misconduct of the driver, the judgment must be affirmed if the court correctly concluded Robert accepted the ride as a guest without giving compensation therefor. (Vehicle Code, § 403, St.1935, p. 154.)

Boy Scouts attending Camp Lilienthal who supplied and cooked their own food were furnished lodging and other camp facilities without charge. Those scouts who received their meals from the camp paid seven dollars weekly. It was the practice to select some of the more mature scouts to act as "staff members" who were classified as "seniors" and "juniors," also called "leaders." The members of the senior staff were young men between 19 and 22 years of age who acted as vocational directors, health and safety counselors or in similar capacities. They received a small wage in addition to board and lodging. The junior staff members were younger scouts, selected by the camp director from among boys who possessed particular qualifications and whom he was grooming for senior staff duties. The juniors acted as assistants to the seniors and performed various other duties about the camp. They received only board and lodging for their work. Robert was a junior staff member and he acted as bugler and operated the camp canteen where candy, ice-cream and soda water were sold.

Privileges not enjoyed by other boys were granted to staff members as a group. They were given a watermelon or ice-cream "feed" at staff meetings held on Sunday nights and were privileged to have affairs in the lodge to the exclusion of other boys. They were allowed to remain up later at night than others and were permitted, when going to and from Fairfax, to ride on the camp "pick-up truck" which was used to carry baggage and supplies. Seven staff members were called as witnesses by the defendants and testified to facts concerning the accident. In response to questions asked on direct examination, three seniors testified they received as compensation board and room plus a small salary. Four juniors testified that the only compensation they received for services was room and board. One junior member questioned on cross-examination as to whether the practice of allowing staff members to ride in the truck was the result of a "blanket permission" given by the camp director or if it was necessary "to go to him in each instance and ask him for specific permission" stated, "I have always asked him personally." Concerning the purposes for which the truck was maintained, the camp director, Dickieson, testified as follows:

"Q. What was that Plymouth truck used for in the year 1939? A. It was used principally for bringing baggage from the gas station where the boys would leave it when they came to camp, so that they wouldn't have to pack their baggage up; to drive to Fairfax and pick up mail and provisions the boys doing their own cooking would want bought, and that was all.

"Q. They picked up the baggage of the boys coming into camp and took the baggage for the boys leaving? A. Yes."

"Q. Was the main purpose of the pickup truck to give the staff members transportation, or was the main purpose something other than that? A. You mean the reason for us having that?

"Q. Yes. A. No. The reason for the pickup truck was to—pardon—to move—pick up the boys' baggage down town, to pick up the supplies—commissary supplies—in the city, week-ends when I would go in. No; the truck was not used—I mean, we did not have the truck for the purpose of carrying the leaders at all."

With reference to the practice or policy of permitting the staff members transportation on the truck, Mr. Dickieson testified: "there was no particular arrangement at all * * * if the staff members wanted to go down to town once in a while, why, we had no objection to them getting a lift down * * * there was nothing said about it. I mean, we didn't make any provision to that effect but they were at least, at any rate, permitted to go down. It was a common practice * * * that they did go back and forth in the truck. * * * Boys were permitted to ride on the pickup truck * * * on regular trips only * * * a special trip would not be made to give any boy a ride except in case of an emergency." Dickieson testified further that at the time Robert was selected as a junior staff member there was no "agreement, discussion, or talk of any kind about his being entitled, as a part of his compensation, to ride up and down the hill on this truck."

It is conceded that on the day of the accident Robert was on a purely personal mission. Plaintiff states in his opening brief "that the purpose of [Robert's] trip was not connected with his employment and was for his own benefit." Plaintiff also concedes that the privilege of riding in the truck "is not a matter of right in the sense that the privileges thus enjoyed are part of the contract of employment and are enforceable as such. * * *" There is no evidence that at the time the staff members were selected anything was said about permission being given them to ride on the truck on its regular trips to and from Fairfax, nor is there any direct evidence that such privilege served to induce scouts to seek or retain staff membership or was considered a part of the compensation for services performed by them.

The court found "that * * * Robert Humphreys, Jr., and Francis Kuckein were members of the Boys Scouts of America and were, and each of them was employed by the San Francisco Area Council, Inc., Boy Scouts of America, a corporation, at the said 'Camp Lilienthal' in the capacity of Junior Staff Members; that the duties of the said Robert Humphreys, Jr. by virtue of the said employment consisted of operating the canteen and assisting in the supervision and training of members of Boy Scouts of America, and the duties of said Francis Kuckein by virtue thereof consisted, in part, of operating the said Plymouth truck automobile between the said camp and the said city of Fairfax; * * * that the services performed by the said Robert Humphreys, Jr. were rendered in consideration of his receiving from said defendant, as a matter of contractual right, board and lodgings only at said Camp Lilienthal; that it is true that all junior staff members of said camp, including the said Robert Humphreys, Jr., and all of whom performed services for said defendant, were privileged to receive, and actually did receive transportation to and from Camp Lilienthal in the said Plymouth truck automobile which was maintained, in part, for said purpose, and that all other members of the said Camp Lilienthal not performing services of some sort, and therefore not having the status of Junior Staff Members, did not have said privilege and actually did not receive said transportation; that said privilege was revocable at any time at the will of said defendants or either of them."

It was further found: "that at said time the said Robert Humphreys, Jr. was riding in said truck from Camp Lilienthal to the city of Fairfax on a misson personal to himself; that * * * the said Robert Humphreys, Jr. was riding in said truck by virtue of the privilege afforded him by the defendant San Francisco Area Council, Inc., Boy Scouts of America * * * that * * * while acting in the scope of his said employment * * * the said Francis Kuckein did then and there drive the said Plymouth truck automobile in a negligent and careless manner and by reason thereof the automobile did leave said highway, overturn and fall with great force and violence into a ravine adjacent thereto."

The court concluded: "that at said time Robert Humphreys, Jr. was a guest in said Plymouth truck automobile and not a passenger therein by virtue of his employment by the said San Francisco Area Council, Inc., Boy Scouts of America, a corporation, or otherwise * * * that plaintiff is not entitled to judgment against defendants or either of them."

Plaintiff does not contend that the quoted findings are not supported by the evidence, but argues that the conclusion that the deceased was a "guest" and not a "passenger" is erroneous under the facts found. The question thus presented is whether as a matter of law the record compels a contrary conclusion.

[1-3] Section 403 of the Vehicle Code provides that: "No person who as a guest accepts a ride in any vehicle upon a highway without giving compensation for such ride, nor any other person, has any right of action for civil damages against the driver of such vehicle or against any other person legally liable for the conduct of such driver on account of personal injury to or the death of such guest during such ride, unless the plaintiff in any such action establishes that such injury or death proximately resulted from the intoxication or wilful misconduct of said driver." The designations "passenger" and "guest" have been adopted for the purpose of distinguishing a person who has given compensation within the meaning of the statute from one carried gratuitously. Cf. McCann v. Hoffman, 9 Cal.2d 279, 282, 70 P.2d 909; Whitechat v. Guyette, 19 Cal.2d 428, 430, 122 P.2d 47. Although benefits or considerations other than cash or its equivalent may be "compensation," there is no compensation if the transportation is intended and received as a mere gratuity—a question for the trier of fact upon proper evidence. See Restatement, Torts § 490; Darling v. Dreamland B. & U. Co., 44 Cal.App.2d 253, 256-258, 112 P.2d 338; Carey v. City of Oakland, 44 Cal.App.2d 503, 508-510, 112 P.2d 714; cf. McCann v. Hoffman, supra; Whitechat v. Guyette, supra; Druzanich v. Criley, 19 Cal.2d 439, 122 P.2d 53; Jenkins v. National Paint & Varnish Co., 17 Cal.App.2d 161, 61 P.2d 780. A benefit would be received if the transportation was within the terms of the employment, or part of the agreed consideration for the work, or was directed by the employer during working hours, or was furnished to facilitate or speed a task the employee was to perform (see (1938) 26 Cal.L.Rev. 251, 254-255; (1938) 51 Harvard L.Rev. 545; Knutson v. Lurie, 217 Iowa 192, 251 N.W. 147; Hall v. Smith, 283 Mass. 166, 185 N.E. 850; Kruy v. Smith, 108 Conn. 628, 144 A. 304; Russell v. Parlee, 115 Conn. 687, 163 A. 404; Monison v. McCoy, 266 Mich. 693, 256 N.W. 49; White v. Gregory, 161 Va. 414, 170 S.E. 739; cf. McGrath v. Parson, 312 Mass. 476, 45 N.E.2d 384); but none of these factors are found in the present case, for it is conceded that the trip "was not connected with [Robert's] employment" and constituted no part of his contractual compensation. Plaintiff cites California Cas. Indem. Exch. v. Industrial Acc. Comm., 21 Cal.2d 461, 132 P.2d 815, in which this court affirmed an award of compensation under the Workmen's Compensation Act for an injury suffered by an employee while riding home in the employer's automobile where the transportation was regularly furnished to employees. In that case, however, there was testimony that the employee, when hired, understood that transportation to and from work would be provided by the employer, and the court held that the facts were sufficient to support an inference there was an implied agreement to furnish such transportation.

Plaintiff argues that it is reasonable to infer that the continued practice or custom of permitting staff members (a privilege restricted to them alone) to ride in the truck to and from Fairfax was known to all potential staff members and served as an inducement for them to accept employment and to keep them satisfied in their employment and that this, as part of a business relationship, constituted "giving compensation" within the meaning of section 403, supra. The trial court, however, refused to so infer, and the question is not whether it is reasonable to draw the inference but whether the court was compelled to do so as a matter of law because of the existence of the practice or custom here involved.

[4, 5] It is true, of course, that in some situations the existence of a practice or custom of furnishing transportation to employees might permit or even require the drawing of an inference that all rides were given not as a mere gratuity but with the purpose of inducing employees to accept or retain employment. Under the facts of the present case, however, we cannot hold as a matter of law that the privilege extended to junior staff members to ride on the truck was not a gratuity but was an inducement to the employment or was otherwise a part of a business relationship. In this connection we must keep in mind that, as stipulated at the trial, the defendant council is a charitable corporation "not conducted for any profit whatsoever" and that in none of its operations "is it in anywise akin to a business enterprise." This organization is engaged in the spiritual, physical and mental development of the youth of America. While attending this encampment Robert was not just an employee. He was a boy scout enjoying a vacation paid for in part by services performed and receiving at the same time training as a member of this organization. And no doubt junior staff members, like certain other scouts, were to some extent recipients of charitable benefits. The charitable functions of defendant council are considered, of course, only in connection with the nature of the relationship existing between it and the scouts attending Camp Lilienthal as one of the circumstances tending to show that the privileges accorded staff members might reasonably be regarded as gratuities rather than something bought and paid for. These privileges or preferences, as indicated by their nature, appear to have been small courtesies that went with rank. They included permission to have staff affairs in the lodge and the liberty to remain up later at night than other boys, as well as leave to ride on the truck. The privileges were not related to duties connected with employment, and although only staff members had jobs, the character and nature of their work was varied while the privileges went to the staff as a group. These advantages might more properly be considered a part of scout training and a reward for faithful application of the principles they had been taught in their boy scout work rather than a part of a business relationship.

[6] In support of the contention that the trial court was bound as a matter of law to infer from the practice of permitting staff members or leaders to ride on the truck that the custom served as an inducement to Robert to accept or retain employment with defendant council, appellant calls attention to the finding of the court, in referring to such practice, that the truck "was maintained in part for said purpose." Although the uncontradicted evidence is to the contrary, the finding is supported by an admission in the pleadings. The fact, however, that the truck was maintained in part for the purpose of permitting staff members to ride thereon to and from camp did not require the court to conclude as a matter of law that compensation was given for the ride. The refusal of the court to draw the inference that the custom served as an inducement for Robert to accept or retain employment is a complete answer to appellant's argument. And regardless of whether or not the trier of fact reasonably could have inferred that the privilege was intended to or did foster a business relationship, we cannot hold that this must be true as a matter of law.

[7] Under the evidence the court was justified in concluding that the preference accorded staff members in permitting them to ride on the truck to and from the camp was a gratuity and that Robert Humphreys, Jr., was a guest "without giving compensation for such ride" within the meaning of section 403 supra. This conclusion forecloses recovery by plaintiff and makes unnecessary any discussion of other issues presented.

SHENK, CURTIS, EDMONDS, TRAYNOR, and SCHAUER, JJ., concurred.

CARTER, Justice (dissenting).

I dissent. In my opinion the facts of this case as found by the trial court do not bring the deceased, Robert Humphreys, Jr., within the purview of the guest statute (Vehicle Code, sec. 403) and plaintiff is therefore entitled to recover damages for his wrongful death which was admittedly caused as the result of the negligence of an employee of the defendant corporation.

The trial court found that deceased was an employee of defendant corporation, and as such employee was privileged to receive transportation to and from Camp Lilienthal in the Plymouth truck which was maintained, in part, for said purpose; that on the 2nd day of July, 1939, while deceased was riding in said Plymouth truck pursuant to such privilege an accident happened as the result of the negligence of the driver of the truck who was an employee of the defendant corporation, which resulted in the death of said deceased. The conclusion of law which must necessarily be deduced from these facts is that the deceased was a passenger in said Plymouth truck and was therefore not subject to the provisions of the so-called guest statute.

The majority opinion appears to be based in part upon the theory that because the defendant council is a charitable corporation, not conducted for profit, a different rule should be applied to it in determining whether or not persons transported in its motor vehicles are guests or passengers. In my opinion, this is a false quantity and is injected into the majority opinion for the purpose of supporting an obviously untenable conclusion. While it is true that the defendant corporation is not operated for profit, it is nevertheless liable in damages to those wrongfully injured as the result of the negligence of its employees in the operation of its motor vehicles where such injured persons do not come within the purview of the guest statute.

The sole question is whether or not the deceased was a passenger and not a guest in defendant's automobile at the time of the injury which resulted in his death.

The appeal of this case was first heard and determined by the District Court of Appeal, First Appellate District, Division Two, and an opinion filed therein prepared by the Honorable Maurice T. Dooling, Justice, pro tem., and concurred in by Presiding Justice Nourse and Associate Justice Spence of that division. By this opinion the judgment of the trial court was reversed as to respondent San Francisco Area Council Boy Scouts of America with directions to the trial court to try the issue of damages and enter judgment against such defendant for damages suffered by plaintiff as the result of the death of his son. I am in full accord with the views expressed in the opinion prepared by Mr. Justice Dooling, pro tem., in this case and consider said opinion an excellent example of judicial craftsmanship. I am adopting the following portion of said opinion as a part of this dissent [129 P.2d 118, 120]:

"This appeal presents primarily the question whether the facts found by the trial court support the conclusion of law above quoted. In approaching this question certain rules of law which have been worked out by the courts in construing the so-called guest statutes of this and other states should be borne in mind. Among these may be mentioned the following: 1. Being in derogation of the common law the guest laws must be construed strictly. Vehicle Code, § 403, St.1935, p. 154. Rocha v. Hulen, 6 Cal.App.2d 245, 254, 44 P.2d 478; Prager v. Isreal, 15 Cal.2d 89, 93, 98 P.2d 729. 2. In construing the law the courts should consider not only the language of the statute itself, but also the purpose of the enactment and the nature of the evil against which it was directed. McCann v. Hoffman, 9 Cal.2d 279, 282, 70 P.2d 909; Rocha v. Hulen, supra; Crawford v. Foster, 110 Cal.App. 81, 87, 293 P. 841. 3. That in order to take a person riding in an automobile out of the guest status it is not necessary that the compensation for the ride be a strict contractual consideration or that an enforceable contract relation relative to the ride should exist between the parties. Haney v. Takakura, 2 Cal.App.2d 1, 7, 37 P.2d 170, 38 P.2d 160; Scholz v. Leuer, 7 Wash.2d 76, 109 P.2d 294, 299; Peronto v. Cootware, 281 Mich. 664, 275 N.W. 724; Russell v. Parlee, 115 Conn. 687, 163 A. 404, 406. 4. That in construing such statutes consideration should not only be given to the meaning of the language 'without giving compensation for the ride' or its equivalent in other statutes, but also to the meaning of the word 'guest' as used in such statutes. Rocha v. Hulen, supra; Knutson v. Lurie, 217 Iowa 192, 251 N.W. 147, 149; Smith v. Clute, 277 N.Y. 407, 14 N.E.2d 455, 458. 5. That where the excursion is not purely social any benefit to the driver or owner of the automobile conferred or anticipated, or mutual benefit present or anticipated to the driver or owner and the person carried, is sufficient to take the case out of the statute. Crawford v. Foster, supra; Walker v. Adamson, 9 Cal.2d 287, 70 P.2d 914; Druzanich v. Criley, 19 Cal.2d 439, 122 P.2d 53; Carey v. City of Oakland, 44 Cal.App.2d 503, 112 P.2d 714; Duclos v. Tashjian, 32 Cal.App.2d 444, 90 P.2d 140; Boyson v. Porter, 10 Cal.App.2d 431, 52 P.2d 582.

"Thus, to enlarge somewhat upon the principles above stated, the court said in Crawford v. Foster, supra, 110 Cal.App. at page 87, 293 P. at page 843:

" 'It has been held that the terms of a statute should be construed with their intent and purpose in view. Evans v. Selma Union High School Dist., 193 Cal. 54, 222 P. 801, 31 A.L.R. 1121. The purpose and object that the Legislature had in mind sometimes throws light upon the meaning of the language used. The situation that this section was apparently designed to prevent is well known. As the use of automobiles became almost universal, the proverbial ingratitude of the dog that bites the hand that feeds him, found a counterpart in the many cases that arose, where generous drivers, having offered rides to guests, later found themselves defendants in cases that often turned upon close questions of negligence. Undoubtedly, the Legislature, in adopting this act, reflected a certain natural feeling as to the injustice of such a situation. Neither this feeling nor the reasons therefor apply to a situation arising out of an ordinary business transaction, such as the efforts of a dealer to sell an automobile to a customer.'

"In Rocha v. Hulen, supra, 6 Cal.App.2d at page 254, 44 P.2d at page 483, we find the following language:

" 'In all the cases having to do with guest statutes, it appears that the various courts have had distinctly in thought the question of whether the circumstances presented bring the case within the intent and purpose to be accomplished, and the evils to be remedied by the enactment of such statutes, as well as whether the plaintiff is within the language appearing in the statutes being considered.

" 'The common-law right of having redress for injuries wrongfully inflicted, being lessened by such statutes, necessitates strict construction, and also, that cases be not held within the provisions of such statutes unless it clearly appears that it should be so determined.'

"In construing the guest law Vehicle Code, § 403, St.1935, p. 154, our courts have determined that persons, in the following situations, among many others, were not within the meaning of the statute: A plumber being taken by the owner of land to look at a broken pump, although he had not contracted to repair it (Duclos v. Tashjian, supra); a person engaged with the driver in a joint business venture (Walker v. Adamson, supra); a friend accompanying a patient in an ambulance at the request of the ambulance driver (Carey v. City of Oakland, supra); a person who shared in the driving where the driver otherwise would not have undertaken the trip (Druzanich v. Criley, supra); a supporter of a candidate for public office while riding in an automobile loaned for the purpose of furthering the campaign (Boyson v. Porter, supra); a child riding in a school bus (Smith v. Fall River, etc., School Dist., 118 Cal.App. 673, 5 P.2d 930); a body riding with another to learn a paper route in the expectation that he might later take it over if a vacancy occurred. Sumner v. Edmunds, 130 Cal.App. 770, 21 P.2d 159.

"It may be said of these cases generally that they show a marked tendency on the part of our courts in construing our guest law to take a broad and realistic and not a narrow or technical legalistic view of the situation and relation of the parties in determining whether an injured occupant of an automobile was or was not a guest within the meaning of the statute at the time of receiving an injury.

"Turning to cases dealing directly with the transportation of an employee to or from his place of employment, where the carriage of the employee was not a matter of contract right, we have found the following: Kruy v. Smith, 108 Conn. 628, 144 A. 304; Russell v. Parlee, supra; White v. Gregory, 161 Va. 414, 170 S.E. 739; Garrett v. Hammack, 162 Va. 42, 173 S.E. 535; Monison v. McCoy, 266 Mich. 693, 256 N.W. 49; Peronto v. Cootware, supra; Knutson v. Lurie, supra; Bummer v. Liberty Laundry Co., 48 Cal.App.2d 648, 120 P.2d 672.

"In Kruy v. Smith, supra, a laundress was being transported to her employer's home in the employer's automobile when injured, instead of travelling by street railway as she was accustomed to do. The court reversed a judgment on a directed verdict for defendant. In construing the Connecticut guest law the court said at page 305 of 144 A.:

" 'The Legislature, when it used the word "guest," did not intend to include persons who are being transported for the mutual benefit of both the passenger and the operator or owner of the car, and, in determining whether the transportation was for the mutual benefit of both, not merely the act of transportation must be considered, but also any contract or relationship between the parties to which it was an incident.'

"In Russell v. Parlee, supra, the defendant owned a farm which was worked by one Grant. Grant employed the plaintiff to help him in the farm work and plaintiff was injured while being conveyed to the farm by defendant in defendant's automobile. The supreme court of errors of Connecticut in affirming a judgment for plaintiff based on simple negligence said at page 406 of 163 A.:

" 'We are here concerned, not with a relationship growing out of contract, as in the case of a bailment, but with the construction of a statute denying to a certain class of passengers in an automobile a right to recover compensation for injuries resulting from negligence in its operation, to which, prior to its enactment, they were entitled.

Its operation should not be extended beyond the correction of the evils and the attainment of the permissible social objects which, it may be assumed, were the inducing reasons for its enactment. Silver v. Silver, 280 U.S. 117, 122, 50 S.Ct. 57, 74 L.Ed. 221, 65 A.L.R. 939. It may well have appeared to the Legislature that there were sound social reasons for denying a recovery for negligence against one who was transporting in his automobile a member of his family or a social guest or casual invitee, in an action brought by the recipient of his hospitality, which would not exist where a mutual benefit growing out of the relationship of the parties was contemplated, even though the benefit to be received was incidental, and not a technical legal benefit which the parties by their contract had bargained for as the consideration for the transportation. * * * The person transported is not a guest within the meaning of the statute if the transportation is for the mutual benefit of both parties, and in determining whether it was for their mutual benefit the relationship between the parties to which it was an incident may be considered. * * *

" 'The arrangement between the defendant and Grant created an identity of interest between them in the cultivation of the garden, and the transportation of the plaintiff contemplated a benefit to her by expediting the necessary work in her garden, though the actual wages of the plaintiff were to be paid by Grant instead of herself.'

"In Monison v. McCoy, the supreme court of Michigan held by a divided court that a woman being driven to her home by defendant after having spent a week in defendant's home nursing his wife was entitled to recover for injuries received through simple negligence under the guest statute of that state. The majority opinion quoted from and relied on the case of Kruy v. Smith, supra.

"In the later case of Peronto v. Cootware, supra (281 Mich. 664, 275 N.W. 725), the supreme court of Michigan was called upon to apply its guest statute to the following facts, quoting from the opinion of the court:

" 'On December 15, 1935, Clarence's wife was sick. Clarence asked Leslie to go to Hardwood, get their mother, and bring her back to take care of his wife, authorizing Leslie to tell the mother that Clarence would pay her what it was worth. Leslie drove to Hardwood and told plaintiff what Clarence wanted and agreed to do. Plaintiff acquiesced in the request, and the next day, on the return trip, the car struck an icy spot in the road, ran over an embankment, and plaintiff was injured. She sued Leslie.

" 'The court held plaintiff not a guest passenger, submitted the case to the jury upon the issue of ordinary negligence, and plaintiff had verdict and judgment of $2,000 damages.

" 'No arrangement was made nor suggested that Leslie be paid for making the trip or for transporting plaintiff. His act was wholly gratuitous and as a favor to Clarence. The sole question upon liability is whether plaintiff was a guest passenger.

" 'Plaintiff made the trip, not for her own pleasure or on her own business, but in order to render a requested service for Clarence. Her presence in the car had no social aspect; nor did Leslie extend the invitation to ride as a matter of hospitality. The transportation was a business proposition. If Clarence had been in the place of Leslie, the case would be clear that plaintiff was not a guest (citing Monison v. McCoy, supra * * *). The fact that Leslie was an uncompensated volunteer can make no difference in his relations to plaintiff.'

"In White v. Gregory, 161 Va. 414, 170 S.E. 739, 740, the plaintiff was an employee of defendant Gregory. Gregory was an undertaker and plaintiff was at Gregory's funeral home to help care for the body of a woman. There being some delay Gregory said to plaintiff: 'How about you going and getting something to eat?' He then instructed another employee, the defendant Miller, to 'drive Mrs. White home.' The accident occurred on the way to plaintiff's home. The supreme court of appeals of Virginia said:

" 'The court is of opinion that these facts are sufficient to support a finding that the plaintiff was not a mere guest of either Miller or Gregory.'

"In Garrett v. Hammack [supra], the plaintiff was employed by defendant both in his home and his store. While defendant was driving her from home to store plaintiff was injured. The court said:

" 'The jury was warranted in finding that plaintiff was a passenger in the automobile of Garrett, and this court is unanimously of opinion that her right, if any, to recover against Garrett, should be based upon proof of ordinary negligence.'

"In Knutson v. Lurie, supra, plaintiff was a domestic servant in the home of defendant. She was injured through defendant's negligence while defendant was taking her to get a pair of shoes which plaintiff had left at a shop to be repaired. The supreme court of Iowa affirmed a judgment for plaintiff. While the court laid some emphasis on the fact that plaintiff took care of defendant's baby during the ride the court cited and quoted from Kruy v. Smith, supra, and Russell v. Parlee, supra, and commented:

"'After reading the foregoing cases, it becomes apparent that one may be an occupant of an automobile without being a guest or a mere invitee, and yet not be a passenger for hire. * * * Furthermore, it is manifest that in determining the benefit, it is proper to take into consideration "not merely the act of transportation * * * but also any contract or relationship between the parties to which it was an incident."' * * *

"We have discussed and quoted from these cases at length because in a variety of circumstances, and for somewhat divergent reasons, as is natural in the construction of a new type of legislation, these decisions have all shown a trend of judicial thought in one direction, that a servant or employee being carried to or from his place of employment in his employer's automobile is not a guest within the meaning of the guest statutes even though the carriage is a matter of privilege or accommodation and not of strict contractual right.

"Directly opposed to this trend of judicial thought is Bummer v. Liberty Laundry Co., 48 Cal.App.2d 648, 120 P.2d 672, 673. In that case an employee of the defendant after a change of the opening time of the laundry from 7 a.m. to 6 a.m. was informed by defendant's foreman that he would thereafter pick her up and bring her to work. This he did thereafter with one or two exceptions when he had another employee, Taylor, pick her up. On the date of injury Taylor, at the foreman's request, picked up plaintiff in a truck of the defendant and by his ordinary negligence she was injured on the way to the laundry. The trial court gave plaintiff judgment which was reversed by the District Court of Appeal. The court said:

"'Plaintiff testified that she had made no arrangement with the defendant to be furnished transportation to her work and there was no other evidence of compensation. Therefore, from the evidence which was received, defendant was merely extending a courtesy to plaintiff in providing transportation, for which she was not furnishing compensation.'

"The District Court of Appeal cited no authority for this conclusion, and did not consider or discuss any of the cases involving the master-servant relationship from other jurisdictions which we have enlarged upon above. No petition for hearing by our Supreme Court was filed in that case. Much as we hesitate to disagree with the conclusion of another court of equal jurisdiction, in the circumstances here present we feel that we should examine the proposition presented by this appeal in the light of the cited cases from other jurisdictions and the purpose and spirit of our guest law without feeling bound by the Bummer case as a controlling precedent.

"In assaying the factors pro and con in the case before us it is to be observed that the court found that one of the purposes for which the Plymouth truck was operated was to transport Junior Staff Members between the camp and Fairfax, that Junior Staff Members were privileged to receive and actually did receive such transportation to the exclusion of members of the camp not performing some sort of services, and that Humphreys, Jr., was riding in the truck by virtue of such privilege at the time that he received his fatal injuries. On the other side are the factors that Humphreys, Jr., was riding on a mission personal to himself, and that the privilege of riding was a revocable one and not a matter of contractual right.

"In weighing these factors one conclusion seems to us too clear for argument, that the ordinary boy accepting employment as a Junior Staff Member in the camp, in weighing the advantages, would take into consideration the fact that as an incident to his employment he would be furnished transportation in the camp truck to and from the town two miles distant and would not be apt to consider nor be at all concerned with the question whether such transportation was afforded him as a mere revocable privilege or as a matter of strict contractual right. The transportation, if not a consideration for, was at least an inducement to the employment. It must also be remembered as pointed out in Crawford v. Foster, supra, 110 Cal.App. at page 86, 293 P. at page 843:

"'While there are exceptions, notably in the case of persons staying at a hotel, in its ordinary use the word "guest" connotes something other than a business transaction.'

"Here as a part of the business of operating the camp the truck was maintained, according to the findings, partly for the very purpose of transporting Junior Staff Members to and from the town. The analogy of the hotel bus seems not inapt. The operation of such busses between hotel and station, as an accommodation to patrons but not as a matter of contract right, is not uncommon. Assume a patron who has paid his bill and checked out of the hotel injured by the negligence of the bus driver on the way to the station. Would any court countenance the defense that he had accepted a ride as a guest without giving compensation for such ride?

"Without going further than the facts of this case we are satisfied that where, as here, an employer not as an isolated or spontaneous single act of courtesy, but as a regular practice, affords transportation to its employees to and from the nearest town, and maintains an automobile in part for that very purpose, an employee riding to such town on an errand of his own by virtue of the privilege so afforded him is not within the spirit or the letter of our guest law, although the transportation is not a matter of contract right but a mere revocable privilege. The established and continuous character of the transportation so furnished to the employees indicates that it was regarded by the employer not as a mere social courtesy but as a business arrangement incident to the employment and of mutual benefit both to employer and employee.

"Respondent San Francisco Bay Area Council, Inc., Boy Scouts of America urges in support of the judgment that it is a charitable non-profit corporation and should as such be exempt from liability for the torts of its employees. A careful reading of Silva v. Providence Hospital, 14 Cal.2d 762, 97 P.2d 798 and England v. Good Samaritan Hospital, 14 Cal.2d 791, 97 P.2d 813, satisfies us that, while the precise question before the court in those cases was the liability of a charitable hospital to a paying patient, the effect of those decisions is to impose on charitable organizations in general the same liability for the negligence of employees as exists in the case of other employers."

In my opinion the judgment should be reversed.

1. Marriage 🔑58(7)

Finding that husband would not have entered into marriage if he had know of wife's previously existing intention not to have reasonable matrimonial intercourse with husband and that thereafter wife refused without cause to have such intercourse with husband supported decree annulling marriage on ground of "fraud".

See Words and Phrases, Permanent Edition, for all other definitions of "Fraud".

2. Equity 🔑65(2)

The act upon which equity may refuse relief to plaintiff because he did not come into court with "clean hands" must prejudicially affect defendant's rights, so that it would be inequitable to grant such relief.

See Words and Phrases, Permanent Edition, for all other definitions of "Clean Hands".

3. Equity 🔑65(2)

Every wrongful act and every fraud do not prevent a suitor in equity from obtaining relief, but his misconduct must be so intimately connected to the injury of another with the matter for which he seeks relief as to make it inequitable to accord him such relief, and it must have been conduct which if permitted inequitably affects the relationship between the parties.

4. Equity ⚿65(2)

Where husband at wife's request was sterilized before their marriage, husband under "clean hands" doctrine was not precluded from annullment of marriage on ground of wife's fraud in intending not to have reasonable matrimonial intercourse with him.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Diego County; Edward J. Kelly, Judge.

Action by John W. Wiley against Patricia Gross Wiley to annul a marriage. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appeals.

Reversed.

George R. Baird, of San Diego, (Robert W. Patterson, of San Francisco, of counsel), for appellant.

No appearance for respondent.

MARKS, Justice.

This is an appeal from a judgment refusing to annul the marriage of the parties because of alleged fraud of defendant. Defendant was regularly served with summons but did not appear in the action. The cause was heard as a default matter and defendant has made no appearance here.

The complaint contained the formal allegations usually found in cases of this kind. It was there alleged that prior to and at the time of the marriage ceremony defendant did not intend to have reasonable matrimonial intercourse with the plaintiff; that she concealed this intention from him; that thereafter she refused to have such intercourse with him without any cause or reason therefor, although plaintiff was able, ready and anxious to so consummate the marriage; that this refusal was against the will and without the consent of plaintiff who would not have entered into the marriage relationship with defendant had he known of her intention in this regard.

[1] The trial court found these allegations of the complaint to be true. This finding was sufficient to support a decree annulling the marriage. Millar v. Millar, 175 Cal. 797, 167 P. 394, L.R.A.1918B, 415, Ann.Cas.1918E, 184.

It was also found that prior to the marriage defendant represented to plaintiff that because of the condition of her health she feared to have children; that she made it a condition of marriage that he be sterilized; that he was so sterilized prior to the marriage ceremony.

The trial court drew the conclusion of law from this last finding to the effect that plaintiff came into court with unclean hands and as a consequence was not entitled to a decree annulling the marriage.

[2, 3] It is settled that the act upon which equity may refuse relief to a plaintiff because he does not come into court with clean hands must prejudicially affect the rights of the person against whom the relief is sought so that it would be inequitable to grant such relief. Pomeroy's Equity Jurisprudence, 5th Ed., vol. 2, p. 95, § 399; Germo Mfg. Co. v. McClellan, 107 Cal.App. 532, 290 P. 534. In speaking on this subject the Supreme Court, in Bradley Co. v. Bradley, 165 Cal. 237, 131 P. 750, 752, said: "It is not every wrongful act nor even every fraud, which prevents a suitor in equity from obtaining relief. His misconduct must be so intimately connected to the injury of another with the matter for which he seeks relief, as to make it inequitable to accord him such relief. It must have been conduct which, if permitted, inequitably affects the relationship between the plaintiff and the defendant, * * *."

[4] We have no such situation here. The operation was performed at the request of defendant who had full knowledge of that fact before the marriage. She was not deceived and there is no inequity as far as she is concerned in granting the relief sought by plaintiff.

The findings neither support the conclusions of law drawn by the trial court, nor the judgment.

The judgment is reversed.

SHIVERS v. PALMER et al.

Civ. No. 14029.

District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California.

July 7, 1943.

As Modified on Denial of Rehearing Aug. 6, 1943.

Hearing Denied Sept. 1, 1943.

1. New trial ⚷102(3)

The claim of newly discovered evidence as a ground for new trial is looked upon with disfavor, and the very strictest showing of diligence is required by the court. Code Civ.Proc. § 657, subd. 4.

2. New trial ⚷102(1)

For reasons of public policy a litigant is required to exhaust every diligent and reasonable effort to produce at his trial all existing evidence in his behalf. Code Civ. Proc. § 657, subd. 4.

3. New trial ⚷102(1)

Public interest requires that there be an end to litigation and a new trial is not warranted for the purpose of enabling a party to produce further evidence unless he has shown some legally justifiable excuse for not having produced such evidence at the former trial. Code Civ.Proc. § 657, subd. 4.

4. New trial ⚷108(1)

To be entitled to new trial there must be a clear and convincing showing that the newly discovered evidence is of such nature that its introduction upon another trial would render a different result reasonably probable. Code Civ.Proc. § 657, subd. 4.

5. New trial ⚷102(3)

The term "diligence", within rule that diligence to produce all the evidence at original trial must be shown to be entitled to new trial on ground of newly discovered evidence, is a relative term incapable of exact definition, and recourse must be had to the particular circumstances in each case in which the question whether it was used arises. Code Civ.Proc. § 657, subd. 4.

See Words and Phrases, Permanent Edition, for all other definitions of "Diligence".

6. New trial ⚷99

Court's discretion in determining whether due diligence has been exercised to procure the newly discovered evidence before trial is a legal one and the proper exercise thereof presents a "question of law". Code Civ.Proc. § 657, subd. 4.

See Words and Phrases, Permanent Edition, for all other definitions of "Question of Law".

7. New trial ⚷102(3)

Record revealed due diligence on part of plaintiff's counsel to discover and produce evidence as to the claimed intoxication of defendant at time of automobile accident involved in personal injury action. Code Civ.Proc. § 657, subd. 4.

8. New trial ⚷99

Where plaintiff's newly discovered evidence as to intoxication of defendant at time of automobile accident involved, although material and not impeaching or cumulative, was contested by counter affidavits, denial of plaintiff's motion for new trial was not a manifest abuse of discretion. Code Civ.Proc. § 657, subd. 4.

9. Appeal and error ⚷981

Only when the showing made on motion for new trial is of such a character as to make it manifest that the case would or should result differently on a retrial, in view of newly discovered evidence, is the appellate court authorized to say that the discretion vested in trial court has been abused. Code Civ.Proc. § 657, subd. 4.

10. Appeal and error ⚷977(1)

Appellate court is not authorized to interfere with ruling of trial court whenever the case presents a reasonable or even debatable justification under the law for the ruling made in the trial term, regardless of appellate court's view as to the propriety of trial court's action. Code Civ.Proc. § 657, subd. 4.

11. Appeal and error ⚷981

Where plaintiff's newly discovered evidence as to intoxication of defendant at time of automobile accident involved was denied by counter affidavits, and question whether the newly discovered evidence would change result on a new trial was debatable, appellate court was not authorized to interfere with trial court's discretion in denying plaintiff's motion for new trial. Code Civ.Proc. § 657, subd. 4.

12. Appeal and error ⚷277

Trial court's statement to the jury on voir dire examination that an insurance company was not involved in personal injury action, was not an "instruction" which was deemed to have been excepted to under statute. Code Civ.Proc. § 647.

See Words and Phrases, Permanent Edition, for all other definitions of "Instruction".

13. Appeal and error ⚷259

In order to avail a party claimed to have been injured by an improper statement or remark made during a trial by the trial judge, an exception thereto must be taken by such party at the time the remark or statement was made, or at some time thereafter prior to the close of trial.

14. Appeal and error ⚷201(2)

Where trial court stated to jury on voir dire examination that an insurance company was not involved in personal injury action, but no objection thereto or request to correct the claimed error was made, when an appropriate admonition would have been sufficient to obviate any prejudicial effect, the claimed error would not be considered on appeal.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Ingall W. Bull, Judge.

Action by Kate E. Shivers to recover for the wrongful death of her husband, John Hyman Shivers, allegedly resulting from negligence of defendant Warren B. Palmer in the operation of his automobile. The jury returned a verdict for the defendant Palmer, plaintiff's motion for new trial was denied and, from the judgment entered for defendant, plaintiff appeals.

Affirmed.

Kiggens & Hoffman and Elmer H. V. Hoffman, all of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Paul Nourse, of Los Angeles (Pat A. McCormick, of Los Angeles, of counsel), for respondent.

WHITE, Justice.

Plaintiff commenced this action to recover damages for the wrongful death of her husband, John Hyman Shivers, allegedly resulting from the negligence of defendant Warren B. Palmer in the operation of his automobile. Because he refused to join with plaintiff in the action, Gilbert Shivers, a brother of the decedent, and the surviving heir at law, was also named as a party defendant.

By her amended complaint plaintiff alleged that about 7 o'clock on the evening of September 20, 1940, the decedent was driving his Packard automobile in a westerly direction along Garvey Boulevard, West Covina, in the County of Los Angeles. That defendant Palmer was operating his Hudson automobile on the same highway in an easterly direction in a negligent, careless and reckless manner; at an excessive rate of speed; without due or any regard for the safety or convenience of other users of the highway. That as a result of defendant Palmer's negligence, his automobile collided head on with the vehicle operated by plaintiff's husband, resulting in the death of the latter. By his answer defendant Palmer denied plaintiff's allegations of negligence and by way of separate defense pleaded contributory negligence on the part of the decedent. This affirmative defense of contributory negligence, however, may be disregarded as it is conceded that in view of the evidence thereon, the court correctly directed the jury to find against the defendant upon such issue.

The trial was had before a jury which returned a verdict for the defendant Palmer. Plaintiff moved for a new trial on the ground of newly discovered evidence and for the asserted reason that the court erred in its instruction to the jury that no insurance company was "a party to or involved in this lawsuit". The motion for a new trial was denied and this appeal is prosecuted by plaintiff from the judgment entered upon the verdict.

The facts disclosed by the record may be thus epitomized: Defendant Palmer testified that on the evening in question he was driving his sedan easterly on Garvey Boulevard near the intersection of Willow Avenue; that his headlights were on, and that he was traveling in the center of lane 3, as indicated on a map used at the trial. On this map the lanes were designated 1, 2, 3, and 4; number 1 lane being the most northerly lane, lane 2 being between lane 1 and the center of the highway, lane 3 being the first lane south of the center of the highway, and lane 4 being the most southerly lane. When he was about 300 feet from the point of the first impact (with a vehicle driven by one Louis Somers) he particularly noticed a car approaching him from the east, which car was on the southerly side of the center lane; that to avoid hitting the car so approaching, he veered to the south but discovered that if he continued in that direction he would collide with this vehicle, so he abruptly turned to the left or north. He then sideswiped the car on its right side and went over the double center line into lane 2 and almost into lane 1. He then swung around and came back into lane 3 when he was struck by a second car (the vehicle operated by the deceased). At the time of the impact with the first car (Somers' car) "my entire car was south of the double center line" and the other car in its entirety was south of the double center line. After my car collided with Mr. Somers' car, I tried to get it under control and get it back in my lane. That is what I was doing when the collision with Mr. Shivers' car occurred". Defendant testified his health was good, that he had nothing to drink, that he was not sleepy or suffering from drowsiness.

Two witnesses for plaintiff testified that they saw defendant's car east bound, swerve over the double line and go into lane 1, but that they did not observe any collision between the vehicles of defendant and Mr. Somers.

Mr. Somers' version of the accident, testifying as a witness for plaintiff, was that he was traveling in lane 2 in a westerly direction when he first observed defendant's car approaching in an easterly direction in lane 3, when it was about 400 feet down the road. That suddenly defendant whirled to the left, going over into lane 1; then he came back between lane 1 and lane 2 "almost directly toward me". That there was an impact and defendant's front right-hand wheel ran up on Somers' left-hand running board, and spun his car around so that when it came to rest it was headed east. That this impact occurred on the north side of the center line. Defendant Palmer testified it occurred on the south side of the center line.

The evidence indicates that after Palmer's car collided with the Somers car, a second collision took place between Palmer's car and that operated by the deceased, and that deceased's car was then hit by a fourth car operated by Anthony Graves, who was following immediately behind the deceased's car. Mr. Graves testified he did not see the collision between the Palmer car and the Somers car, but that he did see some "cars up ahead kind of swaying I think about—it seemed like about 300 to 400 feet ahead" * * * in lanes 1 and 2.

[1-4] We shall first give consideration to appellant's contention that the trial court fell into error in denying her motion for a new trial on the ground of newly discovered evidence; and which claim is presented by counsel with great earnestness. At the outset we are confronted with the settled rule that the claim of newly discovered evidence as a ground for, or warranting, a new trial is universally looked upon by the courts with distrust and disfavor. For reasons of public policy, a litigant is required to exhaust every diligent and reasonable effort to produce at his trial all existing evidence in his behalf. The fact that the testimony has just been discovered when it is too late to introduce it, has been characterized as a circumstance so suspicious that the very strictest showing of diligence is required by the courts. People v. Freeman, 92 Cal. 359, 366, 28 P. 261. It is, however, recognized that cases will occur where, after trial, despite the exercise of such effort, new evidence most material to the issues and which would probably have produced a different result, is discovered. The remedy of a motion for a new trial on the ground of newly discovered evidence has been given and is afforded for such cases. As declared by subdivision 4 of Section 657 of the Code of Civil Procedure, the court may grant a new trial when there is presented "newly discovered evidence, material for the party making the application, which he could not, with reasonable diligence, have discovered and produced at the trial". Public interest requires that there be an end to litigation and a new trial is not warranted for the purpose of enabling a party to produce further evidence unless he has shown some legally justifiable excuse for not having produced such evidence at the former trial. With reference to the degree of reasonable diligence required in such cases, we need but cite Bennington v. National Packing Co., 122 Cal.App. 313, 9 P.2d 857. We think it may be conceded that the newly discovered evidence in the instant case was competent and material; that it was not solely impeaching; certainly not cumulative, and was in fact discovered after the rendition of the verdict. However, the law also requires the use of due diligence on the part of the moving party to discover the evidence prior to the trial, and a clear and convincing showing under all the circumstances of the case that the newly discovered evidence is produced in such a way, and is of such a nature, that its introduction upon another trial would render a different result reasonably probable.

With regard to the diligence exercised by appellant, it should here be noted that at the trial a witness, Rial Dennison, an investigating police officer, was asked by respondent's counsel, "There was no liquor involved on anybody's part?" to which he answered "Not as far as I knew", while defendant Palmer testified directly and unequivocally that on the day of the accident he had taken nothing intoxicating to drink. Appellant's counsel concede that from the first day they undertook the prosecution of this cause, more than a year prior to the trial thereof, they harbored the belief that the defendant Palmer, because of the circumstances surrounding the accident "must have been drunk or asleep". By their affidavits in support of the motion for a new trial, appellant's counsel represented that in preparing the case for trial they employed a paid investigator, examined the transcript of testimony taken at the coroner's inquest concerning the death of decedent; also the transcript of testimony presented at the preliminary examination of defendant Palmer on a criminal charge of negligent homicide; that they also attended the trial of defendant Palmer on the criminal charge in the superior court, but that none of those activities upon their part were rewarded with any information to indicate that defendant Palmer was under the influence of liquor or had been drinking at all on the day of the accident here in question. The affidavits filed by appellant's counsel further show that prior to the trial they learned that the accident had been investigated by the sheriff of Los Angeles County and by police officer Rial Dennison of the West Covina Police Department; that they learned that respondent had been taken by private ambulance operated by the Taylor Ambulance Company from the scene of the accident to the West Covina Hospital. The affidavits of appellant's counsel also set forth that inquiry by them of defendant's immediate superior in the office where he was employed elicited the information that defendant Palmer was a "man of temperate habits and not addicted to the use of liquor so far as he knew". That prior to the trial they interviewed Officer Rial Dennison on several occasions and were advised by him that he had found no evidence that respondent was drinking before the accident. The affidavits do not disclose whether the driver of the ambulance was interviewed prior to the trial. That it was not until two days before the trial herein that one of appellant's counsel received any indication that Palmer was drinking on the day of the accident, but upon investigation both persons to whom he had been directed denied that they knew anything about the matter. Two days after the trial, Somers told this affiant that he had heard that Palmer had been previously arrested for drunk driving in San Bernardino but that the charge had been reduced to a misdemeanor and Palmer pleaded guilty, and that Palmer had been drinking on the day of the accident. This information, the affidavits of appellant's counsel aver, was denied to them prior to trial, as Somers refused to make any statement to them and had referred one of appellant's counsel to Somers' attorney. Somers told appellant's counsel that the source of his information was an investigator in the sheriff's office who originally had charge of the accident case and who had been previously interviewed by affiant's investigator but had failed to divulge the information. That one of appellant's counsel then secured information as to the identity of the party who had been drinking with Palmer on the afternoon of the accident. Vernon Lee's affidavit averred that he and Palmer had spent the afternoon together and they had four or five bottles of beer and three or four cocktails. Lee, according to the affidavit of appellant's attorney, was induced to make a statement only when he was informed that plaintiff had not secured any remuneration on account of the death of her husband, but that prior to the trial Lee had stated, when asked whether he smelled liquor on Palmer's breath just prior to the accident, "Well he was smoking a strong pipe—and it would have been hard to tell—you know he could have had a drink and I wouldn't have smelled it". As a further result of their post-trial investigation appellant's counsel obtained and filed an affidavit made by Norman Whitlatch wherein he stated that he was in charge of the ambulance that conveyed Palmer to a private hospital following the accident here in question, and that he concluded, "Palmer had been drinking intoxicating liquor as the smell of liquor was very distinct about his breath. The odor of liquor was strong. I could and did smell it when we put Palmer on a cot, preparatory to loading him into the ambulance and when we loaded him into and out of the ambulance at the hospital". This affiant further stated that he did not consider himself privileged to divulge these facts while he was employed by the ambulance company, but that such employment had been terminated at the time he signed the affidavit. Appellant's counsel in their affidavits stated that they did not make inquiry at the hospital or of the ambulance company because they were advised by the police and sheriff's departments that neither the ambulance company nor the attending physician would give any information as to respondent Palmer's sobriety. There was also filed an affidavit by Mrs. H. M. Walker that "Some time in the fall of 1940 when the Pomona Fair was in progress—exact date I don't remember Warren Palmer & Vernon Lee came to our office at 10:30 Garvey Blvd. El Monte and invited us to have a drink so my husband and I accompanied them over to the Golda Lee Bar at 5 Points El Monte—we all had a cocktail—we stayed a few minutes then went outside where Lee got into Palmers car and drove away". Because of its uncertainty, little evidentiary value can be attached to the contents of this affidavit.

The averments contained in the affidavits of Vernon Lee, Norman Whitlatch and Mrs. H. M. Walker as to his drinking were categorically and specifically denied by respondent Palmer in a counter-affidavit filed by him, while Officer Rial Dennison in his affidavit filed in opposition to the motion for a new trial, deposed that within a week following the accident he had a conversation with Vernon Lee wherein he, the affiant, "particularly asked Mr. Lee as to whether or not the said Lee had seen Mr. Palmer on the day of the accident and the said Lee told your affiant that he had seen the defendant Palmer and he further stated unqualifiedly to your affiant that the said Palmer had not been drinking in his presence and further that to his knowledge the said Palmer had had nothing to drink at the time he, the said Lee, had last seen him."

[5-7] The term "diligence" has been said to be incapable of exact definition because it is a relative term, and therefore, in defining it, recourse must be had to the particular circumstances of each case in which the question of whether it was used arises. Parker v. So. Pacific Co., 204 Cal. 609, 618, 269 P. 622. Conceding to the trial court a wide discretion, upon a motion for a new trial, in determining whether due diligence has been exercised to procure the newly discovered evidence before the trial, nevertheless, that discretion is a legal one and the proper exercise thereof presents a question of law. On the record in this case and the facts and circumstances reflected thereby, it must be concluded that appellant through her counsel did use due diligence prior to trial in an attempt to discover and produce evidence as to the claimed drinking or intoxication of respondent Palmer at the time of the accident. Upon every avenue of investigation made by appellant's counsel, one has but to read of the efforts made by them, to be impressed with the persistency and thoroughness thereof and the fact that they were constantly met either with a refusal to give any information or confronted with the statement by all concerned that no liquor "was involved" in the accident. To exact a more thorough or painstaking investigation than was made by appellant's counsel in the instant case would be to require a degree of "diligence" rarely if ever attainable under the difficulties encountered and the circumstances herein presented.

We now pass to a consideration of two questions which we feel are in themselves determinative of the question as to whether the order denying a new trial on the ground of newly discovered evidence should be reversed.

Firstly: The credence and weight to be given to the affidavits and counter-affidavits presented on the motion for a new trial is a matter confided to the sound discretion of the trial court. In the instant case the affidavits of Vernon Lee, Norman Whitlatch and Mrs. H. M. Walker were flatly contradicted by the counter-affidavit of respondent Palmer, while the credibility and weight to which the averments contained in Vernon Lee's affidavit were entitled, is specifically impaired by the affidavit of Police Officer Rial Dennison. As to the affidavit of Vernon Lee, it further appears that he executed the same only after he was assured by a representative of appellant that the latter "had at no time had any part in the criminal prosecution (of defendant Palmer) and that we were not really after Palmer personally, and had never expected to get anything except from his insurance carrier, to get the widow of the man who was killed what she might have coming" and to which statement affiant Lee replied, "That puts a different angle on it. You know I lost my eye a while back. I am thinking about my wife and kids now."

[8] Conceding that the newly discovered evidence was competent, material, not impeaching or cumulative, nevertheless the verity and the credibility of the makers thereof was contested by counter-affidavits. Evidently the court, after balancing the affidavits on the one side presented by appellant against those of respondent and Officer Dennison, decided in favor of the credibility of the facts sworn to in the latters' affidavits. Under all the facts and circumstances present, this court is not prepared to say that there was a manifest abuse of discretion on the part of the trial court in so doing.

[9-11] Secondly: We are confronted with the question which was primarily addressed to the discretion of the trial court, as to whether the evidence offered as newly discovered would, if produced on a retrial of the case, likely and probably bring about a different verdict or result. It is only when the showing made on the motion for a new trial is of such a character as to make it manifest that the case would or should result differently on a retrial, in view of the newly discovered evidence, that the appellate court is authorized to say that the discretion vested in the trial court has been abused. People v. Sing Yow, 145 Cal. 1, 78 P. 235; Waer v. Waer, 189 Cal. 178, 182, 207 P. 891; Monnette v. Title Insurance & Trust Co., 107 Cal.App. 313, 324, 290 P. 668; Berkowitz v. Kiener Co., 37 Cal.App.2d 419, 427, 99 P.2d 578; Smith v. Schwartz, 14 Cal.App.2d 160, 166, 57 P.2d 1386. The trial court heard the witnesses testify. While there was a conflict in the evidence, there was nevertheless testimony which, if believed by the triers of fact, would support a finding that the proximate cause of the accident was the negligence of Somers. With reference to the newly discovered evidence, the trial court was entitled to take into consideration the circumstances under which such testimony was procured, the representations made in its procurement and also the fact that the witness Lee had on other occasions made statements in contradiction of and at complete variance with the averments contained in his affidavit presented on the motion for a new trial. Because the trial court is obviously in a much better position to reach a just conclusion on the hearing of such a motion than we can possibly be, we are not authorized to interfere with the ruling of the trial court whenever the case presents a reasonable or even debatable justification under the law for the ruling made in the trial forum, regardless of what our ideas might be as to the propriety of the court's action. Such a rule is grounded on the fact that the trial court has seen and heard the witnesses and observed the jury. The propriety of the trial court's action in the case at bar under all the circumstances to which we have herein adverted clearly presents a debatable question. We are, therefore, without authority to set our judgment against that of the trial judge.

[12-14] Lastly: Appellant complains that she was seriously prejudiced by a statement of the court advising the prospective jurors on their voir dire examination that an insurance company was not involved in this action. In that regard the record discloses that early in their voir dire examination of the veniremen appellant's counsel inquired "Are any of you now, or have any of you ever been employed by any company engaged in the business of writing casualty insurance on automobiles? Or have any of you ever been or are you now, or any member of your immediate families, connected as a stockholder, officer or otherwise, with any such company?" Thereupon the court stated: "The court will inform all the jurors in the court room now that there is no insurance company a party to or involved in this lawsuit".

Notwithstanding appellant's claim to the contrary, we do not regard the foregoing remarks of the court as an instruction within the purview and meaning of section 647 of the Code of Civil Procedure and, therefore, "deemed to have been excepted to". We are impressed that the statement of the trial judge was no more an instruction than would be the remarks of a trial judge concerning the materiality or effect of evidence as a trial proceeded, while ruling upon objections (Loeb v. Kimmerle, 215 Cal. 143, 154, 9 P.2d 199); or remarks by the court bringing to the attention of the jury that the defendants were insured (Swartz

v. Acme Express & Drayage Co., 102 Cal. App. 615, 619, 283 P. 358); or statements by the court that a witness is a person of respectability (Ward v. DeMartini, 108 Cal. App. 745, 750, 292 P. 192); in all of which cited cases the statements just mentioned were treated as conduct on the part of the court requiring that the error thereof, if any there was, be called to the court's attention by objection so that it might, by instruction or otherwise, correct its error. In order to avail a party claimed to have been injured by an improper statement or remark made during a trial by the trial judge, an exception thereto must be taken by such party at the time the remark or statement was made, or at some time thereafter prior to the close of the trial. Hughes v. Hartman, 206 Cal. 199, 206, 273 P. 560, 563. As was said in the case just cited: "If thus taken, an opportunity is given to the trial judge by an instruction to the jury or otherwise to cure the injury occasioned by such remark. This rule might not apply where the remark was of such a character that its prejudicial effect could not be cured by any subsequent action by the trial court. The remark of the court in the present action, of which complaint is made, is not of such character. Defendant therefore must be held to have waived any right to except to the action of the court in making the remark attributed to it, and quoted above, by his failure to object to the same during the trial of the action".

If, therefore, counsel for appellant regarded the statement made by the trial judge as detrimental to their client's cause they should have offered complaint thereto; requested the court to instruct the jury to disregard the remarks made from the bench; or to declare a mistrial. In Swartz v. Acme Express & Drayage Co., supra, wherein appellants claimed that remarks of the trial judge brought to the attention of the jury that the defendants were insured, it was held, at page 619 of 102 Cal.App., at page 360 of 283 P.: "But they did not object or request an instruction and this forecloses consideration of the point on appeal".

Appellant concedes that there was no impropriety in the court's statement to the jury that no insurance company was a party to the action. Her objection goes solely to that part of the statement which informed the jury that no insurance company was "involved" in the litigation.

We are here confronted with the fact that appellant for the first time on appeal challenges the conduct of the trial court in making the statement complained of. Where, as here, appellant failed by motion, objection or otherwise to call upon the trial court to cure the error and nullify the allegedly prejudicial effect thereof to declare a mistrial or to summon a new venire no question can be presented for consideration by the appellate court. That a party deeming himself prejudiced by improper questions, statements or admonitions by the court as to the existence of liability insurance made in the course of an action for personal injury or wrongful death must act promptly in the trial court to protect his rights, and his failure so to do forecloses him from complaint on appeal, was the direct holding in Crawford v. Rose, 2 Cal.App.2d 734, 39 P.2d 217. Where the error is such that its effect would be obviated by an appropriate instruction to the jury by declaring a mistrial or by summoning a new venire and no such aid is invoked, error cannot be complained of on appeal. Inasmuch as the court was not once, during the impanelment of the jury or during the trial, requested to correct the claimed error, nor was any objection made thereto, when an appropriate admonition would doubtless have been sufficient to obviate any prejudicial effect the court's remarks might have produced, or where the court could have otherwise cured the error, the claimed prejudicial error cannot be considered on appeal.

From the foregoing it follows that the judgment must be affirmed, and it is so ordered.

Proceedings by Jennie A. McArthur against Honorable H. S. Shaffer, as Judge of the Superior Court of the State of California in and for the County of Merced, and the Superior Court of the State of California, in and for the County of Merced, for a writ of mandate to compel respondent Superior Court to order a severance as to petitioner and to set down for immediate trial the issues created between her and the East Coalinga Oil Field Corporation in an action brought by the latter against petitioner and others to determine the ownership of the capital stock of the corporation.

Writ of mandamus denied, and alternative writ hereinbefore issued discharged.

Courtney L. Moore, of San Francisco, for petitioner.

Dean S. Lesher and Loraine B. Rogers, both of Merced, for respondents.

ADAMS, Presiding Justice.

Petitioner herein seeks the issuance of a writ of mandate to compel respondent Superior Court to order a severance as to her, and to set down for immediate trial the issues created between her and the East Coalinga Oil Field Corporation, a corporation, in an action brought by the latter against petitioner and others to determine the ownership of the capital stock of said corporation.

The petition alleges the commencement of the aforesaid action on May 28, 1940; that plaintiff corporation alleged therein that certain named persons, made defendants in the case, were the owners of the five shares of plaintiff's capital stock issued and outstanding; that certain others named as defendants, including petitioner, claimed some right, title or interest in said five shares, but that their claims were without right; that plaintiff prayed therein that defendants be required to set forth the nature of their several claims, and that the court determine the ownership of said five shares of stock; that petitioner appeared in said action and filed an amended answer on March 10, 1941, claiming to be the owner of one-half share of said stock which she had acquired by assignment from one Ira L. Goodrich on February 3, 1925; and that, as to her, said cause is, and has been since March 10, 1941, at issue and ready for trial.

It is further alleged by petitioner that said corporation is under the domination and control of C. Ray Robinson, named as one of the defendants in said action, and that said C. Ray Robinson owns a majority of the stock, is president of said corporation and one of its attorneys; that said defendant Robinson demurred to the complaint of the corporation, and, his demurrer having been overruled on June 10, 1940, he was granted twenty days to answer, but that no notice of the overruling of his said demurrer was given said defendant until petitioner herself gave such notice on August 14, 1942, at which time she also gave notice to the corporation of her intention to move for a separate trial, said notice being supported by her affidavit setting forth the source of her title to a one-half interest in one share of stock, and alleging that defendant C. Ray Robinson claimed the one share which had formerly belonged to Ira L. Goodrich, and that she had no dispute with any of the defendants other than said C. Ray Robinson; that when her said motion came on for hearing on August 24, 1942, said C. Ray Robinson had been inducted into the military service, but that he and the corporation appeared in opposition to said motion on the ground that the said C. Ray Robinson desired to file an answer and a cross-complaint; that petitioner's motion for a separate trial was denied, and said defendant C. Ray Robinson was granted permission to file his answer and cross-complaint, which he did, alleging therein that petitioner had no interest in any of the stock of the corporation, and that he was the owner of four shares thereof; that on September 3, 1942, petitioner answered the said cross-complaint, and on January 18, 1943, again served and filed a notice of motion for a severance and a separate trial, supported by an affidavit of her attorney and a disclaimer by petitioner of any interest in the stock of said corporation except the one-half share transferred to her by Goodrich; that in reply to her motion for severance said C. Ray Robinson gave written notice of motion to abate the trial so long as said C. Ray Robinson remained in the military service of the United States; that the latter's notice of motion was accompanied by an affidavit of C. Ray Robinson alleging that he was on active duty with the Pacific Fleet, and stationed outside the continental limits of the United States, that he was unable to be present at the trial of the said action or any proceedings in connection therewith, and that his presence was vitally necessary and essential to such trial or proceedings; that his notice of motion was also supported by an affidavit of one of his office associates to the same effect; that in reply thereto petitioner filed an affidavit by her attorney, asserting therein that petitioner had a separate and distinct claim against the corporation, and requesting that the case proceed so far as said corporation and petitioner were concerned, also asserting that the trial of the action had been deliberately delayed by C. Ray Robinson; that on January 27, 1943, the trial court entered an order abating the proceedings submitted to it on January 25th, and denied the motion of petitioner to proceed.

It is here contended that the trial court erred in so ruling; that the corporation has no right to have the action stayed, that petitioner asked a trial only of issues between the corporation and herself, and did not request that it proceed to a determination of any dispute with C. Ray Robinson, that the two disputes are legally distinct and separate and that the mere fact that defendant Robinson is a majority stockholder and president of the corporation does not entitle him or the corporation to the benefits of the Soldiers' and Sailors' Civil Relief Act of 1940, 50 U.S.C.A. Appendix, § 501 et seq.; and that the trial court has abused its discretion in its rulings aforesaid.

Preliminarily we note that petitioner alleges that her claim of title to one-half interest in a share of the capital stock of said corporation arises out of an assignment of same to her on February 3, 1925, and that it does not appear that at any time prior to the filing of suit by the corporation she had ever taken any action in regard to same, or that she was suffering or would suffer any injury or any change in her status in regard to said stock if a determination of the issues created by the action of the corporation and the cross-action filed by defendant C. Ray Robinson were longer deferred; also that even if the issues between the corporation and petitioner were determined there would still remain for determination the issues between petitioner and cross-complainant Robinson.

[1, 2] Whether separate actions shall be consolidated for trial, or whether there shall be a severance and separate trials of issues in a single action, is matter within the discretion of the trial court. Section 1048, C.C.P.; 24 Cal.Jur. 720, sec. 5; 38 C.J. 631; 26 R.C.L. 1011; Caldwell v. Regents of University, 35 Cal.App. 639, 640, 170 P. 666; Seidell v. Tuxedo Land Co., 1 Cal.App.2d 406, 409, 36 P.2d 1102; Hill v. Peres, 136 Cal.App. 132, 143, 28 P.2d 946; Osmak v. American Car & Foundry Co., 328 Mo. 159, 40 S.W.2d 714, 719, 77 A.L.R. 722; Cleveland v. Laclede-Christy, etc., Co., Mo.App., 113 S.W.2d 1065, 1070. And a trial court's discretion in this as in other discretionary matters will not be interfered with either on appeal or by writ of mandate except when there has been a manifest abuse of such discretion. Hays v. Superior Court, 16 Cal.2d 260, 105 P.2d 975; Rundberg v. Belcher, 118 Cal. 589, 590, 50 P. 670; California C. C. Corporation v. Superior Court, 127 Cal.App. 472, 476, 15 P.2d 1108; Bashore v. Superior Court, 152 Cal. 1, 3, 91 P. 801; Beardsley Land, etc., Co. v. Superior Court, 104 Cal. App. 255, 257, 285 P. 908.

[3] Petitioner relies upon Caldwell v. Regents of University, 35 Cal.App. 639, 170 P. 666, and Judson v. Malloy, 40 Cal. 299. In the former case, on appeal the court sustained the action of the trial court in refusing a continuance of the action under the circumstances of the case; but it there said that: "It is a matter of discretion on the part of the trial court to grant separate trials as between the plaintiff and separate defendants, which discretion will not be interfered with on appeal except in the case of abuse which is not made manifest here." We find nothing in the Judson case that compels a conclusion that the trial court erred in the instant case in denying a severance. While it was there said that had the defendants moved for separate trials it would have been the duty of the court to so order, the facts of that case are entirely different from those presented herein, and that was not a mandamus proceeding. We cannot say from the allegations of the petition herein that the trial court abused its discretion in denying the severance and the separate trial requested by petitioner.

[4] The remaining question is whether the trial court abused its discretion in granting the motion of defendant Robinson to abate the whole proceeding so long as he remained in the military service of the United States. The Soldiers' and Sailors' Civil Relief Act of 1940 provides in section 521, 54 Stat. 1181: "At any stage thereof any action or proceeding in any court in which a person in military service is involved, either as plaintiff or defendant, during the period of such service or within sixty days thereafter may, in the discretion of the court in which it is pending, on its own motion, and shall, on application to it by such person or some person on his behalf, be stayed as provided in this Act, unless, in the opinion of the court, the ability of plaintiff to prosecute the action or the defendant to conduct his defense is not materially affected by reason of his military service." This statute was enacted in the interests of those in the naval and military service of the United States; and while under its provision courts may, in the exercise of their discretion, refuse to stay proceedings, they are obligated not to do so unless they are of the opinion that the interests of the person in the military or naval service will not be materially affected by a refusal.

In a recent case the United States Supreme Court said that the judicial discretion conferred on trial courts by the Soldiers' and Sailors' Civil Relief Act is the very heart of the policy of the Act; that "The discretion that is vested in trial courts to that end is not to be withheld on nice calculations as to whether prejudice may result from absence, or absence result from the service. Absence when one's rights or liabilities are being adjudged is usually prima facie prejudicial." Boone v. Lightner, 63 S.Ct. 1223, 1231, 87 L.Ed. 1587.

[5, 6] In Royster v. Lederle, 6 Cir., 128 F.2d 197, the court said that the act is to be liberally construed to effectuate its purpose. There a writ of mandamus was sought to compel the trial court to set aside an order of continuance which it had made in the exercise of its discretion under the provisions of the act; but the issuance of the writ was denied, the court saying that it could not say, as matter of law, that defendant's rights would not be affected by proceeding to trial during his absence in the armed service of the United States. Also in State v. McCabe, 140 Ohio St. 535, 45 N.E.2d 763, mandamus was sought to compel vacation of an order of a lower court which had granted a continuance of an action against a soldier on foreign duty with the Canadian army. The Soldiers' and Sailors' Act did not apply to him, but the court said that independently of statute courts have power to grant continuances, that granting or refusing same is within a court's sound discretion, and that an appellate court will not interfere with such exercise of discretion unless the action of the lower court is plainly erroneous and constitutes a clear abuse of discretion.

Petitioner cites several cases wherein denials of requests for continuances under the provisions of the Soldiers' and Sailors' Civil Relief Act have been sustained by appellate courts; but such decisions only confirm the rule applied herein that the discretion of a trial court will not be interfered with on appeal, unless an abuse of discretion is made to appear.

As we cannot say that in this case the trial court abused its discretion, the writ of mandamus is denied and the alternative writ hereinbefore issued is discharged.

Generally, a complaint for recovery of personalty must allege ownership and right of possession, or facts showing right of possession at time action was filed.

3. Appeal and error 🔑907(3), 916(1)

When appeal is on judgment roll alone, appellate court must presume, in support of judgment, that pleadings were treated as sufficient and that evidence on issues sufficient to support the judgment was introduced without objection.

When appeal is on judgment roll alone, appellate court may presume that parties in open court waived any insufficiency in pleadings, thus preventing either party from presenting question of insufficiency on appeal.

A judgment awarding plaintiff possession of personalty and special damages for its detention was not reversible because of alleged failure of plaintiff to allege ownership or right of possession of personalty at time action was filed, where appeal was on the judgment roll alone, findings of fact were waived, and defendant did not point out any miscarriage of justice. Const. art. 6, § 4½.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Diego County; Gordon Thompson, Judge.

Action by the Credit Bureau of San Diego, Inc., against Reta Horeth to recover possession of personal property and special damages for its detention. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals.

Affirmed.

Vincent Whelan, of San Diego, for appellant.

Liggett & Liggett, of San Diego, for respondent.

MARKS, Justice.

This is an appeal from a judgment awarding plaintiff possession of personal property and special damages for its detention. The appeal is on the judgment roll alone. Findings of fact were waived.

The sole ground urged for a reversal of the judgment is that the complaint does not allege facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action as it failed to allege ownership in plaintiff or right to possession of the property at the time the action was filed on June 5, 1942. The only allegation on the question of ownership and right of possession is the following: "That on or about the 17th day of February, 1942, and at all times hereinafter mentioned, plaintiff's assignor, R. A. Wright, was the owner and entitled to the immediate possession of the following goods and chattels, to-wit:". Defendant did not demur to the complaint and admits its insufficiency was not raised in the trial court.

[1] The general rule is that a complaint for the recovery of personal property must allege ownership and right of possession, or facts showing right of possession at the time the action was filed. Stanley W. Smith, Inc., v. Pilgrim, 93 Cal.App. 539, 269 P. 765; Affierbach v. McGovern, 79 Cal. 268, 21 P. 837.

Plaintiff cites the case of Stevens v. Weisbaum, 87 Cal.App. 664, 262 P. 762, where it is held that an allegation in a complaint to the effect that C. C. Stevens, plaintiff's assignor, etc., was owner and entitled to possession of personal property, was a sufficient inferential allegation of an assignment to make the pleading good against a general demurrer.

Should we agree with defendant that the allegations of the complaint failed to state a cause of action, we could not reverse the judgment under the facts before us.

[2] Where findings are waived it must be presumed on appeal that the trial court, in effect, found all facts necessary to support the judgment. Gordon v. Mount, 125 Cal.App. 701, 13 P.2d 932; Jensen v. Burton, 117 Cal.App. 66, 3 P.2d 324.

[3, 4] When the appeal is on the judgment roll alone, we must presume, in support of the judgment, that the pleadings were treated as sufficient and that evidence on issues sufficient to support the judgment was introduced without objection. Kirk v. Culley, 202 Cal. 501, 261 P. 994; Silvers v. Grossman, 183 Cal. 696, 192 P. 534; Consolidated Produce Co. v. Takahashi, 52 Cal.App.2d 753, 127 P.2d 281. We may also presume that the parties in open court "expressly waived any insufficiency in the pleadings" (Turner v. Stock, 79 Cal.App. 662, 251 P. 814, 816), thus preventing either party from presenting the question of their insufficiency on appeal.

[5, 6] Further, section 4½ of Article VI of the Constitution prohibits us from reversing a judgment "for any error as to any matter of pleading, * * * unless, after an examination of the entire cause, including the evidence, the court shall be of the opinion that the error complained of has resulted in a miscarriage of justice." We cannot examine the evidence because it is not before us. Defendant has not attempted to point out any miscarriage of justice in this case. Under these circumstances we cannot reverse the judgment. Turner v. Stock, supra; Clinch v. Shafer, 89 Cal.App. 423, 264 P. 794; Hougland v. Roth Blum Packing Co., 99 Cal. App. 631, 279 P. 159; Mahoney v. Atchison, etc., R. Co., 101 Cal.App. 652, 281 P. 1108. We are not permitted to presume that there has been a miscarriage of justice.

The judgment is affirmed.

Labor unions maintaining peaceful picket line at plaintiff's place of business and carrying on a secondary boycott of plaintiff's business relations with its customers for purpose of coercing plaintiff to persuade its employees to join the unions, which would have rendered employer guilty of "unfair labor practices" under the National Labor Relations Act, were guilty of unlawful practices which could be enjoined. National Labor Relations Act, § 10(a), 29 U.S.C.A. § 160(a).

8. Injunction 🔑101(1)

Picketing or boycotting of employer by labor unions for purpose of coercing employer into signing a contract with labor unions which did not represent a majority of employees, execution of which contract would have constituted the commission of an "unfair labor practice" by employer, constituted illegal "coercion" and could be enjoined.

See Words and Phrases, Permanent Edition, for all other definitions of "Coercion".

9. Torts 🔑10

A secondary boycott of an employer by labor union must be exercised in pursuit of a lawful end.

10. Torts 🔑10

A strike, boycott, or other form of economic pressure activities, however peaceable and innocent on their face, may be without legal justification and unlawful if the purpose behind and motivating such action is unlawful.

11. Torts 🔑10

Collective labor activity, represented by picketing and boycotting, is permissible only when conducted according to law, and, if in violation thereof, the picketing and boycotting are subject under ordinary circumstances to the restraint of a court of equity.

12. Commerce 🔑8(1)

California law that peaceful picketing or boycotting for the purpose of securing a closed shop contract were activities in pursuit of a lawful end has no application to employers subject to the provisions of the Wagner Act. National Labor Relations Act, §§ 1, 2(6), 10(a), 29 U.S.C.A. §§ 151, 152(6), 160(a).

13. Torts 🔑10

The word "unfair" ordinarily conveys the idea that the employer has refused to comply with conditions upon which union men would consent to remain in his employ, or other employers under contract with, or sympathetic to organized labor, would consent to purchase or handle material or merchandise supplied by him.

See Words and Phrases, Permanent Edition, for all other definitions of "Unfair".

14. Torts ⚷10

The term "unfair" or "unfair to organized labor" does not mean that the employer so charged has been guilty of any fraud, breach of faith or dishonorable conduct, but that he has refused to comply with reasonable, honest, and lawful conditions imposed or demanded by a labor organization.

See Words and Phrases, Permanent Edition, for all other definitions of "Unfair to Organized Labor".

15. Torts ⚷10

It is a prime requisite, to support and give truth to charge that employer is "unfair", that in some recognized lawful respect the employer has refused to comply with proper and lawful demands of a labor union, and if the demand is opposed to reason, public policy, or law, and cannot be assented to without violating public policy or law, it cannot truthfully be said that employer is "unfair to organized labor".

16. Injunction ⚷98(1), 101(1)

Where labor unions were furnished with every requested opportunity to organize employees and employer placed no obstacles in their way to secure applications for membership or to act as bargaining agent and upon failure to persuade employer to sign contract with unions, which did not represent a majority of employees, called a strike of two teamsters of employer, established a picket line, and placed employer's name on an "unfair list", the publication of employer's name and business as unfair was untrue, deceptive, and dishonest, and would be enjoined.

17. Torts ⚷10

Picketing which is not honest or truthful is "unlawful picketing".

See Words and Phrases, Permanent Edition, for all other definitions of "Unlawful Picketing".

18. Injunction ⚷98(1), 101(1)

Although the publication of false statements alone will not justify equitable relief, equity will generally intervene where false or fraudulent statements are combined with picketing and where under local policy this renders the picketing illegal and enjoinable.

19. Injunction ⚷98(1), 101(1)

Ordinarily, false or fraudulent statements may be disassociated from picketing, but not from boycotting when made in connection or combination with boycott activities, and, where picketing is founded on and maintained in direct combination with the false charge of unfairness, the picketing cannot stand if the false charge is eliminated by injunction.

20. Injunction ⚷101(4)

Where labor unions by peaceful picketing and boycotting sought to coerce employer engaged in interstate commerce to influence its employees to join the unions against their will and to execute closed shop contracts with the unions which did not represent a majority of the employees by appropriate unit, the purpose of such activities was unlawful and subject to injunction in a state court.

Where labor unions' charge, that employer was "unfair", was false and was being published in combination with picketing and boycott activities of the union, such picketing and boycotting were rendered untruthful and dishonest and therefore unlawful and enjoinable in a state court.

22. Equity ⚷1

The sanction granted a court of equity to administer justice and enforce rights in novel and unprecedented cases arising under changes in the social and business world, where there is no remedy save in a court of equity, is as broad as the necessities of the case demand.

Where picketing and boycotting of employer's business, by labor unions not representing majority of employees, was unlawful, employer was entitled to injunction restraining unions from such activities during pendency of proceedings before the National Labor Relations Board for investigation and certification of bargaining agent for employees.

24. Commerce ⚷9

The National Labor Relations Act provided for the protection of the collective bargaining rights of employees, but the matter of the protection of employer was left for state control. National Labor Relations Act § 1 et seq., 29 U.S.C.A. § 151 et seq.

25. Commerce ⚷8(1)

Where labor union's boycotting and picketing activities and publication of employer's name on an unfair list was unlawful, state court decree enjoining such activities did not infringe upon jurisdiction of National Labor Relations Board. National Labor Relations Act, § 10(a), 29 U.S.C.A. § 160(a).

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Henry M. Willis, Judge.

Action by Park & Tilford Import Corporation against the International Brotherhood of Teamsters, Chauffeurs, Warehousemen and Helpers of America, Local No. 848, A. F. of L., and others, to enjoin defendants from listing plaintiff as unfair to organized labor and from picketing and boycotting plaintiff and its business. From a judgment granting an injunction, defendants appeal.

Affirmed.

V. P. Lucas and David Sokol, both of Los Angeles, for appellants.

O'Melveny & Myers, of Los Angeles, by Pierce Works, of Los Angeles, and Franklin N. Smith, of Lompoc, for respondent.

W. J. WOOD, Justice.

Defendant labor unions have appealed from a judgment whereby they were enjoined from listing plaintiff as unfair to organized labor and from picketing and boycotting plaintiff and its business during the pendency of proceedings before the National Labor Relations Board for investigation and certification of a bargaining agent for plaintiff's employees. At the time of the rendition of the judgment from which the appeal is being prosecuted, Judge Henry M. Willis, who presided at the trial, filed with the clerk of the superior court a memorandum opinion in which he clearly set forth the pertinent facts, the issues and the principles of law involved and the reasons for the judgment. We are in accord with the views therein expressed and, with additions which will hereinafter appear, we adopt the opinion of Judge Willis as and for the opinion of this court. It is as follows:

"Plaintiff, a New York corporation, qualified to do business in California, brought this action against Wholesale Delivery Drivers and Salesmen's Union, Local 848, and Grocery Warehousemen's Union, Local 595 (both incorrectly named in the above caption), and Los Angeles Food and Drug Council to secure an injunction restraining defendants and their officers and agents and members from listing plaintiff as unfair to organized labor, from making any false or fraudulent statement, in connection with picketing or boycotting, concerning plaintiff or its officers or business, or concerning the wages, hours or conditions of labor at plaintiff's place of business; and from interfering with or preventing the sale or delivery of plaintiff's products by picket, boycott, strike or by threats thereof or by other concerted action for the purpose of inducing or compelling plaintiff to violate the National Labor Relations Act, commonly called the Wagner Act, 29 U.S.C.A. § 151 et seq.

"Within the scope of the pleadings and under admissions, stipulations and proofs the following facts are established:

"Plaintiff is engaged in the business of manufacturing, bottling, importing, distributing and selling distilled spirits and alcoholic liquors, maintaining its local and Western Division offices and place of business in Los Angeles, California, with charge over business in the eleven western states. It receives no merchandise from within the State of California, but imports all thereof from other states and some foreign countries. It sells and delivers from its warehouse approximately four per cent of its goods and products to outside states, the balance being sold and delivered to customers in California. It employs fifteen salesmen who solicit business in California, and four office clerks, a private secretary to the Division Manager, a confidential bookkeeper, a Branch Manager, a warehouse superintendent and two teamster-warehousemen. None of the salesmen or clerks were members of either of defendant unions, and none of them had authorized either of such unions to bargain for them with their employer. Sometime in 1941, without opposition from plaintiff, the defendant unions had 'organized' the two teamster employees. Of these two teamsters one was a member of Local 848 and the other was a member of Local 595.

"Beginning in January, 1942, and continuing thereafter, representatives of Local 595 approached plaintiff's Division Manager and its Branch Manager and asked permission to interview the four clerks with a view of inducing them to join Local 595. This permission was granted and several interviews were held with the clerks but they all declined to join the local. In the latter part of February, 1942, representatives of Local 595 presented to plaintiff a form of contract covering the office clerks as a unit with a request that plaintiff sign the same with the local. This form of contract (Ex. 1) is clearly what is called a union closed-shop contract. Plaintiff refused to sign such contract for the reason that the local's representatives admitted that it did not represent a majority of said clerks,—in fact, none of them. There upon said representatives stated that unless the plaintiff signed and the clerks became members of Local 595, the firm would be crucified, that there would be a picket line, the teamsters would be called out, and a boycott instituted. Upon the continued refusal of plaintiff to sign such contract, the representatives of Local 595, about March 15, 1942, informed plaintiff that if it did not persuade the office clerks to come into the union, they would call in the aid of Local 848, and proceed to organize the salesmen as well as the clerks. Shortly thereafter the representatives of Local 848 called with those of Local 595 and discussions concerning the salesmen were had. Permission was asked and granted to interview the salesmen and they were interviewed and all declined to join Local 848. At this juncture, Local 848 also presented its form of closed shop contract covering the salesmen (Ex. 2) to plaintiff with request for signature. This was refused on the ground that Local 848 did not represent a majority of the salesmen—in fact, none of them—and that plaintiff would violate the National Labor Relations Act if it signed such contract. After some further urgent requests by Local 595 and 848 that plaintiff persuade its clerks and salesmen to join those respective locals, which requests were refused, the locals called the two warehousemen-teamsters out on strike, established a picket line at plaintiff's place of business and began a secondary boycott on June 14, 1942, and such picketing and boycotting has continued up to date of submission of this case. At the same time the Los Angeles Food and Drug Council published plaintiff's name and business in its 'Unfair List' and the defendants jointly notified a large number of plaintiff's customers, orally and by circular letter; that plaintiff was 'unfair' and requested them not to purchase plaintiff's products. Many of such customers have ceased to patronize plaintiff and as a result of the concerted action above described, it has suffered irreparable damage and will continue to suffer such damages unless the picketing and boycotting ceases. In this connection it should be stated that all such concerted activities have been peaceful, and no violence or threats of violence have occurred, nor any false or fraudulent statements published by the locals, other than the questioned statement that plaintiff was 'unfair to organized labor,' and the publication of plaintiff's name and business on the 'Unfair List' of the Food and Drug Council, concerning which more will be said hereinafter.

"Incidental to the foregoing facts, it is established that in January, 1941, the salesmen employees of plaintiff had organized a labor union under the name of Park & Tilford Mutual Association as an unincorporated association, and informed plaintiff through its president that it represented the salesmen as a bargaining agent. No formal contract had ever been made between this association and plaintiff but discussions had been had in respect to certain wages. At the time that Locals 595 and 848 were pressing their demands for a contract they were informed of the existence of this association and that it had recently taken in the clerks also for bargaining purposes. Plaintiff had suggested to the defendant unions that the National Labor Relations Board be petitioned to call an election and for certification of a bargaining agent, but defendants refused to unite in such procedure. Then on September 1, 1942, plaintiff filed such a petition with the National Labor Board which assumed jurisdiction and started an investigation and on the next day, September 2, 1942, plaintiff commenced this action. However, on September 4, 1942, defendant Local 595 filed with such Labor Board its charges accusing plaintiff of committing an unfair labor practice as defined in the National Labor Relations Act, in that it interfered with and dominated the Park & Tilford Mutual Association and coerced its employees to become members thereof. By a rule of the Board it is provided that investigation on a petition for certification is temporarily suspended until such charges may be determined.

"The essentials of these same charges were pleaded by defendant Local 595 in its answer as a special defense, but at the trial such defense (which may be characterized as that of 'unclean hands') was deliberately abandoned by defendant, and this feature of the case may be closed by stating that there is no evidence whatever in the record of the trial of this case relating to the facts constituting the basis of such charge, and that in so far as the issues in this case are concerned we may eliminate all further reference to or consideration of the origin or history of the Park & Tilford Mutual Association, other than its existence as such, and for the same reason all consideration of the charges filed by Local 595.

"On this state of the facts herein, defendant Local 595 claims that this court has no jurisdiction of the subject of this action on the stated ground that the National Labor Relations Board has exclusive jurisdiction to determine the issues herein by virtue of Section 10(a) of the National Labor Relations Act. Defendant Local 848 contends that this state court has no jurisdiction to enforce or administer the provisions of the National Labor Relations Act, nor to find on the question of commission of an unfair labor practice affecting commerce.

[1-3] "Jurisdiction is the power to hear and determine, and jurisdiction of a particular case is the power to hear and determine that case. 7 Cal.Jur. 584. The jurisdiction sufficient to sustain a record in this case is jurisdiction over the cause and over the parties. Sec. 1917, Code Civ. Proc. It is manifest that this court has jurisdiction over the parties. The cause is one of injunctive relief from all picketing and boycotting by the appearing defendants in furtherance of an unlawful purpose and in violation of plaintiff's property rights. An action for injunction is a case in equity of which this court has original jurisdiction under Article VI, Section 5, of the State Constitution, Rickey Land & Cattle Co. v. Glader, 6 Cal.App. 113, 91 P. 414; County of Yuba v. North American, etc., Min. Co., 12 Cal.App. 121, 107 P. 138. In the case of Armstrong v. Superior Court, 173 Cal. 341, 159 P. 1176, on certiorari the jurisdiction of the Superior Court to enjoin 'all picketing' was challenged. Therein the court stated: '* * * We are satisfied that it cannot be held that a court of equity is without jurisdiction to enjoin any and all picketing, as it has done in this case, and that if there be any error in this regard, * * * it is simply error in the exercise of jurisdiction which can be reviewed by a higher court only upon direct appeal from the order.'

[4] "Where a court has jurisdiction of the subject matter, as must be held in this case, it has a right to decide every question which occurs in the cause. Hibernia S. & L. Society v. Lewis, 117 Cal. 577, 582, 47 P. 602, 49 P. 714.

"There are three outstanding questions arising herein. (1) Is plaintiff corporation engaged in interstate commerce so as to render it subject to the provisions of the National Labor Relations Act? (2) Were the picket and boycott activities of defendants engaged in and prosecuted for an unlawful purpose? (3) Was the publication of the charge that plaintiff was 'unfair to organized labor' false, fraudulent or dishonest?

"(1) Is plaintiff subject to the Wagner Act?

"The declared policy of the United States as stated in the National Labor Relations Act is to eliminate the causes of certain substantial obstructions to the free flow of commerce, resulting from denial by employers of the right of employees to self-organization and of collective bargaining, having the effect of burdening or obstructing commerce, or materially affecting the flow of raw materials or manufactured or processed goods from or into the channels of commerce. Sec. 1. The term 'commerce' is defined in the Act as meaning 'trade, traffic, commerce, transportation, or communication among the several States * * * or between any foreign country and any State.' Sec. 2, subd. 6.

[5] "Under the skeleton recitation of facts herein concerning plaintiff's area and method of business, amplified by the probative facts in evidence, it is quite clear that plaintiff was, during all the times included in this case, and still is engaged in interstate commerce within the meaning and purview of the National Labor Relations Act and was and is an employer subject to the provisions thereof.

"(2) Were defendants' activities for an unlawful purpose?

"By express terms of the act it is declared to be an unfair labor practice for an employer, subject to the Act, to interfere with, restrain or coerce employees in the exercise of their rights of self-organization or of collective bargaining through representatives of their own choosing. Also it is declared to be an unfair labor practice for an employer to discriminate in regard to hire or tenure of employment so as to encourage or discourage membership in any labor organization, provided, this does not preclude the employer from making an agreement with a labor organization requiring membership in such organization as a condition of employment, if such labor organization is the representative of a majority of the employees in the appropriate collective bargaining unit covered by such agreement.

[6, 7] "Under the proofs herein this court is constrained to find that the defendants, acting in concert of purpose and activities, established and have maintained a peaceful picket line at plaintiff's place of business, and have instituted and carried on a secondary boycott of plaintiff's business relations and dealings with its customers for the purpose of coercing plaintiff to persuade its employees, both clerks and salesmen, to join the defendant unions, respectively as to units, as a condition of retaining employment. This persuasion, if successful in its purpose, would render plaintiff guilty of an unfair labor practice and a direct violation of the National Labor Relations Act. Incidental to and as a basis of such persuasion, defendant unions, each for itself, demanded of plaintiff that it execute with the respective union a closed-shop contract, by the terms of which plaintiff would be required to influence its employees to join the respective union as a condition of continuing employment. As the defendant unions did not represent a majority of either the clerks or the salesmen, employees of plaintiff, neither of them was authorized to bargain for or to execute such an agreement on behalf of such employees in their respective units, and it would have constituted an unfair labor practice on the part of plaintiff to have acceded to such demand and to have executed such contract. Such contract would not only be void and unenforceable but its execution by plaintiff would have been tantamount to the unfair labor practice first mentioned above. The obligation imposed by the Wagner Act to treat only with the true representatives is exclusive and hence imposes the negative duty to treat with no other. N. L. R. B. v. Jones & Laughlin Steel Co., 301 U.S. 1, 44, 57 S.Ct. 615, 81 L.Ed. 893.

[8, 9] "The purpose of the picketing and boycotting is thus definitely shown to be the coercing of plaintiff into commission of unfair labor practices, which, if committed under such coercion, would subject plaintiff to prosecution before the Labor Board on charges. When viewed from any angle, this purpose of defendants constituted illegal coercion. Picketing or boycotting for such purpose are but the weapons of such illegal coercion, and may be enjoined. Steiner v. Long Beach Local No. 128, 19 Cal.2d 676, 682, 123 P.2d 20. And a secondary boycott must be exercised in pursuit of a lawful end. C. S. Smith Met. Market Co. v. Lyons, 16 Cal.2d 389, 395, 106 P.2d 414.

[10] "A strike, boycott or other form of economic pressure activities, however peaceable and innocent on their face, may nevertheless be without legal justification and unlawful if the purpose behind and motivating such action is unlawful. Dorchy v. Kansas, 272 U.S. 306, 47 S.Ct. 86, 71 L.Ed. 248; Senn v. Tile Layers Protective Union, 301 U.S. 468, 478, 57 S.Ct. 857, 81 L.Ed. 1229; C. S. Smith Metropolitan Market Co. v. Lyons, 16 Cal.2d 389, 395, 399, 106 P.2d 414; McKay v. Retail Automobile Salesmen's Local, 16 Cal.2d 311, 331, 106 P.2d 373; R. H. White Co. v. Murphy, 310 Mass. 510, 38 N.E.2d 685.

[11] "Collective labor activity, represented by picketing and boycotting, is permissible only when conducted according to the requirements imposed by law, and if in violation of such requirements, picketing and boycotting are subject under ordinary circumstances to the restraint of a court of equity. Magill Bros. v. Building Service, etc., Union, 20 Cal.2d 531, 535, 127 P.2d 542. The federal law, embodied in the Wagner Act forbids an employer, whose business subjects him to the provisions of such act, from interfering with or coercing his employees in their rights of self-organization and collective bargaining, and to negotiate or enter into contracts with a labor organization which does not represent a majority of his employees in the appropriate bargaining unit. By necessary implication all others are forbidden to compel him so to do. To picket or boycott such employer for the purpose of coercing him into signing such a contract or to interfere with his employees' right of joining or not joining a union, is directly contrary to the spirit and purpose of the Wagner Act, and constitutes illegal coercion, and is subject to restraint by a state court of equity. Hudson Recreation Co. v. Bowling, etc., Union Local 209, 39 Pa.Dist.Co.R. 655; R. H. White Co. v. Murphy, 310 Mass. 510, 38 N.E.2d 685.

[12] "I am mindful of the decisions of our Supreme Court in the so-called McKay series of decisions of October 14, 1940 (McKay v. Retail Automobile Salesmen's Local Union No. 1067, 16 Cal.2d 311, 106 P.2d 373; E. H. Renzel Co. v. Warehousemen's Union I. L. A. 38–44, 16 Cal.2d 369, 106 P.2d 1; Lund v. Auto Mechanics' Union No. 1414, 16 Cal.2d 374, 106 P.2d 408; Shafer v. Registered Pharmacists Union Local 1172, 16 Cal.2d 379, 106 P.2d 403; C. S. Smith Metropolitan Market Co., Ltd., v. Lyons, 16 Cal.2d 389, 106 P.2d 414; Fortenbury v. Superior Court of Los Angeles County, 16 Cal.2d 405, 106 P.2d 411), the effect of which was to declare that the provisions of the California Labor Code had not had the effect of outlawing closed-shop contracts, and that peaceful picketing or boycotting for the purpose of securing such a contract were activities in pursuit of a lawful end. This is the law in California applicable to employers who are not subject to the provisions of the Wagner Act. That Act had outlawed closed-shop contracts between a labor organization and an employer engaged in interstate commerce, in all cases where the labor organization does not represent a majority of the employees in the affected unit. It follows logically that economic pressure applied by a labor union to coerce employers to execute such an outlawed contract, is unlawful because it is directed to an unlawful purpose, and to secure an unlawful result. This conclusion is not in conflict with that in the McKay cases, although it appears to present an anomaly. This, however, naturally results from the difference in statute law applicable to and binding on the two different classes of employers, namely, those engaged in intrastate business exclusively, subject only to state law as interpreted, and those engaged in interstate trade or commerce, subject to the Wagner Act.

"(3) Was the listing and publication of plaintiff's name and business on the unfair list truthful and honest?

[13] "The use of the word 'Unfair', as employed by labor organizations generally, carries a technical meaning commonly understood by the courts, the parties and by all persons to whom labor organizations send notices that a certain employer had been declared unfair. Such meaning, ordinarily conveys the idea that the employer has refused to comply with conditions upon which union men would consent to remain in his employ, or other employers under contract with, or sympathetic to organized labor, would consent to purchase or handle material or merchandise supplied by him. Parkinson Co. v. Building Trades Council, 154 Cal. 581, 592, 98 P. 1027, 21 L.R.A., N.S., 550, 16 Ann.Cas. 1165.

[14, 15] "As commonly used by labor organizations the term 'unfair' or 'unfair to organized labor' does not mean and is not understood to mean that the employer, so charged, has been guilty of any fraud, breach of faith or dishonorable conduct, but that he has refused to comply with reasonable, honest and lawful conditions imposed or demanded by a labor organization. It is a prime prerequisite to support and give truth to such a charge that in some recognized lawful respect the employer has refused to comply with proper and lawful demands of a labor union. Thus if the demand made or condition imposed by the labor union upon an employer is opposed to reason, public policy or the law, and cannot be assented to without violating public policy or law, it cannot be truthfully and honestly said that the employer is unfair to organized labor, or unfair at all. Instead, to declare that an employer is unfair under such circumstances is clearly deceptive and fraudulent.

[16] "In this case the plaintiff is shown by the evidence to have been fair to the defendant unions at all times. It furnished them every requested opportunity to 'organize' the clerks and salesmen, and placed no obstacles in their way to secure their applications for membership in, or their authorization to defendant unions to act as their bargaining agent. Failing in these efforts to organize the employees of plaintiff, not through any fault or opposition of plaintiff, but solely because the employees in question refused to join defendant unions, preferring to self-organize in their own union, and failing to persuade plaintiff to commit acts in violation of the Wagner Act for the purpose of influencing or coercing its employees to join such defendant unions, the defendants, acting in concert, called the strike of the two teamsters, established a picket line and published plaintiff's name on the Council 'unfair list,' and mailed to many customers of plaintiff a circular letter stating that plaintiff had been placed on the 'official "unfair" list of the Los Angeles Food and Drug Council to which body our unions belong,' and requesting such customers to cease patronizing plaintiff until the unions' dispute with plaintiff was settled.

"Under the facts and circumstances of this case it must be found that the publication of plaintiff's name and business as 'unfair' was untrue, deceptive and dishonest. It is manifest, and was equally manifest to the defendants, that plaintiff had not been, and is not unfair to organized labor in general or to these local unions in particular in any respect. No truthful or honest charge of 'unfair' or 'unfair to organized labor' can be predicated on refusal of an employer to accede to unlawful demands of a union. The picketing and secondary boycott which has occurred were founded exclusively on this refusal to commit unfair labor practices by plaintiff, and in combination with the publication of this charge of 'unfair,' and are inseparably entangled with such publication.

[17, 18] "'There can be no doubt that untruthful picketing is unlawful picketing. Cases involving the right of labor to picket peacefully have consistently held that the picketing must also be honest and truthful.' Magill Bros. v. Building Service etc. Union, 20 Cal.App. 506, 127 P.2d 542, 543. 'Despite theoretical criticism * * * and despite the fact that the publication of false statements alone will not justify equitable relief, it is the nearly unanimous rule throughout the country that equity will intervene where false or fraudulent statements are combined with picketing and where, under local policy, this renders the picketing illegal.' Id. 20 Cal.2d at page 509, 127 P.2d at page 544. 'We find no suggestion in these cases, therefore, that a state policy characterizing untruthful picketing as unlawful and enjoinable is in violation of the constitutional provision. [Free Speech]'. Id., 20 Cal.2d at page 512, 127 P.2d at page 545. 'Unless there is a statutory or constitutional restriction on the power of a court of equity under the circumstances here presented, therefore, it seems clear that plaintiff is entitled to a decree enjoining defendants from picketing falsely and untruthfully.' Id., 20 Cal. 2d at page 510, 127 P.2d at page 544.

"In the case, from which the above quotations are taken, it appeared that the defendant union, in an effort to organize the shop of plaintiff, placed a picket line at the shop, the pickets carrying signs stating: 'This house on strike. A. F. L.' In truth and in fact there was no strike on there and the statement was found to be false. The Supreme Court after declaring the law as above quoted concluded as follows: 'Under the facts set forth in this case, therefore, plaintiffs are entitled to a decree restraining defendants from the use of false or untruthful statements in the exercise of their right to picket.'

[19] "Ordinarily false or fraudulent statements, either oral or in writing, may be disassociated from picketing, but not from boycotting when made in connection or combination with boycott activities. In this case, however, the picketing is founded on and maintained in direct combination with the false charge of unfairness and cannot stand if the false charge is eliminated by decree of injunction. To use an old western adage, 'The tail goes with the hide.' As to the boycott it is manifest that the false charge cannot be disentangled from the boycott activities and both must stand or fall together.

"Recapitulation.

[20] "From the foregoing it is demonstrated that in no wise has this court encroached upon any subject of litigation committed to the exclusive jurisdiction of federal tribunals under the Wagner Act. Nor is this court in any wise proceeding to enforce or administer any of the provisions of that act. In a case in which it clearly has jurisdiction over the parties and subject matter, it has, in the exercise of its inherent equity powers, made findings on material facts which constitute the cause of action, and its conclusions based on such facts when viewed in the light of existing law. It has, in brief, only found that defendants are seeking, by conventional economic pressure activities, to coerce plaintiff, engaged in interstate commerce, to influence its employees to join the defendant unions, against their will, and to execute closed-shop contracts with local unions which do not in fact represent a majority of such employees by appropriate unit. Applying the existing law to these facts, this court simply concludes that the purpose of such activities is unlawful and therefore subject to injunction in this state court of equity.

[21] "Also, and on a separate and distinct basis of equitable relief recognized by our state courts, this court has found that the charge that plaintiff was 'unfair' was false and dishonest, and being published in combination with the picketing and boycott activities, rendered such picketing and boycotting as untruthful and dishonest, and therefore unlawful and enjoinable.

[22] "The sanction granted a court of equity to administer justice and enforce rights in novel and unprecedented cases arising under changes in the social and business world, where there is no remedy save in a court of equity, is as broad as the necessities of the case demand. Dougherty v. Creary, 30 Cal. 290, 297, 89 Am.Dec. 116; Times-Mirror Co. v. Superior Court, 3 Cal. 2d 309, 331, 44 P.2d 547.

[23] "Under the facts and the law, measuring the necessities of this case, upon either or both of the grounds hereinabove set forth, plaintiff is entitled to an injunction restraining defendants from all picketing and boycotting of plaintiff and its business during the pendency of the proceedings before the National Labor Relations Board for investigation and certification of bargaining agent for plaintiff's employees, and thereafter until modification or vacation of such injunction, the court reserving the power so to do on application of any party accompanied by sufficient showing."

[24, 25] The judgment of the trial court does not infringe upon the jurisdiction of the National Labor Relations Board. In the Act by which the Board was created Congress provided for the protection of the collective bargaining rights of employees, but it did not protect the employer against such coercive action as is shown to exist in the present litigation. The matter of the protection of the employer was left open by Congress for state control. Allen-Bradley Local v. Wisconsin E. Rel. Bd., 315 U.S. 740, 62 S.Ct. 820, 86 L.Ed. 1154. The prevention of the picketing and other activities condemned in the judgment does not impair any of the rights which are protected or granted by the federal Act. The trial court was within its jurisdiction in awarding the equitable relief granted in the judgment. The Allen-Bradley case, supra, arose in Wisconsin, where a state statute, the Wisconsin Employment Peace Act, Laws 1939, chap. 57, Wis.Stat.1939, chap. 111, pp. 1610–1618, resembles the National Labor Relations Act with the addition that it is therein declared to be unfair labor practice for employees to use methods of coercion. An employer filed a petition under the Act charging a union and its members with unfair labor practices. The Wisconsin Board entered an order in favor of the petitioner, which was sustained by the Supreme Court of Wisconsin. 237 Wis. 164, 295 N.W. 791. In affirming the order the Supreme Court of the United States held that Congress had not made such employee and union conduct as was involved in the case subject to regulation by the federal Board.

McCOMB, J., concurs.

MOORE, Presiding Justice (concurring).

I concur in the judgment. In view of the circumstances presented by this case and of the authorities hereinafter cited as well as of the Wagner Act, there was no alternative other than to order the issuance of the injunction.

The question for decision is whether a state court, on the petition of an employer engaged in interstate commerce, can enter a valid judgment perpetually controlling a picketing union which seeks to coerce the employer to sign a contract with the union to employ only its members and to have the union act as the bargaining agent of the employer. By virtue of the sovereign powers reserved to the state, U.S. Constitution Xth Amendment, historically California has hitherto afforded injunctive relief against irreparable injury threatened to her citizens. By the same fundamental law the national government was granted full authority over interstate commerce, Art. I, Sec. 8. Pursuant to such granted power, exclusive in scope, the Congress enacted the National Labor Relations Act. By virtue of the Constitution the judges in every state are bound to uphold and follow that Act (Art. VI) in its exclusive control with respect to labor controversies of employers engaged in interstate commerce.

Appellants assert that because of the exclusive jurisdiction of the Board created by the Act the Superior Court of California has no power to enjoin unlawful picketing of such employer or to determine whether he is engaged in interstate commerce. Respondent on the contrary maintains that the court has unlimited power by final judgment to enjoin those who would disrupt the orderly processes provided by the federal statute. It is the purpose of this discussion to demonstrate that neither the thesis of appellants nor the conclusion of the majority is wholly in accord with the law.

Under the facts found, amply supported by the proof, plaintiff is engaged in interstate commerce and is therefore subject to national legislation affecting its relations with its employees or with those seeking to interfere with such relations. By section 160(a) of the Wagner Act, 29 U.S.C.A., section 10, the National Labor Relations Board, hereinafter referred to as the National Board, is granted "exclusive" power to prevent "any person from engaging in any unfair labor practice" and such power "shall not be affected by any other means of adjustment or prevention * * *."

The very fact that the jurisdiction of the Board is exclusive would appear to forbid a state court to enter a judgment whose design is to forestall the exercise of its jurisdiction by the National Board to enforce the federal statute. If the state court may entertain the suit, whence does it derive its power? Not from the federal constitution, for by that instrument such power was delegated to the central government with respect to matters affecting interstate commerce. The National Labor Relations Act hereinafter referred to as the Wagner Act specifically provides for the regulation or control of labor relations that affect the free flow of "commerce * * * among the several states," Subd. 6, sec. 152, 29 U.S.C.A., by the National Board according to the provisions of the Act. But because of the grant of such judicial power by the states to the national government in the federal constitution must it be said that an employer engaged in interstate commerce is to have no judicial relief from his threatened irreparable injuries when the national agency is inadequate for the task? It must have been the intention of Congress that all interstate employers should seek relief from their grievances arising out of employment relations through the medium of state courts or that the National Board should give the Act such a construction as would result in a fair administration of that law to all persons, groups or corporations that might become involved in labor disputes. In the light of the history of legislation framed to meet acute social problems, it is not reasonable that the Congress of the United States would have adopted an Act solely for the relief of one of two classes of disputants and leave the other to the mercies of other jurisdictions. In this view it was a rational act of the respondent first to petition the National Board for the order provided by section 160(b) before seeking an injunction from a state court. For the same reason it is not disappointing that, likewise, appellants are contending for a total want of jurisdiction in the state courts in support of their conclusion that the Act is the sole repository of both substantive and adjective law relating to the problem at hand. Confronted as it was with a grave peril to its survival because of its inability to effect speedy and adequate relief, respondent sought the aid of equity for an adjudication of major grievances that might beset such an institution in respect to its manifold relations within the commonwealth of California.

The superior court was thus faced with a situation where the threatened irreparable damage of plaintiff was without adequate and speedy remedy under the controlling national statute and was therefore constrained to issue the injunction. Three facts of compelling force operated upon the conscience of the chancellor. For two reasons is this true: (1) The successive sections of the Act provide for investigation and certification by the National Board upon the petition of the employees only when it is made to appear that the employer is guilty of some unfair labor practice toward his employees. 29 U.S.C.A. §§ 158, 160. (2) If the plaintiff has suffered and still suffers irreparable damage to the extent alleged and found by the court, its existence as a commercial entity would probably be erased before an effective order granting relief might be entered by the National Board. (3) The method of enforcing the orders of the National Board are so complicated as to render difficult if not impractical the realization of legislative aims.

The superior court was required to act. In the first place, it owed a duty under the supreme law of the land to make such orders as would maintain a free flow of commerce. Article VI supra. Also, there is no specific inhibition in the National Labor Relations Act against the orders of state courts in the enforcement of the statute. Unless the act of Congress indicates an intention to displace local laws in the exercise of the commerce power, such intention is not to be inferred unless clearly indicated by those considerations which are persuasive of the statutory purpose. Maurer v. Hamilton, 309 U.S. 598, 60 S. Ct. 726, 84 L.Ed. 969, 980, 135 A.L.R. 1347. The purpose of Congress to displace the local law must be definitely expressed. Welch v. New Hampshire, 306 U.S. 79, 59 S.Ct. 438, 83 L.Ed. 500, 504. In construing federal statutes enacted under the power conferred by the commerce clause, it must be borne in mind that Congress did not intend to supersede the exercise of the reserved powers of a State unless its purpose so to do is clearly manifested. Illinois C. R. Co. v. State Pub. Utilities Commission, 245 U.S. 493, 510, 38 S.Ct. 170, 22 L.Ed. 425. In view of the reservation of all judicial power not granted to the National Government by the Federal Constitution and in view of the cumbersome procedure of the National Labor Relations Act it was incumbent upon the Superior court to enter, as in fact it did enter, such a judgment as would protect the injured party from further irreparable injuries and at the same time concede the paramount jurisdiction of the national agencies in the enforcement of the Wagner Act. While the authorities cited in the majority opinion exemplify the broad powers of equity as represented by state courts, it must be kept in mind that they are not authority for the displacement of the federal tribunals established for the interpretation, administration, and enforcement of a federal statute enacted for the purpose of resolving those economic and social problems the solution of which primarily devolve upon the central government. It was therefore proper that the relief granted by the judgment under review be confined to the period prior to the exercise of the jurisdiction by the National Board over the issues here involved.

Under the law of this state relating to controversies between labor unions of propagandic activities and employers of labor in a distinctly intra-state establishment, no conduct of appellants enjoyed by the court may be the subject of injunctive relief. The acts of defendants were found to have been peaceful. The right peacefully to picket is held to be a lawful means whereby organized labor may advertise its grievances or its advantages. Such picketing is not unlawful because it may coerce. The unions may bring such lawful pressure to bear as is within their control. The right of picketing may extend to and beyond a dispute between an employer and his employees. It is proper in any controversy which is reasonably related to employment and to the purposes of collective bargaining. McKay v. Retail Auto S. L. Union, and associated cases, 16 Cal.2d 311, 106 P.2d 373. In order to secure employment on more favorable terms for themselves, any persons or group may, in concert, attempt to prevent the employment of other individuals in order to gain such employment for themselves. They may be as bold in asserting their superior excellence as is any dealer on the Venice pier in acclaiming the qualities of his merchandise in competition with his neighbors. See concurring opinions of Justice Sloss and Chief Justice Beatty in Parkinson Co. v. Building Trades Council, infra.

Not only are unions allowed in California to compete with one another and with non-union workers in strictly intrastate affairs, but they may, when their requests with reference to employment subjects are denied, advertise the employer as "unfair to organized labor". Parkinson v. Building Trades Council, 154 Cal. 581, 98 P. 1027, 21 L.R.A.,N.S., 550, 16 Ann.Cas. 1165. Such holding was evidently based upon the recognition of either the limited vocabulary of strikers and picketers or on the poverty of our language, rendering difficult the appropriation of precise terms for indicating merely the existence of a dispute.

However, in applying a federal statute we pass to a new plane as if from the Code of Solon to the laws of Cyrus. In a situation controlled by a federal statute, state courts in awarding relief also are governed by the provisions of the federal statute. Under the Wagner Act it is declared to be unfair labor practice for an employer to coerce his employees in the exercise of their right to self organization or to bargain collectively and to engage in concerted activities or to dominate the formation of any labor organization. National Labor Relations Act, 29 U.S.C.A. §§ 157, 158. If an employer in interstate commerce may not do so, certainly any person or group who might engage in an economic pressure activity to coerce the employer to do what he is thus forbidden to do may be enjoined from continuing such activity. Such injunction is the only course to be pursued that may preserve from such illegal coercion the business of the employer and the employment at his disposal for the application of the federal Act. The injunction is issued "to protect against future irremedial harm." Steiner v. Long Beach Local No. 128, 19 Cal.2d 676, 682, 123 P.2d 20, 25. A state court may give protection against future injuries on an inference from past misconduct that it will continue. Milk Wagon Drivers Union v. Meadowmoor Dairies, Inc., 312 U.S. 287, 61 S.Ct. 552, 85 L.Ed. 836, 132 A.L.R. 1200. Since the Wagner Act professedly makes no provision for the protection of employers against injurious acts of labor unions, it might be so construed as to make it operable on behalf of either party when the enforcement of the Act is necessary to the achievement of justice, and in all fairness if such was not the intention, state courts should exercise their equity jurisdiction. So also must it have been intended that equity as administered by state courts should be invoked in aid of the preservation of rights of an employer existing at the commencement of a controversy. Inasmuch as the Act forbids the employer to coerce his employees, Congress must have intended that a union should not be permitted to compel an employer by economic pressure or otherwise to dominate his employees with respect to their self organization.

In holding that the superior court has jurisdiction we are not without precedent. The state of Wisconsin enacted a statute patterned after the Wagner Act. Under it a manufacturer procured an order to be made by the state board forbidding mass picketing or the threatening of its employees with bodily injury or the picketing of their homes. The petitioner was subject to the National Labor Relations Act. It was held by the United States Supreme Court that the federal statute was not designed to preclude a state from enacting legislation to govern the type of union activity condemned and that "state action should not be foreclosed in absence of a finding by the federal Board, * * * that an employer's labor practice so affects [the flow of] interstate commerce * * * that it should be prevented." No "employee was deprived of rights protected or granted by the federal Act." Allen-Bradley Local v. Wisconsin Employment Relations Board, 315 U.S. 740, 62 S.Ct. 820, 824, 85 L.Ed. 1154. Appellants attempt to distinguish the Wisconsin case on the ground that the proceeding arose under a state statute providing for the regulation of industrial units and for settling controversies between labor and employer. There is no advantage gained by a state tribunal's acting under a special statute over the position of a state which leaves the solution of such problems to its courts. If the tribunal in one instance is the creature of a statute, the statute is no more than the expression of the sovereign power of the state while a court is the creature of the constitution which is the state's fundamental law. Until courts are stripped of jurisdiction of actions in equity by appropriate laws, their disposition of causes requiring injunctive relief has all the sanctity that might surround the decision of a board especially created to arbitrate causes formerly adjudicated by the courts. This is exemplified in a case litigated in Massachusetts which also has a labor relations law. R. H. White Co. v. Murphy, 310 Mass. 510, 38 N.E.2d 685. The company sued to enjoin certain unions and their members from picketing plaintiff's store. Two locals 829 and 82 demanded a contract for a closed shop and threatened a strike unless it be signed. On January 31, 1941, plaintiff yielded and signed, although neither union represented a majority of the employees and proceedings for certification were still pending with the state commission on the petition of the C. I. O. Union. The commission ordered an election which was held on February 21. The C. I. O. Union prevailed in the election and was, on February 25, certified as the bargaining representative of the employees. Three days later the two locals demanded compliance with their contract theretofore exacted. On plaintiff's refusal to discharge those employees not members of the locals, the defendants in concert attempted to compel plaintiff to discharge such employees, and to refuse to bargain with the representative, certified by the commission. Had plaintiff done as thus requested by defendants, it would have violated Sec. 4(5) of the state labor relations law. It was held that, under the state law, identical in its provisions with the National Labor Relations Act, the contract relied upon was inefficacious because the law determines which, as between competing unions, shall have the contract to be the collective bargaining agent of the employees. Citing International Association of Machinists v. National Labor Relations Board, 311 U.S. 72, 61 S.Ct. 83, 85 L.Ed. 50. The locals were enjoined because the picketing was unlawful. Its purpose was "to disrupt and disorganize a settled situation." It is thus demonstrated that the act of an employer in yielding to the demands of a maverick group in violation of the labor relations law is a nullity. "It was an unlawful act," said the Massachusetts' Court [310 Mass. 510, 38 N.E.2d 692], "for the defendants to picket the plaintiff's places of business for the purpose of persuading or inducing it to conform to the contract in question, and thus to engage in an unfair labor practice condemned by the governing statutes."

By the force and reasoning of the Wisconsin and Massachusetts' cases, one is convinced that not only was plaintiff herein entitled to an injunction to inhibit the practices condemned by the Wagner Act, but also that the superior court was a proper agency in California for upholding the integrity of the national statute when a dealer in interstate commerce is beset by picketers who have attempted to coerce him to disregard the provisions of that law. Appellants cite Brotherhood of Railroad Trainmen v. Owens, Tex.Civ.App., 165 S.W. 128, as authority for the want of jurisdiction of the state court. But that was an action by employees against the Brotherhood to enjoin it and its agent from acting as the bargaining agents for the plaintiffs or representing them before the National Labor Relations Board or contracting for them with the defendant Bus Company. That case presents just such a situation as was contemplated by the Wagner Act. It was an action by workers; not a suit by an employer against a union. There was no reason why the complainants should not have presented their claim directly to the federal board where the brotherhood was already the certified agent of the employees.

In view of what is said above, there seems to be no question of the propriety of the judgment which has been entered. A decree in similar form was entered by the United States Supreme Court in the case of State of Wisconsin v. State of Illinois, 281 U.S. 696, 698, 50 S.Ct. 331, 74 L.Ed. 1123 in an original proceeding. Upon the hearing of a written application, the scope of the judgment was subsequently enlarged. 289 U.S. 395, 710, 53 S.Ct. 671, 77 L.Ed. 1283, 1465. By such procedure state courts may render a service in the administration of a federal statute without a clash of the two jurisdictions.

59 Cal.App.2d 682

MORGAN et al. v. VEACH et al.

Civ. 13829.

District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 3, California.

July 14, 1943.

1. Injunction 🔑128

In action to enjoin violation of building set-back restrictions, evidence showed that construction in violation of restrictions, at least after foundation was in, was not the result of inadvertence or mistake.

2. Covenants 🔑103(3)

Property owners were not required at risk of waiving a violation of set-back restrictions to scrutinize activities of another lot owner to ascertain whether restrictions were being violated.

3. Covenants 🔑103(3)
Injunction 🔑112

Where it was difficult to determine before walls were started whether building set-back restrictions were being violated, and defendants were notified that restrictions were being violated when it could be determined with reasonable certainty that such was the fact, defendants' claim of "laches" or "estoppel" could not be sustained.

See Words and Phrases, Permanent Edition, for all other definitions of "Estoppel" and "Laches".

4. Injunction 🔑23

In view of drastic character of mandatory injunction, the rule as to balancing relative conveniences of the parties applies with special force to a prayer for mandatory relief.

5. Injunction ⟹23

Where by innocent mistake or oversight buildings slightly encroach and the damage to the owner of the buildings by their removal would be greatly disproportionate to the injury, the court may decline to order their removal.

6. Injunction ⟹23

Relief by way of mandatory injunction will not be denied on the ground that the loss caused by it will be disproportionate to the good accomplished, where it appears that the defendant acted with full knowledge of the complainant's rights and with an understanding of the consequences which might ensue.

7. Injunction ⟹195

In action to enjoin violation of building set-back restrictions, judgment requiring defendants to move building erected in violation of such restrictions or to pay $1,000 damages was not an abuse of discretion as against contention that plaintiffs had not proved any damages.

8. Trial ⟹395(3)

In action to enjoin violation of building set-back restrictions where court found that it was not true that building on certain lot owned by plaintiffs did not conform with the restrictions and made no finding concerning hedge or shrubbery which defendants alleged was also in violation of restrictions, court's finding in view of judgment for plaintiffs would be regarded as a general finding sufficient to include the item of landscaping.

In action to enjoin violation of building set-back restrictions, finding by court that it was not true that a building on a lot owned by one of the plaintiffs did not conform with the restrictions, included garage on such lot, and was sufficient in view of judgment for plaintiffs to include also a determination that the portion of the premises referred to as a wall or a part of a flowerbed was not a violation of such restrictions by such plaintiff.

10. Injunction ⟹109

Fact that some of the plaintiffs suing to enjoin violation of building set-back restrictions had violated such restrictions could not prevent the other plaintiffs from obtaining injunctive relief if they were otherwise entitled to it, and had no knowledge that restrictions had been violated by any person other than the defendants.

11. Appeal and error ⟹925(1)

Where parties requested trial judge to view property involved and judge stated that he would do so after the testimony had been received, and at the close of trial judge stated that he would view the property before he made up his mind as to whether building would be required to be moved or damages would be allowed, and record did not show that the judge had not viewed the property, it would be assumed on appeal that judge had done so.

12. Injunction ⟹130

Where defendants deliberately violated building set-back restrictions, fact that judgment ordering removal of building contained alternative provision for payment of $1,000 damages did not indicate that injunction should not have been granted.

13. Appeal and error ⟹1033(8)

Where it would cost appellants more to remove building in compliance with mandatory injunction than the $1,000 damages allowed in the alternative, appellants could not complain of such alternative provision.

14. Appeal and error ⟹184

Where action to enjoin violation of building set-back restrictions was tried upon theory that the issue of damages was involved and proof of actual or substantial injury was not essential to purely injunctive relief, and no demand for jury trial was made, contention on appeal that defendants were deprived of jury trial could not be sustained.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Thurmond Clarke, Judge.

Action by Virginia W. Morgan, Raymond R. Morgan, Karl Schneider, Edith Schneider, Pauli Hoffman, Jean Carson and Paul Carson against Russel A. Veach and Ursula A. Veach, to enjoin violation of building set-back restrictions. From a judgment requiring defendants to move building erected in violation of such restrictions or to pay $1,000 damages, the defendants appeal.

Judgment affirmed.

John L. Wheeler, of Los Angeles, for appellants.

Max E. Gilmore, of Hollywood, and Albert E. Marks, of Los Angeles, for respondents.

PARKER WOOD, Justice.

In this action to enjoin the violation of building set-back restrictions, plaintiffs obtained judgment requiring defendants to move the building erected by them in violation of the restrictions or to pay $1,000 damages.

The tract of land involved herein, consisting of 12 lots, included 10 hillside lots, the fronts of which adjoined a semicircular street that extended up-grade in a northerly direction. Beginning at the southerly end of the tract and extending northerly, the lots fronting on that street were numbered from 1 to 10 inclusive. Generally stated, the lots faced as follows: lots 1, 2, 3, and 4, south; lots 5 and 6, southeast; and lots 7, 8, 9, and 10, east.

The lots owned by plaintiffs and the approximate values thereof were as follows: Raymond R. Morgan, lot 1 and house, $20,000; Karl and Edith Schneider, lot 2 and house, $23,000; Pauli Hoffman, lot 4 and house, value not stated; Virginia W. Morgan, lot 8 and house, $25,000; and Jean and Paul Carson, lot 9 vacant, $4,000. Defendants, husband and wife, owned lot 10, at the northerly end of the street.

All the parties held their lots under a deed which provided, pursuant to a general plan of improvement of said lots and tract, that the residences on the various lots "shall be placed not less than" the following mentioned distances from the front property lines of the lots: 45 feet on lots 1, 2, 3, and 4; 40 feet on lot 5; 35 feet on lot 6; 30 feet on lot 7; 25 feet on lot 8; and 20 feet on lots 9 and 10. The deed provided further that "no building * * * shall be erected or maintained within 5 feet of the sidelines of any of said lots nor any fence, wall or hedge nearer to the front line thereof than the setback hereinabove established or elsewhere thereon at a greater height than 5 feet"; and that said conditions "shall * * * terminate * * * after January 1, 1960. * * * Provided also that a breach of any of the foregoing conditions shall cause the lot * * * to revert to said grantor, or its successors * * * and as to the owner * * * of any other lot * * * the foregoing conditions shall operate as covenants running with the land, and a breach of any such covenants * * * may be enjoined, abated or remedied by said grantor * * * or by any such owner * * *."

Defendants admitted in their answer that their residence did not comply with the restrictions, but denied that it was constructed in violation of them. They alleged further: (1) that plaintiffs' claims for injunctive relief were barred by laches on the part of plaintiffs, in that, when the action was commenced the house was substantially completed; (2) that plaintiff Pauli Hoffman constructed a house and a wall on lot 4 which did not conform with the restrictions, and therefore the claims of plaintiffs for injunctive relief were barred; and (3) that plaintiff Virginia W. Morgan maintained for many years a hedge on lot 8 between the southeasterly corner of the residence on lot 8 and the curb, which did not conform with the restrictions, and therefore the claims of plaintiffs for injunctive relief were barred.

On July 22, 1941, defendants received a deed to lot 10 which recited that the lot was subject to restrictions of record. On August 1st, defendants received a policy of title insurance which stated the number of the book and page of the official records wherein the restrictions appeared. Stakes and lines placed on lot 10 by defendants on July 15th to indicate the foundation lines remained in position until August 10th, when excavation was commenced. Construction of the cement foundation, started September 3rd, was finished September 13th. Erection of the rough framework of the building, commenced September 15th, was completed September 27th.

Defendant Russel A. Veach and plaintiff Raymond R. Morgan will be referred to hereinafter as the defendant and Morgan, respectively.

About September 21st, when some of the rough framework of the walls had been erected, a brother of plaintiff Morgan, who lived across the street from lot 10, told defendant that the house was too close to the front property line. On September 21st, plaintiff Morgan, who owned lot 1 and lived on lot 8 owned by his wife Virginia W. Morgan, noticed for the first time that defendant was building in violation of the restrictions; and on September 22nd (according to his testimony), or on September 29th (according to defendant's testimony), he said to defendant by telephone that the house was too close to the line and defendant was violating the restrictions. Defendant replied that his builder had told him he could build anywhere on the lot and he (defendant) thought he would go ahead as planned. About September 29th, defendant went to Morgan's office and told him: that he had found the restrictions as to the set-back; that he did not know what he could do about it, since it would cost him more to relocate the house than he had expended at that time; and that he was going ahead with the building anyway. Morgan replied that if he did go ahead, he (Morgan) would have to do something about it and try to stop him legally. About October 1st, Morgan's attorney sent a letter to defendant, which reached him October 15th or 16th, stating that unless defendant complied with the restrictions, relief would be sought from the courts. Thereafter and during October, the rough plumbing, the fireplace, cabinets, paper and netting on the outside for stucco, and plaster board on the inside, were installed. This action was commenced on October 31, 1941. On November 1st, a temporary restraining order was served on defendants. At that time the house was ready for the outside stucco and the inside plaster. Within a week after the temporary restraining order was dissolved, defendant resumed work on the house, and, according to his statement, he proceeded to complete it "in a hurry" because materials were hard to get. The house was completed on December 24th. The cost of the house, not including the lot, was about $10,000.

The front property lines of the lots are 8 feet from the street curb, and there is no sidewalk. The garage on defendants' lot is "a part of the main residence," as required by the restrictions, and adjoins the house at the front on the south side. Defendants' house, instead of being at least 20 feet from the front property line, is the following distances from the front property line: the northerly corner of the house, 8.2 feet; the northeast corner of the garage, 13.65 feet; and the southeast corner of the garage, 21.7 feet. Defendants' house, instead of being 5 feet from the lot sidelines, is the following distances from the sidelines of lot 10: the north side, 3.8 feet; and the south side, 3.5 feet.

The trial court found that defendants' residence did not comply with said restrictions, particularly in that said building was placed less than 20 feet from the front property line of lot 10; that about September 21, 1941, plaintiffs caused defendants to be notified of the fact that defendants were constructing a building which did not conform with the set-back restrictions; that notwithstanding said fact and notice defendants continued with and completed the construction of said building in violation of said restrictions and covenants; that said violations by defendants caused damage to plaintiffs, and the beauty and symmetry of the plan of improvement of the tract was diminished; that there was no laches on the part of plaintiffs; that it was not true that the building constructed on lot 4 by plaintiff Hoffman, and the building constructed on lot 8 by plaintiff Virginia W. Morgan, did not conform with said restrictions.

The first contention of defendants is that the trial court abused its discretion in granting the injunction. They assert "that while the defendants' residence building was constructed in violation of the restrictions in that the residence was set too close to the front property line, such construction was the result of inadvertence and mistake upon the part of defendants." They state that the inadvertence and mistake occurred by reason of the following: that the real estate agent who sold the lot told them the curb was the front line of the lot, and they could build anywhere on the lot, except within 5 feet of the south line; that the deed received by defendant did not specifically set forth any restrictions; that the lot was on a steep hillside and there was no sidewalk or trees in the space of 8 feet between the curb and the front property line, dedicated to the city, to indicate the front line was not the curb; that the garage on the lot north of lot 10 (which was not in the tract involved) was closer to the curb than defendants' house; and that lot 9, to the south of defendants' lot was vacant, and the street between the Morgan house on lot 8, and defendants' lot 10 curved appreciably into the hill.

[1] The matters just referred to, standing alone, might indicate inadvertence and mistake, but there were other circumstances to be considered by the trial court. It is difficult to understand why defendant relied upon the agent for information regarding the restrictions when authoritative information was available, as indicated by references to the restrictions in the deed and policy of title insurance received by defendant before the building was commenced. Although he might have acted inadvertently prior to the time he was notified by Morgan's brother and by Morgan that he was building too close to the line, thereafter he proceeded with knowledge that the restrictions required a set-back of not less than 20 feet and with knowledge that his building was considerably less than 20 feet from the line. At the time he was so notified, the expense of changing the location of the house would have been between $1,500 and $2,000. Defendant did not heed the notices, declared his intention on two occasions to proceed without complying with the set-back restrictions, and proceeded "in a hurry" to complete the house irrespective of said oral notices and a written demand by Morgan's attorney that he comply with the restrictions, and irrespective of pending litigation to prohibit him. Although defendant stated that he relied upon the agent for information as to the restrictions and the agent told him the building should not be within 5 feet of the south line, it is to be noted that defendant violated even that restriction and built the house 3½ feet from the south line. There was evidence that defendant intended in the first instance to build farther back on the lot but he changed his mind in order to have more space in the back yard. The construction in violation of the restrictions, at least after the foundation was in, was not the result of inadvertence or mistake.

Defendants assert further, as a part of their argument, that the court abused its discretion in granting the injunction, that, although the plaintiffs Morgan were in a position at all times to observe the proposed location of the house, a period of more than 2 months elapsed before defendant was advised the restrictions were being violated, that plaintiffs permitted defendant to continue the construction until the latter part of October, when the house was substantially completed, without bringing to his attention their determination to require compliance with the restrictions; and that while such failure of plaintiffs to act might not have constituted laches the elements of estoppel were present and the issuance of an injunction worked an inequitable burden on defendants. By reason of the hillside character of defendants' lot, the terraces thereon, and the curve of the street, it was difficult for persons who were not on defendants' lot and were not builders to determine, before the walls were started, whether the restrictions were being violated.

[2, 3] Plaintiffs were not required, at the risk of waiving a violation of restrictions by defendants, to scrutinize the activities of defendant to ascertain whether he was violating the restrictions. At a time, however, when Morgan could first determine with reasonable certainty, without being upon the lot, that the restrictions were being violated, that is when the walls were started, he notified defendant immediately that he objected to the violation. In response to defendant's statement that he would go ahead as planned, plaintiff Morgan stated he would try to stop him legally. The position of Morgan that he would insist upon compliance with the restrictions was placed before defendant definitely and promptly when he ascertained the facts. The claim of laches or estoppel cannot be sustained.

[4-6] An appropriate statement relative to defendants' assertion that an injunction would work an inequitable burden is in 28 Am.Jur. section 56, page 253 as follows: "In view of the drastic character of mandatory injunctions, the rule under consideration as to balancing the relative conveniences of the parties applies with special force to a prayer for such mandatory relief. Where, therefore, by innocent mistake or oversight, buildings erected * * * slightly encroach * * * and the damage to the owner of the buildings by their removal would be greatly disproportionate to the injury * * * the court may decline to order their removal * * *. But relief by way of a mandatory injunction will not be denied on the ground that the loss caused by it will be disproportionate to the good accomplished, where it appears that the defendant acted with a full knowledge of the complainant's rights and with an understanding of the consequences which might ensue * * *."

In a note in 57 A.L.R., 1st column, page 343, it was said: "Wilfulness on the part of the defendant in proceeding with the violation of the restriction after warning by the complainant, especially after suit is brought, is a ground for equitable relief by mandatory injunction greatly stressed by the courts. Thus, one who deliberately violates building restrictions placed upon his lot for the benefit of a district in a city cannot avoid a mandatory injunction so to build as to comply with the restrictions, on the theory that the loss caused by it will be disproportionate to the good accomplished." The case of Stewart v. Finkelstone, 1910, 206 Mass. 28, at page 38, 92 N.E. 37, at page 40, 28 L.R.A.,N.S., 634, 136 Am.St.Rep. 370, cited in support of that statement, stated: "It is strongly urged that a mandatory injunction ought not to issue, for the reason that it would * * * impose on the defendant a loss disproportionate to the good it can accomplish * * *. This remedy * * * in cases proper for its exercise * * * ought not to be withheld merely for the reason that it will cause pecuniary loss. It has been found that the defendant with full knowledge of the restrictions 'deliberately attempted' to override them, and thus deprive the district of the character given it by the restrictions. He took his chances as to the effect of his conduct with eyes open to the results which might ensue. It has been the practice of courts to issue mandatory injunctions upon similar facts."

[7] Defendants assert also, under their point concerning abuse of discretion in granting the injunction, that plaintiffs did not prove any damages. In Walker v. Haslett, 1919, 44 Cal.App. 394, at page 398, 186 P. 622, at page 623, it was said: "When clearly expressed, covenants of this description will be strictly enforced, and a court of equity will decree an injunction, and this without any showing of actual damage or substantial injury. * * * He [owner] has the right to define the injury for himself, and also for his grantees of the remaining lots * * *. He, or any subsequent owner * * * may enforce the covenant when it is broken, and is not to be defeated by the opinion of any number of persons that the breach occasions no substantial injury." It was said in Joyce v. Krupp, 1927, 83 Cal.App. 391, at the bottom of page 398, 257 P. 124, at page 127: "Where equitable relief is sought, proof of actual or substantial injury is not essential, the establishment of a violation of a uniform building restriction being all that is necessary to entitle a complaining owner to relief * * *." "The propriety of affording equitable relief by injunction rests in the sound discretion of the trial court to be exercised according to the circumstances and exigencies of each particular case." Diederichsen v. Sutch, 1941, 47 Cal.App.2d 646, 649, 118 P.2d 863, 865. The court did not abuse its discretion.

[8, 9] The second contention of defendants is that equitable relief should not be granted to one who has violated restrictions. They assert that plaintiff Virginia W. Morgan violated restrictions as to lot 8 in that she maintained a hedge about 7 feet in height on the south side of her house. A witness called by defendants testified to that effect. Morgan testified that there was a line of shrubs, but not a solid line, between the curb and the southeast corner of the house; that the shrubs were not on the Morgan property; that they were not a hedge; that he planted them on the adjoining lot 7, with the permission of the owner; and that he could remove them in 10 minutes. The court found that it was not true that the building on lot 8 did not conform with the restrictions. No finding was made concerning the hedge or shrubbery, but the finding that the building was not in violation of the restrictions should be regarded, in view of the judgment, as a general finding sufficient to include the item of landscaping. They also assert that plaintiff Hoffman violated the restrictions as to lot 4, in that a well which extended across the premises was 40 feet from the curb instead of being not less than 45 feet from the property line, as required by the restrictions. Morgan testified that the part of the premises referred to as a wall was landscape gardening to hold up flower beds. Defendants also contended that a corner of the Hoffman garage was 2 feet closer to the property line than was permitted by the restrictions. The garage adjoined the residence building, as required by the restrictions, and was a part of it. The court found that it was not true that the building on lot 4 did not conform with the restrictions. No special finding was made concerning the wall or the garage. There was no allegation in the answer referring specially to the garage. The general finding concerning the building included the garage and was sufficient, in view of the judgment, to include also a determination that the portion of the premises referred to as a wall or a part of a flower bed was not a violation.

[10] Furthermore, it was not alleged that any of the plaintiffs other than the owners of lots 10 and 4 violated the restrictions. Defendants did contend, however, that a hedge on lot 2 which the owner, Mrs. Schneider, said was 1 foot high, was a violation. Even assuming that some of the plaintiffs had violated the restrictions, the other plaintiffs would not by reason thereof be prevented from obtaining injunctive relief, if they were otherwise entitled to it and had no knowledge that the restrictions had been violated by any person other than defendants. Alderson v. Cutting, 1912, 163 Cal. 503, 506, 126 P. 157, Ann.Cas.1914A, 1.

[11] The third contention of defendants is that damages cannot be awarded as an alternative when only injunctive relief was sought in the complaint. Their argument is that plaintiffs sought only injunctive relief in the complaint and did not establish any facts upon which the court could award damages. The complaint was labeled "Complaint for Injunction," did not include a prayer for damages, but did allege that said violations by defendants caused great damage to plaintiffs, and included a prayer for general relief. "The subject-matter of an action and the issues involved are determinable from the facts pleaded, rather than from the title or prayer for relief." Standard Brands of California v. Bryce, 1934, 1 Cal.2d 718, 721, 37 P.2d 446, 447. The case was tried upon the theory that the amount of damages was involved. Plaintiffs and defendants called witnesses who testified concerning damages. The trial judge stated just before the case was submitted that he did not know how much he would allow as damages or whether he would make an alternative judgment. At the time the judge made that statement defendants did not indicate in any way that they considered the amount of damages was not involved. The amount of damages was an issue in the trial. At the beginning of the trial the parties requested the trial judge to view the property involved, and the judge stated he would do so after testimony had been received. At the close of the trial the judge stated that plaintiffs were entitled to a remedy, that he had not looked at the premises and had not indicated "how much he would allow"—whether a stated amount or "an alternative judgment to move the house back" or allow damages, and he would look at the property before he made up his mind. The record does not show that the judge did not view the property, and it will be assumed that he did view it. In the case of Rose v. State of California, 1942, 19 Cal.2d 713, at page 733, 123 P.2d 505, at page 517, which was a condemnation case in which the judge determined the amount of damages, it was stated: "That the trial judge is not bound by the opinion of the witnesses on market value is well settled. * * * Furthermore, in the instant case the trial judge visited the premises, and the information so obtained 'is independent evidence to be taken into consideration by the court in determining the issues of the case.'"

[12, 13] Defendants also argue that the court in awarding $1,000 damages found that plaintiffs' injury was compensable, and therefore they had an adequate remedy at law and injunctive relief should have been denied. It can be argued with equal force that the fact that injunctive relief was granted was a finding that the injury was not compensable. An alternative judgment was rendered in the case of Carey v. Bowie, 1933, 130 Cal.App. 400, 19 P.2d 1032, which required defendants to remove a part of their dwelling, in order to comply with building restrictions, to a point not less than 4 feet from the property line, or to pay $1,000 damages. On appeal by defendants the judgment was affirmed. The alternative form of the judgment, however, was not discussed in the opinion. The attorney for defendants herein correctly states that it does not appear from the opinion therein that alternative relief was not prayed for. The transcript in the cited case is not available, but the respondent's brief therein stated, "Plaintiff prayed for a mandatory injunction compelling the removal of the offending addition, for damages in the sum of One Thousand Dollars ($1,000), and for general relief." It therefore appears that alternative relief was not prayed for in the complaint in the cited case in which an alternative judgment was rendered. It is true that was not a case wherein injunctive relief only was sought, but it is also true that alternative relief was not sought therein. The awarding of damages in the present case, however, did not indicate that the injunction should not have been granted. The circumstances in the case at bar were such that the court was required to grant the mandatory injunction. The defendant deliberately proceeded, after notices and protests, to construct his building in violation of the restrictions with full knowledge that he was violating them and in total disregard of the notices and protests of the owners of other lots. The encroachment by defendants within the restricted distance from the property line was not slight, but was great. At one place defendants' building extended about 12 feet into the restricted area. The evidence shows that the expense of moving the house after the foundation was in would have been between $1,500 and $2,000. Of course, after the house was completed, the expense of moving it would be considerably more. The mandatory injunction having been required by the evidence, and having been granted, the alternative part of the judgment whereby defendants were granted the privilege of paying $1,000 damages in lieu of complying with the restrictions, was therefore a ruling very much in favor of defendants. The position of defendants is, therefore, that they are objecting to a part of the judgment which, under the circumstances, is favorable to them. The plaintiffs have not appealed from that portion of the judgment. It is not necessary, however, to decide herein either of the questions as to the propriety of an alternative judgment for damages or as to the sufficiency of the evidence to support the award of damages. The judgment of injunction was supported by the findings and the evidence, and it was not necessary, as above shown, that any specific amount of damage be proved as a basis for the injunction. The alternative part of the judgment which permits the defendants to evade the injunction by paying $1,000 was not based upon a finding of damages in that amount, for there was no such finding. The absence of such a finding is a sufficient answer to defendants' contention that the award of damages shows a case where plaintiffs can be adequately compensated in damages and hence no injunction should be granted. The alternative, allowing payment of $1,000, apparently was an act of grace toward the defendants, and was based upon nothing appearing in the findings. If it was an error, it was in favor of defendants. The evidence clearly shows, and defendants concede, that it would cost them much more than $1,000 to comply with the injunction. The alternative allowing the payment of damages being in defendants' favor, they cannot complain of it on this appeal. 2 Cal.Jur. 841; Irvine v. MacGregor, 1928, 203 Cal. 583, 586, 265 P. 218.

[14] Defendants also contend that they have been deprived of a jury trial upon the issue of damages because the complaint did not include an issue as to damages, and there was no issue upon which they could base a request for a jury. As above stated, the case was tried upon the theory that the issue of damages was involved. Also as above shown, if injunctive relief was the only issue (as defendants contend), proof of actual or substantial injury was not essential. Joyce v. Krupp, supra. Defendants did not suggest at any time when the matter of damages was being presented by plaintiffs and themselves that defendants desired a jury trial. Furthermore, when the judge stated at the close of the case that he might allow damages, no indication was made by defendants that they desired a trial by jury if damages were to be allowed. Under such circumstances defendants' contention that they were deprived of a jury trial cannot be sustained.

3. Easements 🔑53

Where the right to the operation of irrigation ditch across plaintiff's land under an easement was conceded, an agreement, under which plaintiff fenced both sides of the ditch and defendants improved and maintained ditch, could not be repudiated by plaintiff by bringing an action to enjoin the use of the ditch.

4. Easement 🔑36(1)

Where road was in open and uninterrupted use for more than fifty years in connection with operation of an irrigation ditch, the presumption arose that the use was under a claim of right and adverse, and it was not necessary that the use thereof be defended upon theory that road was a way of necessity.

Appeal from Superior Court, Stanislaus County; G. B. Hjelm, Judge.

Action by Jose S. Rose against Lena Peters and others to enjoin the use of an irrigation ditch running across plaintiff's land, and for damages wherein defendant filed cross complaint for declaratory relief seeking a determination of the rights and duties of the respective parties in relation to the ditch. From a judgment declaring defendant's rights to the use of the ditch for irrigation purposes and requiring plaintiff to protect the banks from the ditch giving defendant an easement in the roadway, plaintiffs appeal.

Affirmed.

Herbert E. Paul, of Modesto, for appellant.

Whitehurst & Logan, of Patterson, for respondents.

NOURSE, Presiding Justice.

Plaintiff sued in equity to enjoin the use of an irrigation ditch running across his land, and for damages for the use of the ditch. Defendants filed a cross-complaint for declaratory relief seeking a determination of the rights and duties of the respective parties in relation to the ditch. The defendants had judgment declaring that they were entitled to use the ditch for irrigation purposes, to pass over and through plaintiff's land to maintain the ditch and, for that purpose, to use a certain roadway running through plaintiff's land. It was also declared that defendants were bound to maintain the ditch in reasonable condition to prevent injury to plaintiff's land, and that the latter was bound to maintain fences on either side of the ditch to prevent injury to the banks from his cattle and livestock. The plaintiff appeals from the judgment on the cross-complaint. He attacks the portions of the judgment requiring him to protect the banks of the ditch and giving defendants an easement in the roadway.

The ditch was constructed in the early 70's and had been used continuously by defendants, or their predecessors in interest, ever since. During all this time the defendants, or their predecessors, had used the road, or lane, as a means of egress to clean, maintain, and control the flow of water during the irrigating period. The common ownership in the properties terminated about 1907 and the defendants, either directly or through their predecessors, continued to use the ditch and the road until 1936 when the plaintiff complained that injury was being suffered. A settlement of differences was then made wherein plaintiff agreed to fence both sides of the ditch and the defendants agreed to improve and maintain it. The agreement was carried out until the year 1940, when plaintiff commenced this action.

[1-3] The first point raised by appellant, relating to the portion of the judgment requiring him to maintain the fences and protect the sides of the ditch, is controlled by the executed oral agreement of the parties made in 1936. The position of respondents is unanswerable. The easement for the operation of the ditch is conceded. The agreement relating to its maintenance called for mutual obligations and those of the respondents have been fully performed. We may take it as settled that ordinarily the owner of an easement is required to keep it in repair, but it is a monotonous truism that the parties may alter their legal obligations by contract. Hence, since an easement may be created by an executed oral agreement (Flickinger v. Shaw, 87 Cal. 126, 25 P. 268, 11 L.R.A. 134, 22 Am.St.Rep. 234; 9 Cal.Jur. p. 949) there is nothing unreasonable in the rule that the owner of the servient tenement may by agreement obligate himself to join in keeping the easement in repair. 17 Am. Jur. p. 1005. This was what was done here. The contract carried mutual considerations; the appellant accepted all the benefits; has made no effort to rescind the contract; and has shown no grounds in this proceeding supporting his repudiation of it. The case of Durfee v. Garvey, 78 Cal. 546, 21 P. 302, upon which appellant puts his whole case, is not in point. There the court merely followed the accepted rule that the owner of an easement had the duty to maintain and repair it. The question of the rights of the parties under a special covenant to maintain and repair was not involved.

[4] The second point raised by the appellant does not require extended comment. He argues that respondents' right to use the road in maintaining and repairing the ditch can be defended only upon the theory that the road is a way of necessity. He follows this with the argument that other means are equally available. But respondents do not rely upon this theory. Their claim to the use of the road rests squarely upon prescription. The evidence shows that the road was in open and uninterrupted use for more than fifty years. From this the presumption arises that the use was under a claim of right and adverse. Fleming v. Howard, 150 Cal. 28, 30, 87 P. 908; Wells v. Dias, 57 Cal.App. 670, 672, 207 P. 913; 28 C.J.S., Easements, § 6, p. 641; 17 Am.Jur. p. 967.

The judgment is affirmed.

GOSNELL v. WEBB

Civ. 14028.

District Court of Appeal, Second District,
Division 3, California.
July 27, 1943.

1. Divorce 🔑245(1)

Provision of interlocutory divorce decree directing husband to pay $200 per month to wife was a provision for "alimony" and was not a term of a "property settlement" given judicial approval, and therefore the decree was one within jurisdiction of court to modify. Civ.Code, § 139.

See Words and Phrases, Permanent Edition, for all other definitions of "Alimony" and "Property Settlement".

2. Divorce 🔑255

Where recitals of divorce decree were inconsistent with any claim that agreement of parties approved by decree settled amount of alimony beyond court's jurisdiction to modify it, in proceeding for order of modification, the decree could not be collaterally attacked by evidence that it was not what it appeared to be, or that it was not in accordance with agreement of parties.

3. Appeal and error 🔑854(1)

Ordinarily, an order will be affirmed if any ground exists which supports it, irrespective of reason advanced by trial court, but such rule does not apply where it appears that the trial court has declined to pass on the merits of a motion.

4. Divorce 🔑286

Where trial court improperly determined that it was without jurisdiction to modify alimony provision of interlocutory divorce decree, the order could not be affirmed on theory that the movant was estopped from seeking modification of the decree.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Roy V. Rhodes, Judge.

Action for divorce by Bertie Gosnell against Ira Gosnell, wherein the defendant filed a motion for reduction of alimony, and wherein Arthur C. Webb, as executor of the estate of Ira Gosnell, deceased, was substituted as party defendant in lieu of Ira Gosnell. From an order denying the motion, the substituted defendant appeals.

Reversed.

B. Russell Priess, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Rupert B. Turnbull, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

BISHOP, Justice pro tem.

The appeal before us is from the following order: "Motion by defendant for reduction of alimony awarded in Interlocutory Decree of Divorce, heretofore submitted June 22, 1942, the Court now finds that the Interlocutory Decree of Divorce granted by this Court June 17, 1940 was made by the Court after stipulation of parties as to various issues involved, made in open court and prior to completion of the taking of testimony at the trial; that said interlocutory decree did in truth and in fact reflect a compromise of all of the marital and property rights of the parties and embodied therein the ultimate result of what amounted to a property settlement agreement between the parties; that because thereof this court is without jurisdiction to modify or alter this decree.

and it is therefor[e] ordered that the motion by defendant to modify the interlocutory decree of divorce with respect to award of alimony and for reduction thereof, now be and hereby is denied." We are of the opinion that the trial court had jurisdiction to modify the interlocutory decree, (adopted by reference in the Final Judgment of Divorce) and that it erred in declining to consider defendant's motion on its merits.

We are interested in the following excerpts from the introductory recitals found in the interlocutory decree itself and in paragraph 2 of the decree: "Thereupon it was stipulated that the plaintiff might amend her prayer for relief to ask for other and additional relief, to wit, divorce.

"It was further stipulated that the matters of permanent alimony for plaintiff, attorneys' fees and costs should be submitted to the Court without further testimony or other proceedings.

"Thereupon the Court said: 'Let the records show nevertheless that it has been submitted before the trial has been fully completed. Both sides still have other testimony that could have been produced. They are waiving that for the purpose of compromise,' to which all the counsel, in the presence of their respective clients assented; whereupon the Court took the cause under submission, and the Court having duly considered the law and the evidence and being dully [sic] advised in the premises, and findings of fact and conclusions of law having been expressly waived by both parties; and

"It being further stipulated and agreed by the respective counsel, in the presence of the plaintiff and defendant, in open court, that the court enter its judgment awarding to the plaintiff herein such sum or sums as alimony to be paid to the plaintiff by the defendant as may be determined by the court.

"* * * Now, Therefore * * * 2. It is further ordered, adjudged and decreed that the defendant be, and he is hereby directed to pay to the plaintiff as alimony, the sum of Two Hundred ($200.00) Dollars per month, commencing June 10, 1940, and continuing thereafter until the death or remarriage of the plaintiff."

[1] No possible construction consonant with reason can be placed upon this decree other than that its provision directing that the defendant pay $200 per month to the plaintiff is a provision for alimony; it is not a term of a property settlement given judicial approval. Unless it be permitted to prove that the decree has a meaning different from that appearing on its face, the decree must be given the effect of one providing for alimony, and hence one within the jurisdiction of the court to modify. Civil Code, § 139; Ross v. Ross, 1934, 1 Cal.2d 368, 369, 35 P.2d 316; Leupe v. Leupe, Cal.Sup.1942, 130 P.2d 697.

[2] The plaintiff contended, in her attempt to show cause why the provision respecting alimony should not be modified:

"I. That the order for payment of $200.00 per month for alimony now sought to be modified by the defendant Ira Gosnell, was an order made by the trial court only after the parties plaintiff and defendant and their respective counsel, had in open court stipulated that they desired to compromise the question involved with respect to property, property rights and alimony, and that the said judgment of the trial court, which is now a final judgment, expressly provided that the said judgment with respect to alimony was made in effect, as a compromise, and that the said Bertie M. Gosnell had additional proof with respect to the property and property rights of defendant, which she could have produced at said trial, and which evidence was not produced because of the compromise and promise of the defendant and the agreement on the part of the defendant that the property rights of the parties could be forever fixed, and that the same were fixed by said decree, and by the order for payment of $200.00 per month alimony.

"II. That the said judgment and decree was made as a result of all property settlement had by stipulation, and this court has no jurisdiction and should not vacate and set aside the said judgment." Even were it true that the parties had agreed upon the amount to be allowed as alimony, so long as it was provided for in the decree as alimony and not as an approval of a contractual settlement, the decree would remain subject to modification. Ross v. Ross, supra, 1 Cal.2d 368, and cases cited, page 369, 35 P.2d 316. But, we have already seen, the decree recites that the matter of permanent alimony was "submitted to the court" which was to enter judgment awarding such sums as alimony "as may be determined by the court." These recitals are inconsistent with any claim that the agreement of the parties settled the amount of alimony beyond the court's jurisdiction to modify it. It is not permitted, in this proceeding for an order of modification, collaterally to attack the decree by evidence that it is not what it appears to be, or that it is not in accordance with the agreement of the parties. Nielson v. Emerson, 1931, 119 Cal.App. 214, 218, 6 P.2d 281, and cases cited.

[3, 4] It may be that what the plaintiff was striving to show was that the defendant was estopped to move for a modification of the decree. Whether or not the showing made was sufficient to warrant a denial of the motion we need not consider, for that was not the basis upon which the court acted. While usually an order will be affirmed if any ground exists which supports it, irrespective of the reason advanced by the trial court, (Bealmear v. So. Cal. Edison Co., Cal.Sup.1943, 139 P.2d 20) this is not so where it appears that the trial court has declined to pass upon the merits of a motion. Liles v. Superior Court, 1937, 19 Cal.App.2d 506, 507, 65 P.2d 920; Smith v. Superior Court, 1937, 21 Cal.App.2d 160, 163, 69 P.2d 176; and see People v. Jones, 1927, 87 Cal.App. 482, 496, 262 P. 361; Laumann v. Conner, 1936, 12 Cal. App.2d 631, 55 P.2d 1225; and People v. McEntyre, 1938, 32 Cal.App.Supp.2d 752, 761, 84 P.2d 560. To hold that because the trial court denied defendant's motion he therefore considered it on its merits, because his proper course on the theory that he had no jurisdiction to grant it would have been to take no action whatever, would be to let the form control the substance. We do not interpret Lincoln v. Superior Court, Cal.Sup.1943, 139 P.2d 13, as requiring such an unfortunate result. The defendant may not have merited having the alimony order modified, but he did have the right to have his motion weighed to see if it did have merit, and the trial court plainly, and erroneously, never came to that question, because it first of all decided that the interlocutory decree was not what it appeared to be, but was something else.

The order denying defendant's motion is reversed.

LEENDERS v. CALIFORNIA HAWAIIAN SUGAR REFINING CORPORATION, Limited.

Civ. 12333.

District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California.

July 23, 1943.

Rehearing Denied Aug. 21, 1943.

Hearing Denied Sept. 20, 1943.

1. Wharves 🔑21

A stevedore, employed by shipping company, an independent contractor, to deliver goods to wharf of defendant, was as to defendant an "invitee" to whom defendant was under duty to use ordinary care to furnish him a safe place in which to work.

See Words and Phrases, Permanent Edition, for all other definitions of "Invitee".

2. Negligence 🔑32(3)

Duty of owner to keep premises safe for use by an invitee does not extend to keeping premises safe for uses outside purpose and scope of invitation for which property was not designed, and which could not reasonably have been anticipated except where owner was present and actively co-operating with invitee in particular use of premises involved in injury to invitee.

3. Wharves 🔑21

Where steamship company was invited by owner of warehouse to use particular bay of warehouse for unloading part of its cargo with knowledge by owner that in so doing landing cable must scrape face plank on edge of roof of warehouse as each load was drawn inward to table by stevedores, owner had duty to use ordinary care to see that face plank was secure and strong enough to withstand such usage.

4. Trial 🔑142

In solution of question of fact, jury was entitled if its judgment so dictated to draw every reasonable inference favorable to plaintiff's case from evidence presented.

5. Wharves 🔑21

Evidence as to conduct of owner of warehouse authorized finding that stevedore employed by steamship company and unloading ship at particular bay of warehouse, when injured by falling face plank attached to edge of roof of warehouse and against which plank ship's unloading chain scraped, was an "invitee" in that particular bay of warehouse, so as to make owner negligent in allowing a rotten plank to be subjected to such use, notwithstanding that there were other bays where unloading chain would not have touched face plank.

6. Evidence ⚷75

Failure of party to produce evidence presumptively in his power to produce will support inference that such evidence if produced would be unfavorable to his case.

7. Wharves ⚷21

Where face board on edge of roof of warehouse appeared sturdy to observation of foreman of stevedores unloading ship, and evidence authorized finding of an invitation by warehouse owner to use warehouse unloading bay in such a manner that landing cables came in contact with face board, which actually was rotten, negligence of steamship company was at most concurrent and was not a bar to a recovery by injured stevedore against warehouse owner.

8. Wharves ⚷21

Where evidence disclosed that rotten face board attached to edge of warehouse roof withstood scraping of unloading chain for several hours before breaking loose and injuring plaintiff stevedore, court could not hold as a matter of law that a sound face board two inches thick fastened by heavy iron bolts would not withstand scraping of such chain so as to excuse warehouse owner's negligence in not replacing rotten face board.

9. Appeal and error ⚷989

Where jury resolved evidence against defendant, District Court of Appeal could not reweigh it, but was limited to a determination of sufficiency of evidence to support verdict.

10. Appeal and error ⚷928(4)

Under rule requiring appellant to present a record on appeal which will support his claims of error, where record failed to disclose at whose request instructions were given it was presumed in support of judgment that instructions complained of were given at appellant's request.

11. Damages ⚷168(2)

Fact that plaintiff had been physically impaired so as to increase probability of future infection in an eye was competent to be considered by jury in determining extent of plaintiff's present and permanent injury.

12. Damages ⚷168(2), 185(3)

Testimony that injury to plaintiff's eye would result in abnormal accumulation of bacteria, and that, in event of eye being scratched, presence of bacteria might cause infection or ulcer which could result in loss of eyeball, would not support an award of damages on theory that such infection with attendant results was reasonably certain to occur, but could competently be considered in determining actual impairment of eye as permanently decreasing resistance to infection.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; George W. Schonfield, Judge.

Action by William Leenders against California Hawaiian Sugar Refining Corporation, Limited, for injuries sustained when face board on roof of warehouse owned by defendant swung down and struck plaintiff while plaintiff was helping unload ship into warehouse. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals.

Affirmed.

Myrick & Deering & Scott, and James Walter Scott, all of San Francisco, for appellant.

John A. Foley, Jack Flinn, and Leo H. Shapiro, all of San Francisco, for respondent.

DOOLING, Justice pro tem.

Plaintiff recovered judgment for personal injuries, after a jury trial. On appeal defendant's principal claim is that the evidence is not sufficient to support the verdict and judgment. There is little conflict in the evidence since defendant produced only two witnesses, a medical witness whose testimony was limited to evidence of the extent and character of plaintiff's injuries, and a maker of maps and diagrams whose testimony was concerned exclusively with a description of the premises where plaintiff's injuries were incurred.

From the evidence introduced by the plaintiff it appears that on July 7, 1941, the S.S. Malama was engaged in unloading a cargo of sugar at the "Bankers Warehouse" owned and operated by defendant at Crockett, California. Plaintiff was working as a stevedore employed by the steamship company in this work of unloading. The Bankers Warehouse is a wooden structure over 50 years old which for several years had not been used by defendant for unloading or storing sugar. It consists of a pier or wharf at least 550 feet long covered by a sloping roof open on the water side and supported by posts set approximately fourteen feet apart. Between the outer edge of these posts and the edge of the wharf along the water there is a strip of wharf about three feet wide which is not covered by the roof.

In unloading a cargo it is the practice of the stevedores to set up a table consisting of planks placed upon wooden horses. This table, where, as here, the cargo is being discharged onto a roofed-over pier, is set as close to the waters edge as possible to avoid contact between the cable which delivers the cargo to the pier and the edge of the roof. On the day in question the ship was moored so that its number three hatch was opposite an opening or bay, between two of the uprights supporting the roof, which was obstructed by a mooring bitt consisting of wooden piles extending above the surface of the wharf and set back some distance from its edge. This bitt interfered with the setting of the landing table toward the water side of the wharf so that the table extended only about one foot outside of the edge of the roof. Along the roof's edge above this bay there was a face board consisting of a wooden plank 2 inches thick and 10 inches wide fastened to the structure by iron bolts about ½ inch in diameter. In unloading the cargo it was brought from the ship's hold in a sling at the end of a steel cable operated by a power driven winch. Each load weighed about 1,600 pounds. The loads were lowered to a point slightly above the edge of the table without touching the roof or face board and then it was necessary for two stevedores standing on the table to draw the load manually under the roof so that it could be deposited on the table. In doing this the cable was drawn against and scraped along the face board.

The face board was observed by the foreman of the stevedores to have old scratches or gouges on its surface, apparently made by the scraping of unloading cables against it at some earlier time. The sugar was delivered by the stevedores from the table to trucks and the trucks were then taken by employees of defendant who hauled the sugar away and stacked it. The work of unloading at this particular bay commenced at 8 A.M. on July 7, 1941. About 10 A.M. that morning two carpenters or millwrights came to the bay and the work of unloading was halted while they nailed up a diagonal cross piece, between one of the uprights and the beam supporting the edge of the roof, which had become loosened. About 3:30 P.M. as a load was being delivered to the table one end of the face plank tore loose from its bolts and swung down striking plaintiff on the face and head. This end of the face plank "was rotten. Lots of rotten pieces. When it hit Mr. Leenders there was a few rotten pieces left on the table there from the plank * * *. This end was rotten (indicating), around the bolt it was rotten. * * * The end that fell down was rotten."

Defendant's evidence showed that there were approximately seventeen bays where there were not bitts to interfere with setting a table so that the landing cable would not come in contact with the edge of the roof.

[1] Plaintiff, being employed by an independent contractor to deliver goods to the wharf of defendant, was as to the defendant an invitee on its premises, (Hinds v. Wheadon, 19 Cal.2d 458, 460, 121 P.2d 724; Burke v. John E. Marshall, Inc., 42 Cal.App.2d 195, 108 P.2d 738; Buckingham v. San Joaquin Cotton Oil Co., 128 Cal.App. 94, 16 P.2d 807) to whom the defendant was under a duty to use ordinary care to furnish him a safe place in which to work.

Defendant does not dispute this as a general principle of law, but seeks to take this case out of the general rule on a number of grounds.

[2, 3] The principal ground urged by defendant to take the case out of the general rule is thus stated in defendant's opening brief: "While there is a duty to keep the premises safe for all uses by an invitee which are within the scope of the invitation, the owner is not bound to keep them safe for uses outside the purpose and scope of the invitation for which the property was not designed, and which could not reasonably have been anticipated."

In support of this statement defendant cites: Fanjoy v. Seales, 29 Cal. 243; Baddeley v. Shea, 114 Cal. 1, 45 P. 990, 33 L.R.A. 747, 55 Am.St.Rep. 56; Kalis v. Shattuck, 69 Cal. 593, 11 P. 346; Kauffman v. Maier, 94 Cal. 269, 29 P. 481, 18 L.R.A. 124; Gribben v. Yellow Aster etc., Co., 142 Cal. 248, 75 P. 839; Slyter v. Clinton Const. Co., 107 Cal.App. 348, 290 P. 643; Fountain v. Willard-Slater Co., 172 Cal. 129, 155 P. 630; Scott v. Fuller Co., 41 Cal.App.2d 501, 107 P.2d 55; and a number of cases from other jurisdictions. It will serve no useful purpose to discuss the facts of these several cases. It will be sufficient to concede that they all, on a variety of facts, support the rule set out in the sentence quoted from defendant's opening brief, but in none of them does it appear, as here, that the owner of the premises was present and actively cooperating with the invitee in the particular use of the premises involved in the injury to the plaintiff. The basic question presented by this argument of defendant is whether on the evidence in this case the jury was bound as a matter of law to find that the use of the premises made by plaintiff's employer was, to requote a portion of the above quoted language, "for uses outside the purpose and scope of the invitation * * * and which could not reasonably have been anticipated." To put the matter affirmatively, if the evidence will support a finding that the steamship company was invited by the defendant to use this particular bay for unloading of part of its cargo with knowledge on the defendant's part that in so doing the landing cable must scrape the face plank as each load was drawn inward to the table by the stevedores, then defendant would be under a legal duty to use ordinary care to see that the face plank was secure and strong enough to withstand such usage.

[4-6] In the solution of this question of fact the jury was entitled, if its judgment so dictated, to draw every reasonable inference favorable to plaintiff's case from the evidence presented. It was also entitled to find, if the evidence warranted, that an invitation was implied by the defendant's conduct. 19 Cal.Jur. 619. The jury in this respect had the following pertinent facts before it: the face plank bore old scars indicating that other ships had in the past been unloaded at this bay; the employees of defendant were continuously receiving the sugar from the stevedores as it was unloaded at this bay; and at 10 A.M. two carpenters or millwrights made repairs to the structure of this bay at a time when it was actually in use for unloading. From these facts the inference could reasonably be drawn that the use of this particular bay was at least at the implied, if not at the express, invitation of defendant. The further fact probably did not escape the attention of the jury that defendant, which had it in its power to produce evidence, if it existed, to rebut this reasonable inference, chose rather to rest on the supposed weakness of plaintiff's case and produced no witness from among its own officials or employees in authority at the Bankers Warehouse at the time of the accident or present when it occurred. The failure of a party to produce evidence presumptively in his power to produce will support the inference that such evidence if produced would be unfavorable to his case. Bone v. Hayes, 154 Cal. 759, 765, 99 P. 172; Perry v. Paladini, Inc., 89 Cal.App. 275, 281, 264 P. 580; II Wigmore on Evidence, 3d Ed., sec. 285, p. 162 and sec. 289, p. 171.

The jury was entitled to find as reasonable inferences from the evidence produced that defendant expressly or impliedly invited the steamship company to unload at this particular bay; that defendant knew that the cable must scrape the face board; and that it was negligent in allowing a rotten board to be subjected to this use.

[7] Defendant's claim that the negligence of the steamship company was the sole proximate cause of the fall of the face board is based upon cases of which Hayden v. Paramount Productions, Inc., 33 Cal.App.2d 287, 91 P.2d 231, is typical. In that case a crane was accidentally brought into contact with a high tension wire over forty-five feet in the air by a plaintiff who knew the position of the wire and its dangerous voltage. Here the face board before its fall appeared sturdy to the observation of the foreman of the stevedores, and the jury was entitled to find an invitation by defendant to use it in the manner in which it was actually used. The cases are not at all parallel; and even were the steamship company also negligent it would still present a case of concurrent negligence which would be no bar to a recovery by the steamship company's employee. Strong v. Chronicle Pub. Co., 34 Cal.App.2d 335, 340, 93 P.2d 649; Dobbie v. Pacific Gas & Electric Co., 95 Cal.App. 781, 273 P. 630.

[8] Defendant argues with much vigor that the continual "pounding" of the cable with its heavy load was such that even a sound face board could not have withstood it. This is an argument on a question of fact which might well be, and probably was, made to the jury. It is supported by no direct testimony in the record. We are in no position to hold as a matter of law that a sound face board 2 inches thick fastened to the structure by heavy iron bolts could not withstand the scraping of a chain against it which supported a load that could be handled manually by two men, particularly in the face of evidence that a rotten board withstood it for a period of several hours.

[9] The fact that there were at least seventeen bays where the cargo could have been unloaded without the cable coming in contact with the shed was only one element to be considered by the jury in determining what inferences were to be reasonably drawn from the evidence. The jury having resolved the evidence against defendant, we may not reweigh it. Our function is limited to a determination of its sufficiency to support the verdict.

[10] Defendant is in no position to urge error in any of the instructions given by the court. The burden is on an appellant to present a record on appeal which will support his claims of error. Defendant has presented a transcript which fails to show at whose request any of the instructions were given and it must be presumed in support of the judgment that the instructions complained of were given at defendant's request. 2 Cal.Jur. 870.

[11, 12] A medical witness for plaintiff, after testifying that the tear duct of one of plaintiff's eyes had been so injured that it did not carry off the water from his eye, testified that such a condition would result in an abnormal accumulation of bacteria in the eye and that in the event of the eye being scratched in the future the presence of these germs might cause an infection or an ulcer which could impair the patient to a great extent or even result in the loss of the eyeball. This is attacked as speculative. Defendant in this attack overlooks the distinction between the general competency of evidence and its sufficiency to support a particular finding. The fact that plaintiff had been physically impaired so as to increase the probability of future infection in the eye was a proper matter to be considered by the jury in determining the extent of his present and permanent injury. The jury could not properly award him damages on such evidence on the theory that such infection with its attendant results was reasonably certain to occur. It could take into consideration the actual impairment of his eye which permanently decreased his resistance to infection with all the results that might be attendant thereon. The size of the verdict does not indicate that the jury awarded damages on the theory that it regarded the future impairment of plaintiff's eyesight or the loss of his eyeball as reasonably certain. The distinction between the competency of such evidence and its probative effect is elaborately discussed in Bauman v. San Francisco, 42 Cal.App.2d 144, 163 et seq., 108 P.2d 989; Cordiner v. Los Angeles Traction Co., 5 Cal.App. 400, 91 P. 436; and II Wigmore on Evidence, 3d Ed., sec. 663, pp. 776-7.

The judgment appealed from is affirmed.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Mateo County; A. R. Cotton, Judge.

Action by Evelyn Pruitt and others against Edward Krovitz and others to recover for death of plaintiff's husband in an automobile collision and action by Ed Hansen against Edward Krovitz and others to recover for injuries sustained in the same collision, which cases were consolidated for trial. Judgments for plaintiffs, and defendant Harry R. Krovitz appeals.

Affirmed.

F. E. Hoffmann, of San Mateo, for appellant.

Wayne R. Millington, of Redwood City, for respondents.

KNIGHT, Justice.

An automobile driven by Harry Krovitz collided with one driven by Ed Hansen, as a result of which the drivers of both cars were injured, and Joseph Pruitt, who was riding with Hansen, suffered a basal skull fracture and other injuries from the effects of which he died two days later. Alleging that the accident was proximately caused by the negligent operation of the Krovitz car, Pruitt's widow brought an action against him to recover damages on account of the death of her husband, and Hansen sued separately to collect damages for the personal injuries he sustained. The actions were consolidated for trial, and a jury returned verdicts in favor of the plaintiff in each action. Krovitz appealed from the judgments entered on said verdicts, and the appeals are presented in one record.

[1] Appellant makes no claim that the evidence is insufficient to establish negligence on his part, but contends that Hansen was guilty of negligence as a matter of law, and that therefore the trial court committed error in denying appellant's motions for nonsuit and a new trial. There is no merit in the contention. The record discloses a typical fact case, the evidence being conflicting on several essential factors, and the question of proximate cause being one for the determination of the jury.

[2] The accident happened in the city of San Mateo on the evening of March 22, 1941, between dusk and dark, at the intersection of Grand and Seventh Streets, which cross each other at right angles. The parties stipulated that it was an "obstructed intersection," within the meaning of the Vehicle Code definition thereof, section 511(a) (4), St.1941, p. 2716, and that consequently 15 miles an hour was the speed limit across the intersection. Hansen was driving a two-door Ford coach northerly along Grant Street, and appellant was driving a Buick sedan westerly along Seventh Street. Pruitt was riding on the front seat with Hansen, and Mrs. Hansen and Mrs. Pruitt occupied the rear seat. They had just driven from the Hansen home, a few blocks away, to a nearby store to purchase some groceries, and were on their way back to the Hansen home when the accident occurred. Appellant was a resident of Massachusetts; at the time of trial he was in Rhode Island, and his testimony was produced by way of deposition. On the evening of the accident he was accompanied by a friend named Ernest Fachadio. They had been at the Bay Meadows Race Track and were on their way to the Owl Cafe in San Mateo. The Hansen car entered the intersection first; its lights were on, and it had reached a point beyond the center of the intersection when it was struck on the right side by appellant's car and hurled a considerable distance beyond the point of impact. The weather was clear, the streets were dry, and the evidence introduced in behalf of respondents is amply sufficient to establish that appellant entered and attempted to cross the intersection at a speed of forty or more miles an hour, and that such was the proximate cause of collision.

[3, 4] In support of his point that Hansen was guilty of negligence as a matter of law appellant contends that Hansen drove into the intersection "blindly"—without looking for approaching traffic. The record shows otherwise. Hansen testified positively that upon reaching the intersection and before attempting to cross it he looked to the right and to the left and saw no approaching vehicles; that after he "got a little way into the intersection" he again looked to the right and saw appellant's car approaching at a high rate of speed—about 40 miles an hour; that it was then about 30 feet east of the intersection; that he, Hansen, accelerated the speed of his car in an effort to get out of the way, but was unable to avoid being struck. Nor does the record support appellant's further contention that Hansen was operating his car at an unlawful rate of speed and greater than was prudent with regard to the particular intersection. Hansen was the only witness who testified regarding the speed of his car. In substance he stated that he approached the Seventh Street crossing at a speed of about 20 miles an hour; that as he reached the intersection he slowed down to 15 miles an hour; that he looked to the right and to the left and saw no cars; that when part way across the intersection he looked again and saw appellant's car travelling toward him at about 40 miles an hour; that he attempted to get out of the way of it by accelerating the speed of his car to 20 or 25 miles an hour, and that he was travelling at that speed when appellant's car struck him. On cross-examination counsel for appellant sought to impeach the witness by calling his attention to excerpts of testimony given by Hansen at the trial of some justice's court action growing out of the collision. However, the explanation given by Hansen of those portions of his previous testimony was evidently satisfactory to the jury, for it resolved whatever conflict there may have been therein in his favor; therefore, since the testimony given by Hansen at the present trial amply supports the jury's implied finding that he was not driving his car at an unlawful speed, the conclusion so reached by the jury is binding on appeal

In any event the state of the evidence is such that the question of the proximate cause of the collision is one of pure fact for the determination of the jury, and there is an abundance of evidence to support its implied finding that the proximate cause thereof was the unlawful speed and reckless manner appellant was driving his car. In addition to the testimony given by Hansen that immediately preceding the collision appellant was travelling 40 miles an hour, another witness named Patti testified that as appellant crossed the intersection a block easterly from the one where the collision took place he was travelling about 50 miles an hour. Furthermore the location and condition of both cars following the collision fully supports the inference that appellant's car struck the coach while appellant was travelling at a high rate of speed. In this connection appellant himself testified that following the impact his car continued on and came to a stop "over" a fire hydrant on the northwest corner of the intersection; that the hydrant was broken off; that the left side of his car "was all bent in" and three windows were broken; that the "hydrant had knocked the motor at an angle bending the frame of the car," and the "hood flew off." He claimed he was travelling not more than 25 miles an hour, but the evidence above narrated clearly negatives such claim.

[5-7] Appellant contends that the testimony given by the witness Patti was erroneously admitted in that it was "too remote." As said, however, in Ackel v. American Creamery Co., 12 Cal.App.2d 672, 55 P.2d 1195, the law is well established in this state that the admission or rejection of evidence as to the rate of speed a vehicle is travelling before a collision occurs rests in the sound discretion of the trial court. The question rests so largely within its discretion that no fast or positive rule can be laid down governing the matter, for which reason the ruling of the trial court as to the admission or rejection of this sort of evidence will not be disturbed except upon a showing of abuse of discretion. Ritchey v. Watson, 204 Cal. 387, 268 P. 345; Traynor v. McGilvray, 54 Cal.App. 31, 200 P. 1056; Wagy v. Brave, 133 Cal. App. 413, 24 P.2d 209. Here no abuse of discretion is shown. The question of the weight that was to be given to the testimony was properly submitted to the determination of the jury.

[8-10] The trial court fully instructed the jury that the negligence of Hansen, if any, proximately contributing to the collision, barred recovery as to him; and with respect to the cause of action based on the death of Pruitt, it was instructed that if it found that Pruitt was riding with Hansen as his passenger or guest the negligence of Hansen if any could not be imputed to Pruitt; that negligence if any on the part of Hansen could not be imputed to Pruitt "in the absence of proof that he exercised control, supervision and direction as to the manner in which the automobile was being operated." Appellant contends that the portion of the instruction above quoted does not correctly state the law; that the test is not whether one exercises such control, supervision and direction, but rather whether he has the right so to do. The general rule governing in such cases as restated in Marchetti v. Southern Pacific Co., 204 Cal. 679, 269 P. 529, 530, is as follows: "The negligence of the driver of a machine, however, cannot be imputed to a passenger therein, in the absence of any evidence showing that the latter exercised some control over the driver or that he possessed the power to supervise or direct the manner in which the automobile should be operated. Bryant v. Pacific Electric R. Co., 174 Cal. 737, 164 P. 385; Irwin v. Golden State Auto Tour Corp., 178 Cal. 10, 171 P. 1059; Nichols v. Pacific Electric R. Co., 178 Cal. 630, 174 P. 319." However, in the present case, whatever deviation there may have been in the statement of the rule could not possibly have operated to appellant's prejudice, for the evidence affirmatively shows, without conflict and beyond any question of doubt, that Pruitt's status in riding with Hansen was that of a guest, and that he neither exercised control over the driving of the Hansen car nor possessed the power or the right to supervise or direct the manner in which it should be operated. In addition to the facts already set forth, the record in this respect shows that Mrs. Hansen and Mrs. Pruitt are sisters; that the Pruitts lived in South San Francisco, and on this particular afternoon were visiting Mrs. Hansen at the Hansen home; that when Hansen returned home from his work he took his car to drive to the grocery store to make some purchases, and that the Pruitts and Mrs. Hansen accompanied him. The mere fact that the Pruitts intended to and did do some shopping also while accompanying Hansen to the grocery store could in no sense bring the case within the "joint enterprise" doctrine suggested by appellant.

The judgment in each action is affirmed.

Action by Harley Hise, as Building and Loan Commissioner of the State of California, in the liquidation of Marine Building & Loan Association, against Charles J. George S. Dennison, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

McCOMB, Justice.

From a judgment in favor of plaintiff after trial before the court without a jury in an action to recover a franchise tax paid under protest, defendant appeals.

The stipulated facts are:

The Marine Building & Loan Association was duly incorporated and licensed to do business as a building and loan association in the State of California. In 1933, the California State Building & Loan Commissioner, deeming the Marine Building & Loan Association to be in an unsafe financial condition, took over the association and proceeded to liquidate its property, business, and assets.

Defendant, as Franchise Tax Commissioner of the State of California, assessed a franchise tax against the aforesaid building and loan association for the year 1938, in the sum of $250.55. The tax plus interest was paid under protest.

It is necessary for us to determine two questions, which will be stated and answered hereunder seriatim.

First: Are the operations of the State Building and Loan Commissioner in liquidating a building and loan association within the purview of section 4(1), of the Bank and Corporation Franchise Tax Act of California (Act 8488, 2 Deering's General Laws of California 1937, page 3852)?

[1] This question must be answered in the negative. The Building and Loan Commissioner of California derives his power entirely from the provisions of the Building and Loan Association Act. (Act 986, 1 Deering's General Laws of California 1937, page 538.) This act creates the office of Building and Loan Commissioner and, among other things, provides that if it shall appear to the commissioner that any building and loan association is in an unsafe condition or conducting its business in an unsafe or injurious manner such as to render its further proceedings hazardous to the public or to any or all of its investors, the commissioner may forthwith demand and take possession of the property, business, and assets of such association and retain such possession until such association shall, with the consent of the commissioner, resume business or until its affairs be liquidated. (Act 986, section 13.11, 1 Deering's General Laws of California 1937, page 599.)

It is under the foregoing provisions of the Building and Loan Association Act that plaintiff assumed control of the Marine Building and Loan Association. It is stipulated that he retained possession thereof until the affairs of the association were liquidated.

The tax authorized under section 4(1), of the Bank and Corporation Franchise Tax Act, supra, is a tax levied upon financial corporations actively engaged in doing business for the privilege of exercising their corporate franchises within this state.

When the Building and Loan Commissioner exercises the authority conferred upon him by the provisions of the Building and Loan Association Act, supra, to take possession of the property, business, and assets of a building and loan association, the building and loan association's franchise to do business is thereby suspended. (Cf. Mercantile Trust Co. v. Miller, 166 Cal. 563, 569, 137 P. 913. This case was one where the superintendent of banks, under the authority of the California Bank Act, took over the liquidation of a bank and our Supreme Court held that by so doing the bank's franchise to do business was suspended. The Bank Act contained provisions substantially similar to those of section 13.11 of the Building and Loan Association Act, supra.)

It is evident that whatever action plaintiff as Building and Loan Commissioner took in liquidating the affairs of the Marine Building and Loan Association was taken as a public officer performing his statutory duty (Richardson v. Superior Court, 138 Cal.App. 389, 392, 32 P.2d 405) and such action was not taken pursuant to the franchise of the corporation to do business as a building and loan association, since such franchise was suspended by the very act of plaintiff in taking over the affairs of the association.

It follows that defendant improperly levied a tax under the provisions of section 4(1) of the Bank and Corporation Franchise Tax Act of California, supra, and that plaintiff, having paid the same under protest, was entitled to a judgment for the amount thereof.

People v. Richardson, 37 Cal.App.2d 275, 99 P.2d 366, cited and relied on by defendant, is factually distinguishable from the instant case. In People v. Richardson the court pointed out that the superintendent of banks had appointed a conservator for the bank of San Pedro under the provisions of section 135b et seq. of the Bank Act (Statute 1933, page 319, Deering's General Laws, Act 652) and had not taken over the affairs of the bank in the capacity of a liquidator, pursuant to the provisions of section 136 et seq., of the Bank Act, supra. The court stressed the fact that the bank had engaged in business through the conservator, thus making it liable for payment of the franchise tax.

In the case before us the Building and Loan Commissioner took over the affairs of the Marine Building & Loan Association as a liquidator, and after the take over he alone conducted the affairs of the association until it was liquidated. Hence it is evident that due to the factual difference in the cases, People v. Richardson, supra, is not here in point.

Second: Even though the Franchise Tax Act was not applicable in the present case, was plaintiff's recovery barred because he had not paid either a) an income tax as trustee of the assets of the Marine Building and Loan Association, or b) a corporation income tax for said association?

[2] This question will not be considered by us for the reason that the law is established in this state that an appellate court will not consider a theory of a case different from that urged in the trial court, and which theory is presented for the first time on appeal. (Title Insurance & Trust Company v. Graham, 44 Cal.App.2d 660, 662, 112 P.2d 935, and cases therein cited.)

[3] Applying the foregoing rule to the facts of the present case, defendant did not plead by way of counterclaim the right to collect from plaintiff an income or corporation tax. Neither did he in any other way present nor urge to the trial court the defense which he is now pressing in this court. The soundness of the rule here applied is well illustrated by this case, for the reason that we have no record before us from which we could determine the amount of income or corporation tax due defendant from plaintiff. As far as the record before us discloses plaintiff does not owe defendant any tax.

For the foregoing reasons the judgment is affirmed.

This suit was instituted by plaintiffs seeking rescission of a written agreement for the purchase of certain real property. The complaint alleges that defendants falsely and fraudulently misrepresented material conditions in regard to the real property in question which induced the plaintiffs to enter into the agreement. An answer and a cross-complaint were filed, in which cross-complaint rescission of the contract to sell the real property was also asked.

The trial court announced its opinion that the rescission of the written agreement should be granted, upon the theory that defendants' pleadings constituted a consent to rescission. Upon motion of the defendants, the court vacated the submission and permitted them to withdraw their cross-complaint and to stand upon their answer. The matter was then resubmitted upon the issues raised by the complaint and the answer which denied the fraudulent misrepresentations charged in the complaint. Findings were adopted favorable to the defendants. Judgment was rendered accordingly, denying rescission.

The findings determine that defendants did not make any of the misrepresentations alleged in the complaint. The only issue for determination is the one of alleged fraud which was denied by the answer. In other words, is there substantial evidence to support the findings and judgment?

Lester T. Blackwell, one of the plaintiffs, testified that he became acquainted with Emil Ferrari, about March 1, 1940, and that he made arrangements through Mr. Nunneley, a real estate man, for the three men to drive to Ferrari's ranch so that Blackwell might view the property. The ranch is located near Diamond Springs in El Dorado County. He also testified that he was the owner of a riding stable and about fifty-two head of horses; that Mr. Nunneley knew he was looking for a ranch that would pasture fifteen or sixteen mares a year and Nunneley told him that the Ferrari ranch would serve that purpose. Mr. Blackwell said that he told Nunneley and Ferrari he did not know anything about farming and would have to rely on their judgment as to whether the ranch would serve his purpose of pasturing and watering his horses; that he told Nunneley and Ferrari he was not interested in the ranch for dairying purposes but that Mr. Bette, a friend of his, was interested in a dairy ranch, and they might all get together on a deal; that Ferrari told him the meadow located on the ranch would take care of twenty to twenty-five head of dairy cows and the pasture would graze fifteen or sixteen head of horses; that Ferrari also stated he got two cuttings of hay a year, which was enough to feed the cows in the winter time; that there was ample water for all the stock Blackwell might wish to place on the ranch; and that Ferrari stated the springs on the ranch "were never known to go dry."

A week or two prior to May 6, 1940, on which date the agreement for the purchase of the ranch property was executed, Messrs. Blackwell, Nunneley, Ferrari, Maier and Mr. Maier's son met in Sacramento for the purpose of discussing the proposed purchase. Mr. Maier was interested in placing dairy cows on the ranch, and he and Blackwell subsequently entered into an agreement for the mutual benefit of one another which required that the ranch be cared for by Maier. In regard to this meeting in Sacramento, Mr. Blackwell testified that Maier thought the ranch was all right and that there was plenty of water and feed; that they (Blackwell and Maier) discussed the manner in which they would start the operation of the ranch, and that he (Blackwell) repeated to Ferrari that he did not know anything about farming or the dairy business and that he was relying on Ferrari's word in regard to the conditions existing on the ranch; that he told Maier he did not want him to quit his job unless he was sure he could make money on the ranch, and that all he wanted was a place for his horses with plenty of grass and water and somebody to take care of them; that Mr. Ferrari assured them there was plenty of water on that ranch for the stock.

Mr. Blackwell took possession of the property soon after May 6, 1940, and Mr. Maier and his son promptly moved to the ranch to take over its care. Blackwell testified as to subsequent events and conditions: That the barn and the house on the ranch were in poor condition; that the barn required a new roof; that the pasture required fencing; that it was necessary to install watering troughs for both the pasture and the meadow; that the spring had been cleaned out, ditched and rocked but that the water failed to come down in sufficient quantity to fill the trough.

George Maier, who was called on behalf of plaintiffs, testified, in substance, that Ferrari told him there was pleanty of water on the property and sufficient feed on the ranch for the stock; that he could mow the meadow twice a year; that it would support fifteen or sixteen head of cattle; that the pasture would support ten to fifteen head of horses. Maier testified that the second crop of hay did not grow high enough to cut.

Marvin Maier, the son of George Maier, testified to the same effect as his father, stating that when they moved onto the property in the summer time the springs went dry.

Mr. Nunneley, testifying for plaintiffs, stated that the conversation regarding the spring was for the most part general. However, it was to the effect that there was plenty of water on the property; that Ferrari told Blackwell that, so far as he knew, the spring had never gone dry; and that when he had operated the dairy in the past he had from twelve to sixteen cows pastured in the meadow.

The defendant, Emil A. Ferrari, testified that he was born on the ranch; that he had not represented to Blackwell that the pasture would support fifteen to twenty horses; that he did not state to him that the meadow would support twenty to twenty-five dairy cows; that he did state to Blackwell and Nunneley, in regard to the spring on the ranch, that he had received sufficient water therefrom to supply the cattle and for irrigation of a small garden; that the spring had never gone dry while he was on the ranch, and that he had never represented to Blackwell that there was more than one spring on the property.

Ferrari testified that his only representations to Mr. Blackwell in regard to the productivity or conditions of the ranch related to the time when he operated the ranch and that the representations made were so limited; that, in regard to the number of cows which could be supported on the property, he told Blackwell he was grazing twelve to sixteen head of cows when he left the ranch, and that no mention was made of the number of horses which the ranch would support.

A number of witnesses residing in the vicinity of the Ferrari property testified in behalf of the defendants, to the effect that the Ferrari ranch had always been considered good property for the production of garden truck and to support stock. These witnesses, with the exception of two, testified to the productivity of the ranch during the time it was operated by Ferrari some ten or twelve years previous to the time of the commencement of suit. Joseph Ahart and Claude West, however, testified to conditions existing on the ranch at the time of the trial. Claude West, whose testimony substantially corroborated the evidence given by Joseph Ahart, was living upon the property and operated the ranch at the time of the trial. He stated that he had twenty head of cattle on the ranch, fourteen of which were milk cows. He said he had been on the property three months, and that he was milking ten or eleven cows, and that he had three head of horses on the place; that he was getting plenty of water from the two wells by means of the pumping plants. He asserted that he had cut one crop of hay and could have cut a second, but that he turned the stock in there to graze.

In support of their right to rescission, the appellants rely most strongly on the following three alleged misrepresentations: That the land would pasture fifteen to twenty horses; that the land would support from twenty to twenty-five dairy cows; that the spring on the property would supply enough water all the year round for the stock or for necessary irrigation. The complaint alleges that as a result of such misrepresentations appellants were damaged by the loss of three cows valued at $109 each which died because of a lack of hay and from eating poisoned weeds growing on the premises; by depreciation in value of fourteen cows as a result of a lack of nourishment in the hay; by failure of cows to produce milk on account of said lack of nourishment; by the death of newborn calves resulting from a lack of nourishment; and for expenditures made by appellants in repairing the buildings and constructing necessary water troughs.

The findings of the trial court specifically conclude that defendants did not represent that the pasture on the land would support fifteen to twenty head of horses or that the pasture would support from twenty to twenty-five dairy cows; that defendants did not represent that the spring on the property would produce enough water the year round to supply the stock or to irrigate the land.

[1] Conceding that the authorities cited by appellants support the conclusion that "actionable fraud" would have been disclosed by proof of the truth of the allegations of the complaint, it is nevertheless the opinion of this court that appellants have failed to prove by a preponderance of the evidence that the respondents made any of the material misrepresentations alleged in the complaint. The record discloses a decided conflict in the evidence in that regard. As stated by appellants, the issue before the trial court was one of fact, and if there is present in the record substantial evidence in support of the findings of the trial court, it is beyond the province of this court to disturb the judgment on appeal.

[2] The fact that the opinion of the trial court indicates a doubt as to whether the complaint made out a proper case of fraud regardless of the denials of the allegations contained therein is of no moment in the determination of the issues which are presented on this appeal. The opinion of the trial court is not a part of the record on appeal, and it may therefore not be considered for any purpose whatever, even if it is incorporated in a bill of exceptions. Cavagnaro v. Delmas, 29 Cal. App.2d 352, 84 P.2d 274; Goldner v. Spencer, 163 Cal. 317, 125 P. 347; DeCou v. Howell, 190 Cal. 741, 214 P. 444; 2 Cal. Jur. 488, § 235, and p. 688, § 394.

The testimony of defendant Emil Ferrari, which has been sufficiently set forth, is in direct conflict with the testimony of plaintiff Blackwell so far as it relates to the material issues contained in the complaint. Ferrari specifically denied that he had represented to Mr. Blackwell that the pasture on the ranch would support fifteen to twenty horses, or that the meadow would supply twenty to twenty-five dairy cows. The testimony of Ferrari in regard to the spring is also in direct conflict with the allegation that Ferrari represented that the spring would supply sufficient water all the year round for the stock or for irrigation. Ferrari's testimony in this regard was that Blackwell was told there was sufficient water in the spring for the cattle and for a small garden.

The testimony of plaintiffs' witness, George Maier, fails to support the allegations of the complaint. He testified in regard to the water in the springs, as follows:

"A. I asked Mr. Ferrari then, I says, 'Mr. Ferrari, do not the springs go dry?' and he says, 'No', and so I let it go on by until I lived on the place. * * *.

"Q. He just said, 'There is plenty of water'? A. I just asked him if the spring went dry; he said, no, there is plenty of water there."

The foregoing testimony does not support appellants' claim that Ferrari represented that the spring would supply water for the stock or for irrigation all year round. In regard to the alleged misrepresentations on the part of Ferrari in connection with the number of horses and dairy cows which could be pastured and supported upon the land, the following testimony of George Maier appears:

"Q. What did he say about the meadow, supporting how many cattle? A. He did say it would support fifteen or sixteen head of cattle. * * *.

"Q. Did he say anything about pasture? * * * A. That there was good pasture and water over there.

"Q. How many horses would it support? A. Support from ten to fifteen head of horses for awhile over there in the summer."

As disclosed, Maier's testimony fails to support the allegations of the complaint. He testified that Ferrari represented that the meadow would support fifteen or sixteen head of cattle and not twenty to twenty-five head as alleged in the complaint. He testified that Ferrari also represented that the land would pasture ten to fifteen head of horses, and not fifteen to twenty head as alleged in the complaint.

It will be observed that Maier does not testify that Ferrari said the land would pasture ten or fifteen horses the year round, but merely that it would support that number of horses "for awhile * * * in the summer."

It might be contended that the discrepancies set forth in the foregoing testimony are unimportant in determining the question as to whether the respondents by their action are not guilty of "actionable fraud", but as heretofore stated, the question before the trial court, in the final analysis, became one of fact, and in considering such discrepancies together with the testimony of defendant Ferrari, which was an absolute refutation of the alleged representations, we find that a definite conflict in the evidence bearing upon the material allegations of the complaint does exist. Ferrari's testimony relative to the spring on the ranch was to the effect that the spring had never gone dry during the time he occupied the property. Those representations in regard to the spring are supported, at least in part, by plaintiff Blackwell's own testimony. He testified: "He said that it never did go dry. It never would go dry." Such representations certainly are inconsistent with the claim of appellants that Ferrari represented that the spring would supply enough water all year round for the stock or irrigation. Although it does appear that during the summer, and after Blackwell had taken possession of the ranch, the spring had apparently gone dry, there is no evidence in the record that this spring had ever gone dry during the time that Ferrari occupied the property. Ferrari testified that the spring required regular "cleaning out" and possibly this work was not properly done after the appellants took possession of the property.

[3] We are of the opinion the findings and judgment are adequately supported by the evidence.

[4] It is an established rule of law that the findings of the trial court will not be disturbed on appeal where the evidence as to the issues framed by the pleadings is in sharp conflict. Segaloff v. Furman, 209 Cal. 301, 287 P. 92.

In regard to the evidence given by the various witnesses who testified in behalf of defendants, it may be said that, while such testimony was not direct evidence bearing upon the issue as to whether defendant Ferrari made the alleged misrepresentations, it was material to enable the trial court to determine the good faith of Ferrari at the time of the property transaction. There is no reason to disbelieve the testimony of Claude West, who was operating the ranch at the time of the trial. According to his testimony, the ranch was being supplied with plenty of water through the use of two pumping plants. The stock was in good condition, and the ranch in general was in conformity with the conditions represented by defendant Ferrari.

RISKIN v. TOWERS.

Civ. 13765.

District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 3, California.

July 30, 1943.

Hearing Granted Sept. 27, 1943.

Judgment 🔑138(3)

Where judge in one department following a full hearing and upon conflicting evidence denied defendant's motion to quash personal service of summons on ground that no service had been made, and defendant's showing on second motion before judge in another department to vacate default on ground that he did not know he had been served until court so ruled in first motion was no stronger than that on first, denial of second motion was proper. Code Civ.Proc. § 473.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Emmet H. Wilson and Frank G. Swain, Judges.

Action by David Riskin against Walter Towers, wherein a default judgment was taken against defendant. From the judgment and from an order denying motion to vacate and set aside default, defendant appeals.

Affirmed.

Glenn A. Lane, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Sydney M. Williams, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

SHINN, Acting Presiding Justice.

After the judge of one department, following a full hearing, and upon conflicting evidence, had denied defendant's motion to quash personal service of summons upon the alleged ground that no service had been made, the judge of another department denied defendant's motion under section 473 of the Code of Civil Procedure to vacate his default upon the ground that he did not know he had been served until the court so ruled on the first motion. Defendant appeals from the second order and from a default judgment against him for damages.

Defendant's showing on the second motion was no stronger than that on the first, and there was manifestly no abuse of discretion in the court's refusal to go contrary to the first ruling or to hold that, although defendant had been served, he did not know it.

The order and judgment are affirmed.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; John Beardsley, Judge.

Action by William J. Friedman and another against Thomas M. Bergin and others for breach of contract. Judgment for plaintiffs, and defendants appeal.

Reversed.

For prior opinion, see 131 P.2d 13.

Mott & Grant, Kenneth E. Grant, and Harry C. Cogen, all of Los Angeles, for appellants.

Desser & Rau, of Los Angeles, for respondents.

TRAYNOR, Justice.

In a contract executed April 4, 1937, the Del Mar Turf Club granted defendant Thomas Bergin the right to dispense all food, liquors, soft drinks, cigars, cigarettes, and other commodities, and to operate a cafe for employees, at a race track at the San Diego County Fair Grounds, at Del Mar, California. On April 24, 1937, Bergin signed an instrument reading as follows: "Received of William J. Friedman and Alex Charles Goodman, the sum of two thousand dollars ($2,000) in consideration for the following concessions at the Del Mar Turf Club: Cigarettes, cigars, candy, checking, including all lavortories (sic.); for the term of five years commencing with the 1937 season and ending with the season for the year 1941. This agreement is to be followed by a formal contract on the same basis as that between the Del Mar Turf Club and the undersigned concessionaire." A formal contract was twice tendered plaintiffs Goodman and Friedman, but according to their testimony they rejected it because it contained no clauses covering their understanding that they were to receive an option to renew for five years, and that Bergin would return the $2,000 to plaintiffs if racing were discontinued during the term of the contract. Although no formal contract was executed, plaintiffs operated the concession at the track for three years, making a profit of $4,198.61. The greater part of plaintiffs' sales were made in stands built by Bergin in the grandstand, and operated by Bergin's employees. Plaintiffs' sole function in connection with these stands was to provide the goods that were sold there. Bergin accounted to plaintiffs each night for the sales of such goods, and paid the proceeds to plaintiffs, less 16⅔% of the candy sales, which he retained, and 3% of plaintiffs' total sales to cover the sales tax. Plaintiffs' sales in other parts of the track were made by girls who circulated through the crowd. Plaintiffs relied on Bergin to make all necessary arrangements for retail licenses, social security and unemployment insurance payments, industrial accident insurance, and sales tax.

During part of this period, Bergin acted through the Del Mar Caterers, to whom he had assigned his general concession from the Del Mar Turf Club. On April 24, 1940, the Del Mar Caterers assigned this concession to defendants Anderson and Van Steen, informing plaintiffs accordingly. Anderson and Van Steen were unwilling to continue the previous arrangement but offered to use their own employees and stands for the sale of plaintiffs' goods in return for 50% of plaintiffs' net profits. Plaintiffs acquiesced, and, through agents, commenced operating the concession. Anderson and Van Steen, however, not only refused to give nightly accountings but insisted that plaintiffs be responsible for their own licenses, social security and unemployment insurance payments, industrial accident insurance, and sales tax. After two or three days plaintiffs discontinued operations. Judgment was given in their favor in an action for breach of contract and defendants appeal. The defendant Anderson died during the pendency of the action and his executrix, Beulah Anderson, was substituted as defendant. After proceedings for new trial, the judgment was modified in certain particulars not here material. Subsequently, by stipulation of the parties, an order nunc pro tunc as of the date of entry of judgment was made striking from the judgment the name of defendant Del Mar Caterers, who by clerical error had been included therein.

[1] The contract that plaintiffs seek to enforce was to be performed over a period of five years and is within the statute of frauds. Civ.Code, § 1624(1). Therefore, only if the instrument executed on April 27th contains the material terms of the contract may plaintiffs recover. Fritz v. Mills, 170 Cal. 449, 150 P. 375; Zellner v. Wassman, 184 Cal. 80, 193 P. 84; see 12 Cal.Jur. 901; Restatement, Contracts, § 207; 2 Williston on Contracts, 1936, p. 1618.

[2] The trial court found that the only agreement between plaintiffs and Bergin was that of April 24, 1937. That finding necessarily implies that the terms of the actual arrangement under which the concession was operated were agreed upon at that time and were intended to be a part of the contract then made. Although plaintiffs and Bergin may have agreed to these terms when they signed the memorandum, they did not include them therein. The memorandum does not state that plaintiffs were to have the right to sell their wares through Bergin's stands and Bergin's employees, that plaintiffs were to receive nightly accountings, or that Bergin was to pay plaintiffs' licenses, social security and unemployment insurance payments, industrial accident insurance and sales tax. There is no mention in its two sentences of Bergin's right to retain 16⅔% of plaintiffs' receipts from candy sales. The actual operation of the concession involved the practical construction, not of the terms of the memorandum, but of material terms not expressed within it. See Niles v. Hancock, 140 Cal. 157, 73 P. 840; Edgar Bros. Co. v. Schmeiser Mfg. Co., 33 Cal.App. 667, 166 P. 366; Wineburgh v. Gay, 27 Cal.App. 603, 150 P. 1003; Dillingham v. Dahlgren, 52 Cal.App. 322, 198 P. 832; Enlow v. Irwin, 80 Cal.App. 98, 251 P. 658; Santoro v. Mack, 108 Conn. 683, 145 A. 273; 2 Williston on Contracts, 1936, p. 1645.

No contention is made that the reference to the contract between Bergin and the Del Mar Turf Club was intended to amplify the memorandum through the incorporation of that contract. The contract contained a clause requiring Bergin to erect his own facilities. A like clause in a contract between Bergin and plaintiffs would have required plaintiffs to erect the facilities; yet the only breach found by the trial court was that plaintiffs were denied the use of stands erected by Bergin. The Del Mar Turf Club had the right to terminate Bergin's contract if a named officer of the club regarded his services as unsatisfactory. Bergin was required to post $5000 as bond for performance, to pay his own sales tax and to comply with all laws, presumably including Workmen's Compensation and Social Security Laws. Plaintiffs, however, relied upon Bergin to pay such costs as taxes, licenses, and workmen's compensation and social security insurance. They were never asked to post bond, and there is no indication that any belief that their services were unsatisfactory would be sufficient grounds to permit Bergin to terminate the contract. The reference to the Del Mar contract suggests only that it was to be a model in form for the formal contract to be executed, and affords no clue as to how far the parties proposed to copy the Del Mar contract.

[3, 4] Plaintiffs explain the absence from the memorandum of the terms of the arrangement under which they operated on the ground that those terms were the result of a parol modification of the contract. They testified that in July, at the opening of the 1937 racing season, Bergin told them that they could not erect their own stands, but must work through his. Plaintiffs testified that Bergin also told them that he would be responsible for such costs as taxes, licenses, and workmen's compensation and social security insurance. They therefore contend that the memorandum was a complete statement of the contract before its modification. Since the only breach found, however, was the denial of plaintiffs' right to use the stands erected by Bergin, plaintiffs must rely upon the modifications in order to recover. These modifications were not made in writing, and a parol promise, performable over a five-year period, is within the statute of frauds whether or not it is a modification of another contract. See Twohey v. Realty Syndicate Co., 4 Cal.2d 379, 49 P.2d 819; notes 118 A.L.R. 1511; 29 A.L.R. 1095; 17 A.L.R. 10; 9 Wigmore on Evidence, (1940) p. 177.

[5, 6] Plaintiffs also contend that a concession contract is like a lease, and rely on Beckett v. City of Paris Dry Goods Co., 14 Cal.2d 633, 96 P.2d 122, for the proposition that an insufficient description of the premises leased may be aided by parol evidence. Like other contracts, however, a leasehold contract must comply with the statute of frauds. Wineburgh v. Gay, supra; Enlow v. Irwin, supra; Rohan v. Proctor, 61 Cal. App. 447, 214 P. 986. The opinion in the Beckett case does not discuss the statute of frauds and shows that the court had before it a detailed written lease, involving no omissions comparable to those made in the writing on which plaintiff relies.

The judgment and the order modifying judgment after proceedings on motion for new trial are reversed.

HALLETT v. SLAUGHTER et al.

L. A. 18369.

Supreme Court of California.

July 23, 1943.

Rehearing Denied Aug. 19, 1943.

1. Judgment ⇨461(3)

Where there was testimony by judgment debtor's attorney showing that answer and copy thereof to complaint in original action were handed to secretary with instructions for mailing, evidence supported finding that answer and copy thereof were mailed so as to permit setting aside of default judgment.

2. Appeal and error ⇨158(2)

The enforced satisfaction of a judgment does not deprive the judgment debtor of the right to appeal or seek to have the judgment vacated or set aside.

3. Judgment ⇨147

Where judgment creditor obtained default judgment, stipulations as to payments out of salary held under levy of execution and claim of exemption did not constitute "ratification" of judgment so as to "estop" judgment debtor from seeking vacation of judgment, where stipulations were made for sole purpose of securing a prompt release to debtor of a portion of money. Code Civ.Proc. § 690.11.

See Words and Phrases, Permanent Edition, for all other definitions of "Estop" and "Ratification".

4. Judgment 🔑437

Remissness of judgment debtor's attorney in failing to discover that answer was not filed did not amount to such "inexcusable neglect" as a matter of law as to foreclose right to maintain suit to set aside default judgment, especially where judgment debtor's delay in discovering entry of default was due in part to failure of judgment creditors to take earlier action to enforce their judgment. Code Civ.Proc. § 473.

See Words and Phrases, Permanent Edition, for all other definitions of "Inexcusable Neglect".

5. Judgment 🔑435

Where default judgment was entered against judgment debtor because of debtor's belief that answer to complaint in original action had been filed, there was such "extrinsic accident" and "mistake of fact" as to furnish a ground for setting aside judgment in equity.

See Words and Phrases, Permanent Edition, for all other definitions of "Extrinsic Accident" and "Mistake of Fact".

6. Judgment 🔑456(1)

Where default judgment was entered as result of judgment debtor's mistaken belief that answer was on file, suit to set aside judgment was commenced a few weeks after discovery of mistake, and diligently prosecuted, and judgment creditors did not suffer injury, judgment debtor was not barred from relief by "laches".

See Words and Phrases, Permanent Edition, for all other definitions of "Laches".

7. Judgment 🔑145(4)

Where default judgment was entered through judgment debtor's mistake in action for medical services, proof established that judgment debtor had a meritorious defense supporting setting aside of default judgment.

8. Judgment 🔑145(4)

To show a meritorious defense supporting setting aside of default judgment, proof produced by judgment debtor in support of allegations need only show with reasonable certainty that a more favorable judgment would follow from a hearing on the merits.

Suit in equity by Gladys Meyer Hallett against J. A. Slaughter and others to set aside and vacate a default judgment. From a decree for plaintiff, defendants appeal.

David I. Lippert, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

SCHAUER, Justice.

Defendants appeal from a decree in equity setting aside and vacating a judgment by default secured against plaintiff in an action filed on April 17, 1940, in the Municipal Court of Los Angeles, and based on an assigned claim for medical services allegedly furnished by Dr. Walter B. Schwuchow (since deceased) to plaintiff and her son. In that action defendants herein, Slaughter and Trigg, as operators of a collection agency named The Doctors Business Bureau, were plaintiffs and plaintiff herein was a defendant. In the instant suit plaintiff herein was also awarded a money judgment against defendants for certain sums which defendants had collected from her by means of levies upon her salary, under the municipal court judgment; enforcement of the municipal court judgment was enjoined; and the municipal court was ordered to permit plaintiff to file her answer in that court within ten days after judgment in the present suit becomes final. Defendant Jennie I. Schwuchow was joined as the widow of Dr. Schwuchow and executrix of his estate. We have concluded that the judgment of the trial court should be affirmed.

It appears from the evidence and was found by the court that on May 23, 1940, plaintiff was served with a copy of the summons and complaint in the municipal court action; that she forthwith employed an attorney to represent her in such action, and her answer to the complaint therein, prepared by her attorney and verified by her, and accompanied by the requisite filing fee, was on May 24, 1940, deposited in the United States mail at Los Angeles, California, enclosed in an envelope with sufficient postage affixed, and directed to the clerk of the Municipal Court of Los Angeles; that on the same day a copy of the answer was mailed to the attorney for plaintiffs in the municipal court action (defendants herein); that neither the original nor the copy of the answer was received by the respective addressees or returned to this plaintiff's attorney, but both were lost; that plaintiff and her attorney believed the answer was on file. On June 4, 1940, the default of plaintiff herein was entered in the municipal court action, and on December 27, 1940, judgment by default was taken against her.

Early in January, 1941, execution was levied upon plaintiff's salary. This was the first knowledge received by either plaintiff or her attorney that her answer had not reached the clerk of the court and had not been filed, that her default had been entered, and that judgment had been taken against her. Plaintiff sought release of her salary by filing a claim of exemption under the provisions of section 690.11 of the Code of Civil Procedure, but before the claim was heard by the court plaintiff stipulated with the judgment creditors that they take half of the money under levy and that she receive the other half. Early in February, 1941, defendants levied upon plaintiff's salary a second time, and plaintiff stipulated that they take $50 of the amount held. On February 24, 1941, plaintiff filed this suit. A third salary levy was made in March, 1941; plaintiff again filed a claim of exemption; and after a hearing the court ordered that plaintiff was entitled to half the money and that defendants take the other half.

The trial court further found that plaintiff has a meritorious defense to the municipal court action but that, by the accidental loss of her answer and the mistaken belief on her part and on the part of her attorney that the answer was on file, she was prevented from setting up such defense; that the loss of the answer and the mistaken belief that it was on file were "not due to any fault or neglect" of plaintiff or of her attorney; that they had the right to rely on the United States Post Office to transmit the answer as directed; that plaintiff was diligent in bringing the present suit and was not guilty of laches; and that plaintiffs in the municipal court action (defendants herein) willfully and with the intent to lull this plaintiff into a false sense of security, refrained from proceeding in that action until plaintiff's rights under section 473 of the Code of Civil Procedure were barred by lapse of time, although "they knew that plaintiff's * * * salary payments were vulnerable to such proceedings."

Defendants' contentions are four:

1. That the evidence fails to support the finding that plaintiff's answer and the copy thereof were mailed (as set forth above).

2. That by her stipulation made for the purpose of securing the release of her salary held under levy of execution, and by her affidavit of exemption made following the March salary levy and after the present suit was filed, plaintiff ratified and confirmed the municipal court judgment and is now estopped to attack it.

3. That plaintiff is guilty of neglect, of laches, and of want of diligence, and therefore is not entitled to equitable relief.

4. That plaintiff failed to show that she has a meritorious defense and that a new trial would result in a judgment more favorable to her.

[1] As to defendants' first contention, the attorney employed by this plaintiff to defend her in the municipal court action testified that on May 24, 1940, he handed plaintiff's answer and a copy thereof, together with the filing fee, to his secretary, and instructed her to mail the original answer and the filing fee to the clerk of the municipal court and to mail the copy to opposing counsel. The secretary testified that she did not recall the matter, but that if the papers had been given her to mail, then she had mailed them, and that she knew "there was sufficient postage because we had a scale. I couldn't go wrong in that." This testimony supports the finding that the papers were mailed.

[2-3] Defendants' second contention is answered by the rule, well settled in California, that the enforced satisfaction of a judgment does not deprive the judgment debtor of the right to appeal or to seek to have the judgment vacated or set aside. See 14 Cal.Jur. 1018, sec. 84, and cases there cited: Engelken v. Justice Court, 1920, 50 Cal.App. 157, 159, 195 P. 265; and Hartke v. Abbott, 1930, 106 Cal.App. 388, 391-393, 289 P. 206. Plaintiff's stipulations went no further than to specify the amount which was to be paid each of the respective parties to the judgment from the money held under levy, and contain no suggestion of a compromise agreement, of an affirmance of the judgment, or of a waiver of the right to attack it. They were made for the sole purpose of securing a prompt release to plaintiff of a portion of the money, and cannot now be held to defeat her right to maintain this suit. The same is true of plaintiff's affidavit claiming exemption of her salary held under the levy made in March; the claim of exemption and the subsequent court hearing thereon were involuntary steps forced upon plaintiff in the same manner as were the stipulations.

[4] Defendants' third point—that because of neglect, laches, and want of diligence plaintiff may not seek relief from equity—is met by the findings of the trial court to the contrary on each of these issues. Although some degree of negligence may be charged to the attorney employed by this plaintiff to defend her in the municipal court action in not sooner discovering that plaintiff's answer had not been filed, we are not prepared to say that his remissness in this regard amounts to such inexcusable neglect as a matter of law that plaintiff should be foreclosed of her right to maintain this suit. Moreover, plaintiff's delay in discovering the entry of her default was due in part at least to the apparently designed and deliberate failure of defendants to take earlier action to secure and enforce their judgment. We are in accord with the following views set forth in Soule v. Bacon, 1907, 150 Cal. 495, 497, 498, 89 P. 324, 325: "There are many cases holding that the party may have relief in equity from the consequences of his mistake of fact, although he was somewhat negligent in making the mistake, if his negligence in no way prejudiced the opposing party. [Citations.] * * * At most, it was a question of fact for the court below to determine whether or not the lack of vigilance on the part of the plaintiff was such as would not have occurred with a man of ordinary care and prudence, under the same circumstances. That court has decided the question in favor of the plaintiff, and we are satisfied with its conclusion."

[5] Plaintiff was prevented by extrinsic accident and mistake of fact from presenting her defense in the municipal court action. That such accident and mistake furnish a ground for equitable intervention under the circumstances of this case is clear. See Bidleman v. Kewen, 1852, 2 Cal. 248, 250; Bibend v. Kreutz, 1862, 20 Cal. 109, 110, 114; Brackett v. Banegas, 1897, 116 Cal. 278, 284, 48 P. 90, 58 Am. St.Rep. 164; Bacon v. Bacon, 1907, 150 Cal. 477, 481, 486, 491, 89 P. 317; Wattson v. Dillon, 1936, 6 Cal.2d 33, 40, 56 P. 2d 220; Olivera v. Grace, 1942, 19 Cal.2d 570, 578, 122 P.2d 564, 140 A.L.R. 1328; Boyle v. Boyle, 1929, 97 Cal.App. 703, 706, 276 P. 118; Jeffords v. Young, 1929, 98 Cal.App. 400, 404, 277 P. 163; Winn v. Torr, 1938, 27 Cal.App.2d 623, 627, 81 P.2d 457; Wilson v. Wilson, 1942, 55 Cal.App.2d 421, 426, 130 P.2d 782.

[6] This suit was commenced within a few weeks after plaintiff learned of the mistake and has been diligently prosecuted by her. In addition, defendants have not shown that they have suffered injury as a result of the delay before plaintiff knew of the mistake (a delay which, as mentioned above, was caused in part by defendants' own conduct), and therefore one element of laches is missing. See 10 Cal.Jur. 530, sec. 68, and cases there cited.

[7, 8] The fourth contention of defendants—that plaintiff failed to show a meritorious defense—is also without foundation. Among the facts alleged by plaintiff by way of defense to the municipal court action are: that a major portion of the account there sued upon was for services to her son, Eugene, at a time when he was a minor, rather than to herself, and that for such services her obligation to the doctor, if any, was as guardian of the estate of her son, rather than individually; that the charges for such services had been barred by the statute of limitations; that the doctor had released and discharged her from all liability prior to commencement of the municipal court action; that her obligation to the doctor, if any, had been discharged in bankruptcy; and that neither she nor her son had been acquainted with the doctor or under his care during certain months covered by the account. Proof of even a portion of these allegations would result in a judgment in the municipal court action which would be more favorable to this plaintiff than that which was entered by default. As stated in Olivera v. Grace, 1942, supra, 19 Cal.2d 570, 579, 122 P.2d 564, 569, 140 A.L.R. 1328, "The requirement that the complaint allege a meritorious case does not require an absolute guarantee of victory." The same observation may be made concerning the proof produced by plaintiff in support of her allegations; she need only show with reasonable certainty that she would emerge in a more favorable position. See 15 Cal.Jur. 29, sec. 128, and cases there cited. The trial court heard the testimony of plaintiff and concluded that she has a meritorious defense to the municipal court action and that "if the judgment therein is set aside it appears that a like judgment would not follow; that on the contrary it is reasonably certain that a judgment more favorable to this plaintiff would result." Such a showing is all that is required of plaintiff in order to secure equitable intervention and an opportunity for a full hearing on the merits. To require in this suit complete proof in establishment of her defenses would render idle the act of conducting a trial on the merits in the municipal court action.

I dissent.

The present action is an independent suit in equity commenced after the expiration of the time for relief under section 473 of the Code of Civil Procedure. Title Ins. & Trust Co. v. King, etc., Co., 162 Cal. 44, 120 P. 1066; Hunt, Mirk & Co., Inc., v. Hesperides Mining Co., 200 Cal. 382, 253 P. 317; Knox v. Superior Court, 100 Cal.App. 452, 454, 280 P. 375. The remedy afforded by section 473 is akin to the common law power of courts to vacate their own judgments during the term they were rendered. Olivera v. Grace, 19 Cal.2d 570, 574, 122 P. 2d 564, 140 A.L.R. 1328. For the most part the cases cited by plaintiff granting relief for the loss or delay of a pleading in the mails arose under statutes different from those existing in this state and involved requests for such relief made in the same action shortly after the entry of the default. Chicago, etc., Co. v. Eastham, 26 Okl. 605, 110 P. 887, 30 L.R.A.,N.S., 740; Boyd v. Williams, 70 N.J.L. 185, 56 A. 135; Norman v. Iowa Central R. Co., 149 Iowa 246, 128 N. W. 349; Corning v. Tripp, 1 How.Prac., N. Y., 14; Loeb v. Schmith, 1 Mont. 87; Williams v. Richmond, etc., Co., 110 N.C. 466, 15 S.E. 97. It is not enough now for plaintiff to show that the judgment was taken against her through a "mistake, inadvertence, surprise or excusable neglect" that would have entitled her to relief under the provisions of section 473 had she made timely application therefor. Olivera v. Grace, supra. She must prove that because of extrinsic fraud or mistake she had no reasonable opportunity to present her defense (Olivera v. Grace, supra; Westphal v. Westphal, 20 Cal.2d 393, 397, 126 P.2d 105; Neblett v. Pacific Mutual L. Ins. Co., 22 Cal. 393, 139 P.2d 934; Larrabee v. Tracy, 21 Cal.2d 645, 649, 134 P.2d 265; Bacon v. Bacon, 150 Cal. 477, 89 P. 317; see Restatement, Judgments, secs. 118-126), and that she has not been negligent in failing to discover the fraud or mistake. Wattson v. Dillon, 6 Cal.2d 33, 56 P.2d 220; Wilson v. Wilson, 55 Cal.App.2d 421, 427, 130 P.2d 782, and cases there cited.

The plaintiff has not shown that defendants are guilty of fraud. The trial court's finding that defendants, with intent to lull plaintiff into a false sense of security, wilfully refrained from undertaking any proceedings in the action until more than six months after the entry of default, is not a finding of fraud, for defendants owed plaintiff no duty to notify her of the entry or to inform her of her legal rights. Code of Civ.Proc., secs. 585, 1010, 1014; Bley v. Dessin, 31 Cal.App.2d 338, 343, 87 P.2d 889; Trustees of Amherst College v. Allen, 165 Mass. 178, 42 N.E. 570. Defendants did nothing to deceive plaintiff, nor were they in any way responsible for the loss of plaintiff's answer or for her belief that it had been filed. See Wattson v. Dillon, 6 Cal.2d 33, 42, 43, 56 P.2d 220. They had a clear legal right to delay the entry and enforcement of the judgment and their motive in doing so is immaterial. Plaintiff herself rejects fraud as the basis of her action by characterizing the action in her brief on appeal as one "to set aside a default judgment obtained * * * as a result of mistake and accident."

The mistake in the present case was the erroneous belief of plaintiff and her attorney in the earlier action that her answer was on file, prompted by the failure of the attorney to file an answer with the clerk of the court. Code of Civ.Proc. sec. 465. One who is remiss in presenting his case to the court, however, is not entitled to the extraordinary remedy of setting aside a final judgment. Wattson v. Dillon, supra; Wilson v. Wilson, supra; Borland v. Thornton, 12 Cal. 440; Quinn v. Wetherbee, 41 Cal. 247; Restatement, Judgments, secs, 1, 126. Admittedly the answer was never delivered to the clerk, but plaintiff contends that it was mailed and that she was not responsible for its accidental loss. Mailing, however, is not equivalent to filing. McDonald v.

Lee, 132 Cal. 252, 64 P. 250; Estes v. Chimes, 40 Cal.App.2d 41, 104 P.2d 74; see United States v. Lombardo, 241 U.S. 73, 36 S.Ct. 508, 60 L.Ed. 897; Poynor v. Commissioner of Internal Revenue, 5 Cir., 81 F.2d 521, 522. "Filing a paper consists in presenting it at the proper office, and leaving it there, deposited with the papers in such office. * * * A paper in a case is said to be filed when it is delivered to the clerk and received by him, to be kept with the papers in the cause." Tregambo v. Comanche M. & M. Co., 57 Cal. 501, 506; see Cox v. Tyrone Power Enterprises, 49 Cal.App.2d 383, 395, 121 P.2d 829. It is the duty of a litigant to see that his pleading is in fact deposited in the clerk's office within the time contemplated by law. Tregambo v. Comanche M. & M. Co., supra; Boyd v. Desmond, 79 Cal. 250, 253, 21 P. 755; Hoyt v. Stark, 134 Cal. 178, 180, 181, 66 P. 223, 86 Am.St.Rep. 246; Fletcher v. Maginnis, 136 Cal. 362, 363, 68 P. 1015; W. J. White Co. v. Winton, 41 Cal.App. 693, 695, 183 P. 277. When he engages an attorney, the latter becomes his agent in prosecuting the suit and must on his behalf perform the duties that the law imposes upon a litigant, and the attorney's failure to do so is chargeable to his client. Wilson v. Wilson, supra; United States v. Duesdieker, 118 Cal.App. 723, 5 P.2d 916; Jeffords v. Young, 98 Cal.App. 400, 277 P. 163; see 14 Cal.Jur. 1042-1043; 34 C.J. 307-309; 1 Freeman on Judgments (5th Ed.), p. 495. Thus if an attorney fails to file an answer (Borland v. Thornton, supra), or fails to find and correct an error in the record on appeal (Quinn v. Wetherbee, supra), equity will deny the client's application to set aside the judgment. Cases such as Brackett v. Banegas, 116 Cal. 278, 48 P. 90, 58 Am.St.Rep. 164, and Winn v. Torr, 27 Cal.App.2d 623, 81 P.2d 457, were not suits in equity to set aside a final judgment but actions to foreclose a mortgage, and rest upon the principle that since a mortgagee is entitled to an effectual foreclosure he is not precluded from bringing a new action to foreclose his lien by an earlier suit that failed of that purpose.

Cases in which the court or its attachés (Sullivan v. Lumsden, 118 Cal. 664, 668, 669, 50 P. 777; Herd v. Tuohy, 133 Cal. 55, 62, 63, 65 P. 139), or the other party (Olivera v. Grace, supra; Boyle v. Boyle, 97 Cal.App. 703, 276 P. 118; Bacon v. Bacon, 150 Cal. 477, 89 P. 317; Soule v. Bacon, 150 Cal. 495, 89 P. 324; Bidleman v. Kewen, 2 Cal. 248; Bibend v. Kreutz, 20 Cal. 109; Antonsen v. Pacific Container Co., 48 Cal.App.2d 535, 538, 539, 120 P.2d 148) is responsible for the mistake are of no avail to plaintiff, for the mistake was solely that of plaintiff and her counsel. Equity will in certain cases relieve a complainant from an adverse judgment resulting from his own mistakes (see Jeffords v. Young, supra), but it will not relieve him if he fails to present his case with the diligence required of a litigant. Wilson v. Wilson, supra; Borland v. Thornton, supra; Wattson v. Dillon, supra; Quinn v. Wetherbee, supra. Defendant assumed the risk that her answer might not reach the clerk of the court when it was sent to him by mail. As time passed there was no acknowledgment of the copy sent to opposing counsel, or any other sign to indicate that either the answer or the copy had been received, but nothing was done to ascertain whether the answer had in fact been delivered to the clerk. After six months had elapsed following the entry of default, plaintiff's attorney had still made no inquiry as to the progress of the case or as to whether the answer had been filed, nor did he examine the records of the case on file in the office of the clerk. The attorney's office was only a few blocks from the courthouse and he could readily have checked the records in the clerk's office. Even a telephone inquiry would have disclosed the true status of the case. Plaintiff must be charged with his failure to ascertain whether the answer had been filed. Wattson v. Dillon, supra; Rudy v. Slotwinsky, 73 Cal.App. 459, 238 P. 783.

In my opinion the trial court erred in setting aside the judgment of the municipal court, and also erred in granting plaintiff judgment for the sums collected by the defendants. The judgment should therefore be reversed.

Cr. 4458.

Supreme Court of California.
July 14, 1943.

As Modified July 29, 1943.

1. Criminal law 🔑680(1)

Refusal of trial court, during murder trial, to admit testimony not pertaining to defendant being tried and directing that such evidence be considered in subsequent proceeding to determine degree of the offense and punishment on pleas of guilty entered by codefendants, was not an abuse of discretion where defendants were accorded full opportunity to produce all the evidence they desired prior to fixing the degree of the crime. Pen.Code, §§ 189, 190.

2. Criminal law 🔑680(1)

The order of proof rests in the discretion of the trial court.

3. Criminal law 🔑980(2)

In proceeding to determine degree of offense and punishment after plea of guilty to murder, trial court's assertion that the evidence further showed the commission of kidnapping not charged in the information and court's action in propounding question to witnesses aimed at the determination of the question whether kidnapping had been committed was not an abuse of discretion. Pen.Code, §§ 189, 190, 209.

4. Criminal law 🔑980(2)

In determining the degree of an offense and the punishment to be imposed after a plea of guilty, it is the duty of the trial court to consider matters in aggravation as well as in mitigation of the offense.

5. Criminal law 🔑980(2)

A hearing for the determination of the degree of an offense and punishment therefor is not a "trial" in the technical sense, and is not governed by the same strict rules of procedure as a trial, but it is simply a statutory hearing by which the court examines witnesses to determine whether any facts exist to aggravate or mitigate the punishment.

See Words and Phrases, Permanent Edition, for all other definitions of "Trial".

In proceeding to determine degree of offense and punishment to be imposed after plea of guilty to murder, that trial court, immediately after witnesses had testified and arguments were heard, read a written document setting forth his views as to guilt of defendant did not indicate that such decision was reached in disregard of defense evidence. Pen.Code, §§ 189, 190.

7. Homicide 🔑18(5), 29

Murder perpetrated in the commission of a robbery, or of an attempt to commit robbery, is "murder of the first degree" and all persons engaged therein whether or not they actually fired the fatal shot are equally answerable for all the natural consequences thereof. Pen.Code, § 189.

See Words and Phrases, Permanent Edition, for all other definitions of "Murder of the First Degree".

8. Homicide 🔑354

Evidence failed to establish that trial court abused its discretion in imposing the death penalty on a plea of guilty to murder committed in the course of a robbery. Pen. Code, §§ 189, 190.

9. Criminal law 🔑980(1)

Evidence failed to establish that trial judge allowed himself to be influenced by asserted newspaper publicity and public interest in another criminal trial in imposing death penalty on defendants' pleas of guilty to murder committed in the course of a robbery. Pen.Code, §§ 189, 190.

10. Criminal law 🔑1147

Where the evidence is not insufficient as a matter of law to support conclusion reached by trial court in determining degree of offense and punishment on defendants' plea of guilty to murder committed in the course of a robbery, Supreme Court could not modify the judgment. In Bank.

Appeals from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; William R. McKay, Judge.

Lyle Cecil Gilbert and John Lovelace were convicted of murder in the first degree, and from judgments imposing death penalty appeals were automatically taken under Penal Code, § 1239.

Affirmed.

Rosalind Goodwin Bates, of Los Angeles, and Nathan O. Freedman and A. Wm. Christlieb, both of Hollywood, for appellants.

Robert W. Kenny, Atty. Gen., and Gilbert F. Nelson, Deputy Atty. Gen., for respondent.

PER CURIAM.

The appealing defendants pleaded guilty to the crime of murder, committed during the commission of the crime of robbery. They do not dispute the facts which legally and admittedly constitute their crime murder in the first degree, but they appeal from judgments of death imposed by the trial court and contend that such court abused its discretion in several particulars hereinafter severally discussed. They seek to have the sentences modified to life imprisonment. The State challenges the power of this court, in view of its prior decisions, to consistently make such modifications. As we have concluded that the record discloses no abuse of discretion by the trial court, it is unnecessary to pass upon such last-mentioned law point.

An information (amended) containing four counts was filed by the District Attorney of Los Angeles County against the appellants and a codefendant, Max Gilbert. Count one charged all of the defendants jointly with the murder of Lee N. Bunch, a police officer. Count two charged them with robbery of H. N. Griffin, and counts three and four charged them with the attempted murder of Benjamin Bailuis and Charles Piercey, respectively. Prior convictions were also alleged against appellants. The codefendant, Max Gilbert, entered a plea of not guilty to all the charges. Each appellant entered a plea of guilty to the charge of murder in count one, and denied the prior convictions. It was thereupon stipulated that the evidence adduced at the preliminary hearing and at the trial of Max Gilbert could be considered by the court for the purpose of fixing the degree of the crime and the sentences to be imposed against appellants on the murder charge. It was further agreed that the prosecution and the defendants "may introduce additional evidence if they so desire." The pronouncing of judgment and sentence on appellants as to the murder charge was set for a future date, and the trial of Max Gilbert on his plea of not guilty proceeded. Ultimately he was adjudged to be guilty of murder of the first degree and was sentenced to life imprisonment. Upon the conclusion of the Max Gilbert trial, the trial court heard additional evidence addressed to the prior convictions charged against appellants and also as to the degree of the murder to which they had entered pleas of guilty. The court ruled that the murder was of the first degree and imposed the death penalty as against both appellants. It thereupon dismissed counts two, three, and four of the information. Appellants gave oral notice of appeal from the judgments imposing the death penalty.

Appellants, at the proceedings in the superior court up to and including the pronouncement of judgment, were both represented by the same counsel. In view of certain criticism by one of the appellants of the conduct of his case it is appropriate to observe that the conduct of the appellants' cases by their counsel, on the face of the record, appears to have been characterized by frank admissions of guilt, by the making of timesaving stipulations, and, withal, by determined (though unavailing) efforts to serve the appellants to the full extent on which the facts seem to admit of debatable conclusions. In such conduct, counsel appears to have displayed a commendable combination of zeal for the cause of appellants and appreciation of duty as an officer of the court. The debated conclusion in the superior court in each case was, shall the penalty be death or life imprisonment? As previously noted, the trial court sentenced each appellant to death and we are asked to modify the sentences to life imprisonment. We have concluded that the judgments must be sustained and that upon the showing made the sentences cannot be modified by us.

The record discloses that early in the morning of March 8, 1942, the codefendant Max Gilbert, who is a younger brother of appellant Lyle Gilbert, transported Orville Horgan (now deceased) and appellants Lyle Gilbert and John Lovelace, in an automobile belonging to Max Gilbert, to the Twin Palms Cafe in the city of Gardena, California. Max Gilbert remained in his automobile. The other three men, each of whom was armed with a deadly weapon, entered the building, in which a card room and restaurant were maintained. Lovelace went into the dining room where customers were seated at the lunch counter, and kept them "covered" while Horgan, who was armed with a sawed-off shotgun, entered the card room where several persons were seated playing cards. He ordered the occupants to put up their hands and line up with their faces to the wall. Lyle Gilbert proceeded to the rear of the building to search for the proprietor. A scuffle there ensued in which appellant Gilbert struck the proprietor on the head three or four times with his gun. With a gun at his back, the proprietor was forced to enter the card room where appellant Gilbert then took $317 from his person. While Horgan held the shotgun pointed at the men lined up, appellant Gilbert, at Horgan's direction, began to search them. The deceased, Lee N. Bunch, a policeman in plain clothes, was among those lined up. While facing the wall Bunch, living up to the highest traditions of the police force, reached for his gun, turned around and fired several times, succeeding, despite the disadvantage of his position, in wounding both Horgan and Lyle Gilbert. Horgan returned the fire and Bunch died almost immediately from shotgun wounds. Two of the other men who were lined up (Bailuis and Piercey, referred to in counts three and four of the information) also received shotgun wounds. Shortly after the gunfire between Horgan and Bunch (neither appellant fired any shot) appellants and Horgan ran from the building and were driven away by Max Gilbert, who had waited outside in his automobile. Horgan died from his wounds prior to the trial.

When apprehended, appellant Lovelace and Max Gilbert made statements to the police officers admitting the charges. Both accompanied the officers to the scene of the robbery and there related further details of what had taken place on the night Bunch was shot. Upon the trial of Max Gilbert he and the appellants took the witness stand and gave testimony which established the commission of the crime substantially as related above.

Appellants contend that the trial court was guilty of an abuse of discretion in that: (1) it refused to permit any evidence affecting appellants alone to be introduced at the trial of Max Gilbert; (2) it made remarks from the bench and asked questions pertaining to the crime of kidnaping, with which offense appellants were not formally charged; (3) at the time of judgment it read a prepared statement which appellants assert indicated a conclusion previously reached "without taking into any account the evidence offered in behalf of the defendants"; and (4) assertedly it allowed public clamor in connection with another pending criminal case to influence its judgment in this case.

[1, 2] As to the first contention, that during the trial of Max Gilbert the trial court improperly refused to admit certain evidence not affecting Max Gilbert and relating only to the appellants, the record shows that during that trial counsel for appellants stated there were one or two things which did not concern Max Gilbert and about which she desired to question appellant Lovelace at that point, for the consideration of the court in determining the degree of the crime as to the appellants. The trial judge then stated, "Well, I think we will take that up in subsequent proceedings." This ruling of the trial court was in accordance with the prior stipulation and, moreover, the order of the proof rests in the discretion of the trial court. Although assigning as an abuse of discretion the refusal to receive the evidence at that time, appellants do not contend that the court refused to accord them a full opportunity to produce all the evidence they desired prior to fixing the degree of the crime. The record affirmatively shows that following the Max Gilbert trial the court addressed itself to the hearing of additional evidence on the question of the degree of the homicide to which appellants had pleaded guilty. Several witnesses were called by the defense, after which the court inquired of appellants' counsel whether "That is all the evidence you have to offer?" Counsel replied, "Yes." In view of the stipulation above referred to and the fact that appellants were accorded opportunity to adduce such additional evidence as they desired, it does not appear that any prejudice resulted from the order in which the proof was admitted.

[3-5] Appellants next contend that the court abused its discretion in making the assertion, during the course of remarks made by it in connection with its ruling as to the degree of the crime and the punishment to be exacted, that the evidence showed the commission of an offense (kidnaping) not charged in the information. They further complain that during the hearing to determine the degree of the crime the trial judge propounded questions to the proprietor of the cafe and his wife which were aimed at the determination of the question whether the crime of kidnaping had been committed. Both witnesses previously had given testimony of like purport in response to questions propounded by counsel during the trial of Max Gilbert. As to the court's reference in its remarks to the possible guilt of appellants of the crime of kidnaping we are of the opinion that appellants were not prejudiced thereby. In determining the degree of an offense and the punishment to be imposed, after a plea of guilty, it is the duty of the trial court to consider matters in aggravation as well as in mitigation of the offense. The legal significance of established facts may well constitute an element of which cognizance is taken in the exercise of judicial discretion. A hearing for the determination of the degree of an offense and the punishment therefor is not a trial in the full technical sense, and is not governed by the same strict rules of procedure as a trial. As stated in People v. Williams, 14 Cal.2d 532, 536, 95 P.2d 456, 458 (quoting from People v. Popescue, 345 Ill. 142, 153, 158, 177 N.E. 739, 77 A.L.R. 1199) it is "simply a statutory hearing, by which the court examined witnesses to determine whether any facts existed to aggravate or mitigate the punishment," and "in considering evidence in aggravation or mitigation of the offense the court may consider many matters 'not admissible on the issue of guilt or innocence' * * *."

[6-8] It is next urged that immediately after the witnesses had testified at the hearing on the degree of the crime, and after argument had been made thereon, the trial judge read a written document in which he had set forth his views as to the guilt of appellants., Among other things contained therein was the statement that the evidence indicated that at the time of the commission of the robbery appellants had also committed the crime of kidnaping, as denounced by section 209 of the Penal Code (an offense with which defendants were not charged); that the evidence showed that they had committed murder in the first degree and, in the absence of a showing of extenuating circumstances, it was the view of the court that the death penalty should be imposed. Appellants urge that the very existence of such document indicated that the trial court had prejudged the issue in that the written document apparently had been prepared prior to the opening of the hearing on that morning and before appellants' witnesses had been heard, their testimony having been given during that morning preceding the reading of the document. Upon prompt accusation by counsel the trial judge denied that he had made up his mind what his decision would be before hearing the defense witnesses, stating, "I made up my mind as to what this sentence was to be when you [counsel] sat down [after final argument to the court] and I received the last bit of information upon which this judgment is predicated."

The record shows that prior to the day on which the document was read, the court had heard testimony (comprising some 2,000 pages of the 2,098-page transcript) which included all the testimony given at the Max Gilbert trial, in which the circumstances surrounding the commission of the robbery and the shooting of Bunch had been related in detail. Before reading the document the court also had heard all of the testimony adduced by appellants as to the degree of the crime. The fact that the trial judge had made advance preparation for his decision, as disclosed by the production and reading of the written statement, does not establish that he rendered his decision in disregard of the defense evidence. It is reasonable to infer that after hearing the defense evidence the trial court concluded that it in no way destroyed the effect of the testimony already heard by him, and indicating the murder to be of the first degree. It is not contended by appellants that the evidence as a whole points to the homicide as other than that of the first degree. It cannot be questioned that murder perpetrated in the commission of a robbery, or of an attempt to commit robbery, is murder of the first degree, Penal Code, § 189; see People v. Vaiz, 55 Cal.App.2d 714, 715, 131 P.2d 407, and that all persons engaged therein, whether or not they actually fired the fatal shot or delivered the lethal blow, are equally answerable for all the natural consequences thereof. People v. Martin, 12 Cal.2d 466, 472, 85 P.2d 880; People v. Perry, 195 Cal. 623, 638, 234 P. 890. It was the trial court's duty to determine which of the penalties provided by law should be imposed. Penal Code, § 190; People v. Paraskevopolis, 42 Cal.App. 325, 331, 183 P. 585. It does not appear, from a consideration of the evidence, that the trial court abused its discretion.

[9] The contention that the trial judge allowed himself to be influenced by asserted newspaper publicity and public interest in another criminal trial which was proceeding simultaneously with the instant case, is not supported by any reference to the record indicating that he was so influenced. The statement in the written document, before referred to, that many recent crimes had been committed by gangsters in the immediate community, establishes nothing on which appellants can predicate a claim of error or abuse of discretion. It certainly does not require the conclusion that the trial court erred in determining that the admitted homicide was murder of the first degree, or that it abused its discretion in refusing to mitigate to life imprisonment the punishment fixed by law for that crime. Under the admitted facts the selection of either of the alternative penalties (Penal Code, § 190), was within the bounds of judicial discretion.

[10] As to the asserted mitigating circumstances attending the offenses of appellants, including the facts that appellant Gilbert, although armed at the time he was wounded by officer Bunch, did not return the fire, and that Lovelace was physically handicapped, youthful, and acting under the direction of the apparently more hardened and forceful Horgan, it is not under any advocated theory within our province to exercise original discretion in the premises. If we were to assume all that is urged by appellants with respect to our power of review, we could modify the judgments only if it appeared that the discretion of the trial court had been abused as a matter of law (see Cal. Const., art. VI, § 4). Whether we might on original consideration of the facts differ from the trial judge is therefore immaterial. The controlling point is that the evidence is not insufficient as a matter of law to support the conclusions reached by the trial court.

Examination of the record discloses that no substantial right of either appellant was prejudiced by any of the above-mentioned matters. Appellants admitted that Bunch was shot and killed by their confederate while they were perpetrating a robbery. We find nothing in the proceedings leading up to the imposition of the judgments and sentences that appears to require a reversal of such judgments or a modification of the sentences. It is therefore unnecessary in this case to consider the question as to whether the bounds of jurisdiction, and of discretion, in the imposition of sentence in such cases are identical, or as to whether this court may properly review the exercise of judicial discretion by the trial court in the premises.

The judgments are and each is affirmed.

In Bank.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Emmet H. Wilson, Judge.

Action by the People of the State of California against the Western Fruit Growers, Inc., to enjoin violations of the license regulating the handling of oranges and grapefruit in intrastate commerce issued pursuant to the Agricultural Adjustment Act of 1935, wherein the defendant filed a cross-complaint against W. B. Parker, as Director of Agriculture, etc., and others, seeking an injunction to restrain cross-defendants from enforcing the license against it. From orders denying plaintiff's and granting defendant's applications for a preliminary injunction, the plaintiff and cross-defendants appeal.

Reversed.

Prior opinion, 129 P.2d 53.

Earl Warren, Atty. Gen., Walter L. Bowers, Deputy Atty. Gen., and Ivan G. McDaniel and George C. Lyon, both of Los Angeles, for appellants.

G. V. Weikert, of Los Angeles, for respondents.

EDMONDS, Justice.

The attorney general sued in the name of the People of the State to enjoin Western Fruit Growers, Inc., from shipping oranges in intrastate commerce in excess of allotments fixed by the Director of Agriculture under a license which, it is contended, is authorized by the California Agricultural Adjustment Act of 1935 as amended in 1937, Stats. 1937, ch. 910, p. 2501; Deering's Gen.Laws, 1937 Ed. Act 146, p. 75. By a cross-complaint in which the Director of Agriculture, certain of his departmental officers, and the members of the committees established by the license were named as defendants, Fruit Growers sought an injunction restraining the enforcement of the license pending the final determination of the suit. Upon a hearing, the application of the People was denied and that of Fruit Growers granted. The People's appeal is from that order.

[1] Under the terms of the statute which the Director of Agriculture is endeavoring to enforce, by means of licenses he may restrict, under specified conditions, the production, distribution, and marketing in intrastate commerce of the particular grades and quantities of California grown food products designated by him. The purpose of the act is to provide a regulation of intrastate commerce which will be correlated with the corresponding regulation of interstate commerce in the same commodities. Brock v. Superior Court, 9 Cal.2d 291, 293, 71 P.2d 209, 114 A.L.R. 127.

Acting under the authority of the 1935 legislation, the Director of Agriculture issued, effective January 14, 1936, License No. 2 regulating the marketing of oranges and grapefruit grown in this state. It provides that weekly during each varietal season of oranges, a Distribution Committee composed of shippers of oranges shall recommend to the Director of Agriculture the total amount of oranges, to be shipped in intrastate commerce during the following week. The Growers Advisory Committee, also established by the license, shall recommend to the director the proportion of the total weekly shipments to be shipped from each prorate district and determine the proportion of the particular variety of oranges controlled by each shipper. Upon these determinations, according to the license, the director shall fix the weekly allotments for each shipper.

In 1937, the Legislature passed an act "to amend" the 1935 legislation by amending 20 of the 26 sections, repealing four of them and adding a new one. Stats. 1937, p. 2501. By one of these amendments, the short title of the act was declared to be "The California Agricultural Products Marketing Act of 1937." Section 18 of the 1935 enactment was amended to read as follows: "Any marketing agreement or license, or both, and each and every provision thereof heretofore executed or issued by the Director of Agriculture are hereby continued in effect and deemed to be within the standards and provisions of these amendments, subject however to the provisions hereof for amendment and termination. The term 'license,' as it may appear elsewhere in this act, is deemed identical in meaning and application with the term 'marketing order' as defined and used in these amendments, and shall be so construed in reading this act." St.1937, p. 2515, § 19. After the 1937 statute became effective, the Director of Agriculture did not terminate License No. 2, but is still acting under it in restricting the amounts of oranges marketed in intrastate commerce, and the Growers Advisory Committee and the Distribution Committee have continued to make recommendations in accordance with its terms.

Since July 10, 1936, according to the complaint of the attorney general, License No. 2 has been continuously in effect, and under it, the Director of Agriculture has fixed, and continues to fix, weekly allotments of oranges which may be shipped within the state by those shippers who apply for them. Fruit Growers, the complaint continues, applied to the director and was given specified allotments. From December 17, 1939 to February 3, 1940, however, it wilfully and knowingly shipped over 1700 boxes in excess of its quota, and has threatened to make additional shipments in violation of the license and of the statute. Unless further violations are enjoined, its acts will cause irreparable damage in that pecuniary compensation cannot afford adequate relief, and enforcement of the provisions of the license and statute against other producers and handlers of oranges is inequitable if Fruit Growers does not comply with them. Upon these allegations, the court was asked to issue a permanent injunction and award the sum of $1,000 as a reasonable attorney's fee.

By answer, Fruit Growers admits the overshipments of oranges, but denies that they were made in violation of the statute or that there was or is a valid license or marketing order regulating the handling in intrastate commerce of oranges or grapefruit in this state. In the cross-complaint, it asserts that License No. 2 is invalid and void and it prays for a declaration to that effect. The court is also asked to issue a preliminary injunction restraining the director and the other cross-defendants from enforcing the license pending the final determination of the suit.

[2] The principle is universally recognized that all presumptions and intendments are in favor of the constitutionality of a statute and all doubts should be resolved in favor of its validity. Ray v. Parker, 15 Cal.2d 275, 280, 101 P.2d 665; Jersey Maid Milk Products Co. v. Brock, 13 Cal.2d 620, 636, 91 P.2d 577. In justifying the order of the superior court, however, Fruit Growers relies upon three points: (1) that the 1937 act is a revision of the 1935 statute and is consequently void because it was not reenacted and published at length as required by section 24 of article IV of the California Constitution; (2) that the 1937 act, if valid, repealed the 1935 act, and nullified License No. 2 which had then been issued; and (3) section 18 of the 1935 statute, as amended by section 19 of the new law, is not a valid saving clause and did not continue in effect License No. 2.

The attorney general takes issue with each of these contentions, and, in addition, asserts that Fruit Growers is estopped to deny the constitutionality of the 1937 act, or the validity of the license, because it has accepted the benefits of the prorate program. And, he continues, the respondent is barred from relief by its laches in waiting for more than four years from the time the program was put into effect before questioning the validity of the license and the statute under which it was issued, to the disadvantage of those who have conformed to its requirements. Finally, the attorney general contends, the respondent has failed to state facts in its cross-complaint sufficient to constitute a cause of action for injunctive relief, first, because it seeks an injunction to abrogate the exercise of official discretion placed in the director by the Legislature to determine whether licenses issued prior to the effective date of the 1937 act continued to effectuate the declared policy of that statute; and second, for the reason that it has failed to allege or show that irreparable injury is caused by the continued operation of License No. 2 so as to entitle it to the equitable relief of injunction.

Only sections 15a and 19 of the 1935 statute, St.1935, pp. 1468, 1044, were left unchanged by the 1937 legislation. Section 19 provides that "Chapter 1029, of the Statutes of 1933 [the original act], is hereby repealed." Section 15a requires the Director of Agriculture to deposit specified moneys received by him in the State treasury to the credit of the Department of Agriculture fund. All of the 20 sections amended by the 1937 act were reenacted and published at length as amended, but such a complete change as that contemplated by the 1937 act, says the respondent, constitutes a revision of the existing law and not an amendment of it. And because the Legislature did not reenact sections 15a and 19 in the 1937 statute, and did not publish the entire act as revised, the constitutional mandate has been ignored.

[3] The California Constitution declares: "No law shall be revised or amended by reference to its title; but in such case the Act revised or section amended shall be reenacted and published at length as revised or amended. * * *" Art. IV, sec. 24. In the absence of such a provision, legislative bodies commonly amended an act or a section of it by directing the insertion, omission or substitution of certain words, or by adding a provision, without setting out the entire context of the section as amended. Fletcher v. Prather, 102 Cal. 413, 418, 36 P. 658; and see notes in 55 L.R.A. 833, 855; 86 Am.St.Rep. 276-279. The objection to this method of amendment was the uncertainty and difficulty of correctly reading the original section as later changed.

[4] To avoid the mischief inherent in the mechanics of this legislative process, the People of California imposed certain requirements upon the Legislature, but the provision should be reasonably construed and limited in its application to the specific evil which it was designed to remedy. It is not to be technically measured, nor used as a weapon for striking down legislation which may not reasonably be said to have been enacted contrary to the specified method. Evans v. Superior Court, 215 Cal. 58, 62, 8 P.2d 467; Heron v. Riley, 209 Cal. 507, 510, 289 P. 160; McClure v. Riley, 198 Cal. 23, 26, 243 P. 429; Beach v. Von Detten, 139 Cal. 462, 465, 73 P. 187; Shields v. Oxnard Harbor Dist., 46 Cal. App.2d 477, 486, 116 P.2d 121.

[5] In complying with the People's mandate, the Legislature may use either an existing statute or a section of it as the basis for changing an existing law. The decision as to which unit shall be used is one to be made by the Legislature in its discretion. There are occasions when the public interest may best be served by the publication and reenactment of a statute as a whole; in considering other legislation, the publication and reenactment of the sections affected may be sufficient for all purposes. The determination of the Legislature will not be questioned by the courts, but when the unit to be used as the basis for the new legislation has been determined, the constitutional provision must be followed.

[6] Neither the purpose of the change nor the number of sections to be rewritten has any bearing upon the issue. While abstractly there may be differences in meaning between the words "revise" and "amend," they are interchangeable in the sense in which they are used in the constitution; in either case the revising or amending act is intended as a substitute for the original statute or section, continuing in force that which is reenacted and repealing what is omitted. Pierce v. County of Solano, 62 Cal.App. 465, 469, 217 P. 545.

[7] This problem was considered in Beach v. Von Detten, supra, 139 Cal. page 464, 73 P. page 188, where it was said: "Nor does it make any difference that 58 sections of the original act of 234 sections were thus amended. If 1 section could be amended in the way in which it was done in this case 58 could be so amended. There is no law that makes the amendment of 1 section of an act embracing 234 sections a 'revision.' If the amendment of 1 section is not a revision, neither is the amendment of 2 sections, nor of 58 sections. Of course, every amendment of any section is in one sense a revision of that section, but it is not a revision in the sense of the Constitution." Quite inconsistently, in its subsequent discussion, the court declared "that an act consisting of many sections might be changed in many respects, the subjects treated of differently, the sections differently arranged and differently numbered, and yet retain one or more complete sections of the original act. In such case the act would be a revision." This statement was not, however, essential to the decision and it is contrary to the holding that if one section of a statute may be amended without setting forth the entire act, no reasonable construction requires publication of the former legislation in its entirety because other sections are amended at the same time. If, therefore, the Legislature elects to change a statute by the method of section-by-section amendment, no constitutional violation occurs so long as each section is published and reenacted at length, regardless of the number of sections so changed.

In applying these rules it is necessary to determine which unit, act or section, the Legislature intended to use and the solution of the problem may often be found in the language of the new enactment. Thus Justice McFarland, speaking for the court in Lewis v. Dunne, 134 Cal. 291, 66 P. 478, 479, 55 L.R.A. 833, 86 Am.St.Rep. 257, emphasized that the title of the act there under consideration commenced with the words "An act to revise * * *". The preamble of the statute declared that by a certain act a commission had been appointed "for the revision and reforming of the law," and recited that, "for the purpose of revising said Code, the people of the state * * * do enact as follows." The court concluded that the act was intended as a revision. See, also, the reference to the basis for the decision in Lewis v. Dunne, supra, in the concurring opinion of McFarland, J., in Beach v. Von Detten, supra. In Beach v. Von Detten, supra, the title of the new statute began with the words "An act to amend" the original act "by amending certain sections thereof, repealing certain other sections, and adding certain sections thereto. * * * It is therefore clear," said the court, "that the Legislature thought it was amending certain sections of the act * * *." Page 464 of 139 Cal., page 187 of 73 P. And in People v. Oates, 142 Cal. 12, 13, 75 P. 337, 338, the court said: "We do not think the act before us is anything more than what its title declares it to be, viz., 'An Act to amend' the sections named and 'to repeal' certain sections named and 'to add a new section' to the Penal Code. It is in no sense a revision of the entire code." But although the legislation considered in Evans v. Superior Court, supra, 215 Cal. pages 62, 65, 8 P.2d page 468, commenced with the words, "An act to revise," the court held it was a "new and original piece of legislation. Its terms are not revisory or amendatory of any former act. Consequently, the provision of the Constitution requiring that revised or amended law shall be 'published at length as revised or amended' does not apply, even though the provisions of the Probate Code may be inconsistent with existing statutes."

[8] The title of The California Agricultural Products Marketing Act of 1937 recites that it is, "An act to amend" the 1935 statute "by amending" enumerated sections, "to add a new section * * *, and to repeal" certain sections of the 1935 law. Each section of the 1937 act begins with the declaration that a specified section of the 1935 statute "is hereby amended to read as follows". According to that language, the Legislature unquestionably intended to use the section-by-section amendment procedure, and as it published at length the sections as amended, there was no violation of the constitutional mandate.

Turning to the issue concerning the validity of License No. 2, the attorney general does not question the respondent's contention that the requirements for the issuance of licenses under the 1935 act differ essentially from those contained in the 1937 amendments. And he admits that License No. 2 was not promulgated in accordance with the provisions of the 1937 act. But he takes the position that a license issued under the 1935 act which effectuated its declared policy might also carry out the purpose of the 1937 amendments. The Director of Agriculture made his investigations and findings concerning the policy which should be followed, says the attorney general, and as he determined that License No. 2, issued under the 1935 act, conforms to the aims of the 1937 amendments, the license is continued in effect by section 18 of the 1935 law as amended by section 19 of the 1937 statute, subject of course to the standards of operation set forth in the later legislation.

[9] Section 18, as amended, provides: "Any * * * license * * * and each and every provision thereof heretofore executed or issued by the Director of Agriculture are hereby continued in effect and deemed to be within the standards and provisions of these amendments, subject however to the provisions hereof for amendment and termination. The term 'license,' * * * is deemed identical in meaning and application with the term 'marketing order' as defined and used in these amendments * * *." This section undoubtedly purports to continue in effect all licenses issued under the 1935 act prior to the effective date of the 1937 amendments but subjects them as to any future amendments, or as to their manner of termination, to the requirements of the 1937 provisions governing such action. Consequently, if section 18, as amended, is valid, License No. 2 is still in effect; the respondent is subject to its restrictions; and the 1937 provisions as to the issuance of marketing orders become immaterial.

The respondent claims that section 18 is invalid because in violation of the constitutional provision: "The Legislature shall not pass local or special laws in any of the following enumerated cases * * *: Giving effect to invalid deeds, wills, or other instruments * * * Legalizing, except as against the State, the unauthorized or invalid act of any officer * * * In all other cases where a general law can be made applicable." Art. IV, sec. 25. The saving clause is unconstitutional because, so the respondent reasons, it attempts to give effect to an invalid instrument. And the validity of the license is challenged upon the ground that it does not conform to the requirements and measure up to the standards fixed by the 1937 act, and also as an attempt to legalize the unauthorized acts of the appellants. The saving clause thus discriminates, the respondent continues, between the producers and handlers of oranges and grapefruit, and the producers and handlers of lemons, limes, tangerines, and other competing agricultural commodities not covered by licenses under the 1935 act. This is a situation where a general statute can be made applicable, says the respondent, the 1937 act being such a law if the saving clause is eliminated, consequently, section 18, as amended, is special legislation within the meaning of the constitutional prohibition.

The respondent relies upon the case of Brock v. Superior Court, 12 Cal.2d 605, 86 P.2d 805, 810, as determinative of the question. That case was a proceeding in prohibition to compel the respondent court to dissolve a temporary injunction restraining the enforcement of License No. 2 in so far as it regulated the intrastate marketing of grapefruit. The injunctive order was secured upon a complaint which alleged that the license attempted to regulate two distinctly different industries in violation of the act, and that no valid federal agreement or license controlling interstate marketing by the same agricultural industry was in effect, as required by the statute when the license was issued. The court accordingly held that the plaintiffs were entitled to findings of fact upon these issues, and since the respondent court had jurisdiction to grant the temporary injunction, it would not be prohibited from determining them. The petitioners had argued that the writ should issue because any defects in the license had been cured and "validated" by the amendments of 1937. In so far, however, as the saving clause purported to validate licenses which were defective under the 1935 act, said the court, it was an unconstitutional special law "giving effect to invalid deeds, wills, or other instruments," or "legalizing * * * the unauthorized or invalid act of any officer."

Obviously the two subdivisions of section 25 of article IV considered in Brock v. Superior Court, supra, have no application to a valid instrument or to an authorized act of a state official, and that decision is not determinative of the present proceeding. For here no question is raised as to the validity of License No. 2 under the 1935 act, or as to any want of authority of the Director of Agriculture to promulgate it. The issue now presented is a narrow one, namely, whether the action of the Legislature in continuing a license which was validly issued to regulate the marketing of commodities in a particular agricultural industry, is unconstitutional special legislation because one to restrict the distribution of agricultural products not regulated under the 1935 legislation must be issued upon different conditions and requirements.

[10-11] In the leading case in this state on the question of the distinction between a general and special law, the court declared that a law is a general one when it applies equally to all persons embraced in a class founded upon some natural, intrinsic, or constitutional distinction; on the other hand, it is special legislation if it confers particular privileges, or imposes peculiar disabilities or burdensome conditions, in the exercise of a common right, upon a class of persons arbitrarily selected from the general body of those who stand in precisely the same relation to the subject of the law. City of Pasadena v. Stimson, 91 Cal. 238, 251, 252, 27 P. 604; and see Ray v. Parker, supra; Jersey Maid Milk Products Co., Inc., v. Brock, supra; Frank v. Maguire, 201 Cal. 414, 257 P. 515; Martin v. Superior Court, 194 Cal. 93, 227 P. 762; Reclamation Dist. No. 1500 v. Riley, 192 Cal. 147, 218 P. 762; In re Sumida, 177 Cal. 388, 170 P. 823; Ex parte Stoltenberg, 165 Cal. 789, 134 P. 971; Matter of Miller, 162 Cal. 687, 124 P. 427. Under this rule, it is apparent that the constitutional prohibition of special legislation does not preclude legislative classification but only requires that the classification be reasonable. In re Willing, 12 Cal.2d 591, 86 P.2d 663; Barker Bros., Inc., v. City of Los Angeles, 10 Cal.2d 603, 76 P.2d 97; In re Weisberg, 215 Cal. 624, 12 P.2d 446; Seaboard Acceptance Corp. v. Shay, 214 Cal. 361, 5 P. 2d 882; Watson v. Division of Motor Vehicles, 212 Cal. 279, 298 P. 481; Bacon Service Corp. v. Huss, 199 Cal. 21, 248 P. 235.

[12, 13] Problems of classification under the California constitution are thus similar to those presented by the federal equal protection of the laws clause of the 14th Amendment. Under either provision, the mere production of inequality which necessarily results to some degree in every selection of persons for regulation does not place the classification within the constitutional prohibition. The discrimination or inequality produced, in order to conflict with the constitutional provisions, must be "actually and palpably unreasonable and arbitrary", or the legislative determination as to what is a sufficient distinction to warrant the classification will not be overthrown. Radice v. New York, 264 U.S. 292, 296, 44 S.Ct. 325, 327, 68 L. Ed. 690; Arkansas Natural Gas Co. v. Arkansas Railroad Comm., 261 U.S. 379, 384, 43 S.Ct. 387, 67 L.Ed. 705; In re Livingston, 10 Cal.2d 730, 740, 76 P.2d 1192; Rainey v. Michel, 6 Cal.2d 259, 57 P.2d 932, 105 A.L.R. 148; Los Angeles City School Dist. v. Griffin, 3 Cal.2d 651, 46 P. 2d 141; In re Weisberg, supra; Martin v. Superior Court, supra; Western Indemnity Co. v. Pillsbury, 170 Cal. 686, 151 P. 398; In re Cardinal, 170 Cal. 519, 526, 150 P. 348, L.R.A. 1915F, 850. When a legislative classification is questioned, if any state of facts reasonably can be conceived that would sustain it, there is a presumption of existence of that state of facts, and the burden of showing arbitrary action rests upon the one who assails the classification. In re Fuller, 15 Cal.2d 425, 437, 102 P.2d 321; McCreery v. McColgan, 17 Cal.2d 555, 562, 110 P.2d 1051, 133 A.L.R. 800; In re Livingston, supra; Sequoia Nat. Park Stages Co. v. Sequoia & General Grant Nat. Parks Co., 210 Cal. 156, 291 P. 208; Martin v. Superior Court, supra; In re Cardinal, supra; County of Los Angeles v. Hurlbut, 44 Cal.App.2d 88, 111 P.2d 963; Pacific Gas & Elec. Co. v. Moore, 37 Cal.App.2d 91, 98 P.2d 819.

Growers and shippers of agricultural commodities who may be subject to the prorate program under the California Agricultural Products Marketing Act of 1937 are classified by that statute into two groups: (1) Those who were already operating a prorate program under a license issued under the statute of 1935; and (2) Those who had not yet instituted such a program. New and different requirements for the issuance of a license are imposed upon those in the second group, but no claim is made that the committees would operate any differently under a marketing order issued under the 1937 act than under a license issued prior to the effective date of that statute. Regardless of which act governed the issuance of a particular license or marketing order, any future action with reference to its operation, such as its amendment or termination, must comply with the provisions of the 1937 amendments. Under these circumstances, the only question for decision is whether the continuance of licenses issued upon different but valid conditions (see Brock v. Superior Court, supra) without subjecting those operating under such existing licenses to the new requirements for the issuing of licenses in the future under the 1937 amendments is unreasonable class legislation.

[14] The Legislature may, in adopting a policy, adapt legislation to an existing situation. It is upon this basis that the exemption of existing structures from zoning ordinances has been held valid (City of Aurora v. Burns, 319 Ill. 84, 149 N.E. 784; City of Norton v. Hutson, 142 Kan. 305, 46 P.2d 630), and regulations governing the construction and occupation of certain types of existing buildings different from those required for structures to be erected have been upheld. Ex parte Stoltenberg, supra. For the same reason, courts have sustained the grant of a preferred position to prior applicants for certificates of convenience and necessity to operate motor vehicles over a given route. Bradley v.

Public Utilities Commission of Ohio, 289 U.S. 92, 53 S.Ct. 577, 77 L.Ed. 1053, 85 A.L.R. 1131. Similarly, laws amending vocational and professional standards may provide for the continuance of licenses issued prior to the amendment. Ex parte Whitley, 144 Cal. 167, 171, 77 P. 879, 1 Ann.Cas. 13; Bohannon v. Board of Medical Examiners, 24 Cal.App. 215, 140 P. 1089; People v. Walsh, 346 Ill. 52, 178 N.E. 343; Gerard v. Smith, Tex.Civ.App., 52 S.W.2d 347. And this court has sustained the validity of an amendment to section 4463 of the Political Code by which the Legislature changed the requirements necessary for a newspaper to be one of general circulation, exempting from the new requirement existing newspapers of general publication as they were defined by the prior statute. In re Byers, 219 Cal. 446, 27 P.2d 641. Also, in Whittier, etc., Ass'n v. Agricultural Prorate Commission, 11 Cal.2d 470, 478, 80 P.2d 983, the 1935 amendments to the Agricultural Prorate Act of 1933, changing both the requirements for the formation of a district or zone under the act and the standards of future operation of the program fixed by the act, were held applicable to existing districts validly organized before amendment of the statute only in so far as the future operations of the districts were concerned. Such districts, said the court, were not affected by the changed requirements for the organization of new districts.

[15] In the present action, no contention is made that Fruit Growers, or any other handler of citrus fruits, would be subjected to any different regulation if the license or marketing order had been issued under the 1937 statute rather than the earlier one. Presumably the same types of committees would function under a license issued in accordance with either law and would allocate proration allotments in a similar manner. Undoubtedly the growers and shippers of oranges had adjusted their production and facilities to the program instituted under the 1935 act. Under these circumstances, the recognition of an existing system of regulation and the exception of it from new requirements affecting only the issuance of such licenses while subjecting all licenses to the same standards of future operation is not a palpably unreasonable classification.

[16] The respondent also challenges the validity of section 19 of the 1937 act, amending section 18 of the 1935 statute, upon the ground that it is "inconsistent, self-contradictory, and unintelligible" in providing that the pre-existing licenses shall be subject to the 1937 provisions for amendment and termination. Section 11 of the 1937 act amends section 10 of the 1935 statute to provide that, whenever the director believes an amendment to a marketing order is necessary, he shall call a hearing upon the amendment which shall be held in the same manner and upon the same notice as upon an original marketing order. In what manner and upon what notice is such a hearing to be held, asks the respondent, where, as in the case of the license under consideration, no hearing was held prior to its issuance as a marketing order under the 1937 act? But contrary to the fact assumed by the question, License No. 2 was not issued under the 1937 law. And the answer to the respondent's inquiry is found in the clear words of the provision: "in the same manner and upon the same notice as upon an original marketing agreement or marketing order." Since by section 18, as amended, the procedure of amending a license is required to conform as nearly as possible to the provisions in the 1937 statute, the manner and notice required for an amendment of a license is the same as that required for the issuance of a marketing order under the 1937 act.

Section 11 of the 1937 statute further provides: "In considering such amendment, the director shall take into consideration the evidence presented at the original hearing on the marketing agreement or marketing order to which such amendment is proposed and upon any prior amendment thereto." How, the respondent asks, could the director take into consideration the evidence presented at the original hearing on the present alleged marketing order when no such hearing was held, and no evidence was presented under the 1937 act? But nothing in the language of this provision limits the consideration of the director to evidence introduced at a hearing held in accordance with the 1937 law. In its cross-complaint, the respondent alleges that notice of hearing was given and a series of public hearings was held by the Director of Agriculture during 1935 and 1936 prior to the issuance of License No. 2. All that the new statute requires is that if the director desires to amend License No. 2, he must take into consideration the evidence presented at these hearings.

[17, 18] The respondent refers to the provision of section 11 that "No amendment to a marketing order shall be effective until approved in the same manner as required by section 7 of this act for the original marketing order to which such amendment was proposed." What approval would be required, it asks, to effectuate an amendment to the license here in question, which was never approved as a marketing order by any producer or handler in the first place, as required by section 7, as amended? The provision must be given a reasonable construction in view of the obvious purpose expressed in section 18, as amended in 1937, to require the procedure of changing a license or marketing order to conform to that statute as closely as possible. With this end in view, the only reasonable interpretation of the clause is that an amendment to a license must be approved in the same manner as required for the issuance of new licenses under the legislation now in force, thus effecting the equality and uniformity of future operation contemplated by the Legislature both as to licenses issued before and after the effective date of the 1937 amendments.

[19] One other clause of section 18, as amended, must be considered,—the provision that the licenses theretofore issued by the director are continued in effect "and deemed to be within the standards and provisions of these amendments" but subject to the 1937 provisions for the amending and termination of marketing order. The quoted language must be considered in its context. The Legislature certainly knew that the provisions of the two acts differed, as otherwise there would be no purpose in adding the proviso subjecting existing licenses to the new provisions for amendment and termination. As so construed, the quotation merely means that, in the opinion of the legislators, the primary objectives of the 1935 and the 1937 statutes are essentially the same.

[20, 21] Such a legislative determination, although not binding upon the court, will be given great weight. However, an examination of the provisions of both acts shows that their purpose is identical. Thus section 1 of the 1935 law declares that the widespread agricultural collapse and disorganization prevents the agricultural producers from earning a sufficient return to enable them to contribute their fair share to the support of "ordinary governmental and educational functions and unduly increasing tax burdens of others in the State for those purposes." The aim of the statute, the section continues, is to prevent "the unreasonable and unnecessary waste of agricultural wealth through disorderly, improper or uneconomic marketing or overproduction of agricultural commodities or the marketing of agricultural commodities in excess of reasonable market demands, but preserving to all producers thereof equality of opportunity in the available market." Section 1 of the 1937 act states that the "unreasonable waste and inefficient use of agricultural resources" occasioned by the marketing within the state of greater quantities of agricultural commodities than are reasonably necessary to supply the demand and the disorderly marketing of them is opposed to public interest. Such economic conditions imperil the ability of agricultural producers "to contribute * * * to the support of ordinary governmental and educational functions, thus tending to increase and increasing the tax burdens of other taxpayers for the same purposes," and all render it impossible for agricultural producers to be reasonably assured a reasonable standard of living. In the interest of public welfare, the section concludes, "the unreasonable waste and inefficient use of agricultural resources should be eliminated, while at the same time preserving to all agricultural producers an equality of opportunity."

Again, section 21 of the 1935 act, Stats. 1935, ch. 307, p. 1044, and section 4 of the 1935 amendments, Stats. 1935, ch. 416, pp. 1470, 1471, both provide: "The economic conditions of agricultural producers throughout the State are such as to require immediate relief if their purchasing power and taxpaying ability are to continue and their morale and standard of living are not to be undermined. Such relief can be afforded only by the orderly production and marketing of agricultural products and the coordination of State control of production and marketing with Federal control, each of which supplements the other and makes the same effective." Section 20 of the 1937 statute is practically identical in language, and reads: "The economic conditions of agricultural producers throughout the State are such as to require immediate relief, if their purchasing power and taxpaying ability are to continue and their morale and standard of living are not to be undermined. Such relief can be afforded only by the orderly production and marketing of agricultural products and the establishment of marketing agreements and marketing orders which assure stabilized and orderly distribution of agricultural products which can not otherwise be so marketed." Both the 1935 and 1937 acts also provide for the elimination of unfair methods of competition. From these provisions, it is apparent that the Legislature enacted both statutes for the same purpose: The assurance to agricultural producers of a reasonable standard of living through the elimination of overproduction and uneconomic and wasteful marketing methods and unfair methods of competition through the establishment of administrative committees equitably to apportion among the producers and handlers of agricultural commodities the amount of the commodity which may be marketed in order to more accurately equalize supply and demand for that commodity.

EDMONDS, Justice.

A number of corporations and cooperative marketing associations engaged in growing oranges and marketing them in intrastate commerce joined American Fruit Growers, Inc., as plaintiffs in this proceeding, which challenges the validity of the license considered in People v. Western Fruit Growers, Inc., Cal.Sup., 140 P.2d 13. The Director of Agriculture and persons connected with him in administering the statutes construed in that case are the defendants. Upon a hearing, the superior court issued a preliminary injunction restraining the enforcement of the regulations established by the license. The appeal is from that order.

The decision in the companion case has disposed of all but one of the questions which are presented in this proceeding. Here the growers and distributors who are the respondents make the additional claim that the license was invalid from its inception because it covered the regulation of both oranges and grapefruit. The production and marketing of each of these products, they assert, is a separate and distinct agricultural industry.

This point was also urged in Brock v. Superior Court, 12 Cal.2d 605, 86 P.2d 805, which was a proceeding brought by the growers and handlers of desert grapefruit to enjoin the enforcement of the same license against them. The court then decided that the allegations of the complaint tendered an issue of fact as to whether the marketing of desert grapefruit is an agricultural trade or industry distinctly different from the distribution of other products, and, also, whether the producers of grapefruit were being discriminated against to the profit and advantage of the orange growers. The plaintiffs, said the court, were entitled to the findings of a trial court upon those issues and it therefore denied the petition of the Director of Agriculture for a writ of prohibition compelling the respondent Superior Court to dissolve a temporary injunction which it had issued enjoining the enforcement of the provisions of License No. 2 as to grapefruit.

That injunction is still in effect. No prorate bases for shippers of grapefruit in intrastate commerce have been fixed by the Growers Advisory Committee, no limitations of total weekly shipments of grapefruit have been recommended by the Distribution Committee, and no weekly allotments for grapefruit have been made by the Director of Agriculture under License No. 2. Also since the date of the notice of appeal in this proceeding, the Director of Agriculture, pursuant to the provisions of section 9, as amended by section 10 of the 1937 statute, St.1937, p. 2509, issued an order terminating all of the provisions of License No. 2 concerning the regulation of grapefruit.

[1, 2] Not only has no determination yet been made that the inclusion of these two agricultural products under the same license is a regulation of separate industries, but it appears that, in fact, only oranges have been restricted and now can be regulated under the license. And as a court will not pass upon the validity of a statute or order upon the complaint of one who will not be injured by its operation (Ashwander v. Tennessee V. A., 297 U.S. 288, 347, 348, 56 S.Ct. 466, 80 L.Ed. 688; United States v. Superior Court, 19 Cal.2d 189, 197, 198, 120 P.2d 26; In re Estate of Childs, 18 Cal.2d 237, 244, 115 P.2d 432, 136 A.L.R. 333; In re Willing, 12 Cal.2d 591, 596, 86 P.2d 663; In re Weisberg, 215 Cal. 624, 630, 12 P.2d 446), the respondents cannot now challenge the enforcement of the license upon the ground that it restricts the marketing of more than one agricultural product. Relief by injunction operates in futuro, and the right to it must be determined as of the date of decision by an appellate court. Tulare Irr. Dist. v. Lindsay-Strathmore Dist., 3 Cal.2d 489, 527, 528, 45 P.2d 972, 1014; Dr. Miles C. Co. v. Sontag C. Stores Co., 8 Cal.2d 178, 179, 64 P.2d 726; Diederichsen v. PEOPLE v. LANIGAN et al.

Supreme Court of California.

July 27, 1943.

1. Criminal law ⊂⇒641(1)

The Sixth Amendment providing that accused shall enjoy the right to have "assistance of counsel" for his defense in all criminal prosecutions applies only to criminal trials in federal courts, but same right is protected in states by state Constitution. Const.Cal. art. 1, § 13; U.S.C.A. Const. Amend. 6.

See Words and Phrases, Permanent Edition, for all other definitions of "Assistance of Counsel".

2. Criminal law ⊂⇒641(1)

Fidelity to client who first employed attorney to represent him in criminal prosecution would have foreclosed attorney from voluntarily representing client's co-defendant, and since voluntary employment in that behalf would have been improper, compulsory representation of client's co-defendant, over attorney's objection should not have been imposed. St.1939, p. 355, § 6068(e); Const.Cal. art. 1, § 13.

3. Criminal law ⚷641(1)

Defendants jointly indicted and tried together for robbery were entitled to have question as to whether each should testify in his own behalf, and other questions of such nature, considered by counsel, independently of interests of other defendant. Where at first trial, two defendants were represented by separate counsel, and one of defendants released his counsel after a mistrial, and although trial court instructed such defendant to prepare to go to trial some 30 days later with counsel, such defendant was without counsel, trial court's action in appointing other defendant's counsel to represent both defendants, over objection of both counsel and defendant who was without counsel, constituted prejudicial error. Trial court did not err in substituting an alternate juror on second day after case had been submitted to jury, where one of jurors became ill, juror was examined by physician who reported to trial court that he could give no assurance as to when juror would recover, and trial judge with consent of both parties also questioned juror privately. Where date for trial of two defendants who were jointly indicted on September 3, 1941, was set at November 27, 1941, upon both defendants expressly waiving statutory time for trial, and thereafter all parties appeared in court for purpose of securing a continuance, fact that at end of December and early in January each defendant obtained an order to take depositions out of state furnished justification for granting of continuance to January 9, 1942. Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Clement D. Nye, Judge.

James Lanigan and another were convicted of robbery, and they appeal.

Morris Lavine, Richard Cantillon, and John E. Glover, all of Los Angeles, for appellants.

Robert W. Kenny, Atty. Gen., Earl Warren, Atty. Gen., Gilbert F. Nelson, Deputy Atty. Gen., and Fred N. Howser and John F. Dockweiler, Dist. Attys., and Jere J. Sullivan and Marcus R. Brandler, Deputy Dist. Attys., all of Los Angeles, for respondent.

SHENK, Justice.

The defendants, James Lanigan and Antony Giardano, were jointly indicted for the crime of robbery. On the first trial the jury disagreed, and the second resulted in verdicts of guilty as to both defendants. They appeal from the judgments of conviction and from an order denying their motions for a new trial. There is no contention that the evidence is insufficient to support the verdicts. The principal contentions of the defendants are that their right of counsel was infringed; that an alternate juror was improperly substituted by the trial court; and that their motions to dismiss the case should have been granted.

On June 18, 1941, at a few minutes before 3 p. m., the cashier of the Prudential Life Insurance Company in the company's office in Los Angeles prepared the cash receipts for deposit in the bank. She wrapped the money in two bundles and took them to the desk of Ruth Lewis, an 18 year old girl recently employed, and asked her to take them to the bank. The cashier then called K. E. Powers, assistant superintendent for the company, and asked him to accompany Miss Lewis. The company offices were on the second floor of the building. As Miss Lewis and Mr. Powers descended the stairs, a man wearing dark glasses and a hat, with a handkerchief held up to his face as if wiping his forehead, passed them going up stairs. Descending a few steps further, they were accosted by a man coming toward them with a shopping bag in one hand. He was also wearing dark glasses. He pointed a gun at them saying, "This is a stick up." Miss Lewis was ordered to put the money in the shopping bag. The man who had passed them on the stairs came down with a gun in his hand. Mr. Powers and Miss Lewis were ordered to return to the office and say nothing, but they immediately notified the cashier. No trace of the robbers could then be found.

On July 10, 1941, the defendants were arrested by state patrolmen at Collinsville, Illinois, while in the vicinity of a tavern near the Fairmount Race Track, about 12 miles from St. Louis, Missouri. Lanigan and Giardano were accompanied by a third man, Michaels, who was armed with an army pistol. Lanigan, the owner and driver of the car in which the three men were riding, had a revolver in his belt and another revolver was found in the front of the car. Also found in the car were a pair of Kansas state license plates and a pair of Illinois license plates. Giardano was unarmed. The defendants offered no resistance and were taken to the Collinsville police station. Photographs of the men were sent to Los Angeles and were identified by Miss Lewis and Mr. Powers as the men who had held them up. These photographs were again exhibited to Miss Lewis and Mr. Powers just before they saw the defendants in person in Illinois. Upon seeing Lanigan and Giardano they positively identified them as the men who had staged the holdup.

At the first trial Giardano was represented by Morris Lavine and Lanigan by Cantillon and Glover. On January 28, 1942, at the time the mistrial was declared, Mr. Cantillon explained to the court that he was about to begin on a trial that might last two months, and that with Lanigan's consent he and his associate had been released. The court reset the cases for trial on March 9, 1942, at 10 o'clock a. m., and instructed Lanigan to be prepared to proceed with counsel on that date.

At 9:30 a. m. on March 9, Giardano appeared with Mr. Lavine as his counsel. Lanigan was present without counsel. Mr. Glover also appeared and requested to make a statement in regard to Lanigan. He called the court's attention to the fact that "we" (meaning Mr. Cantillon and himself) "were released from the defense on the record. Now, I understand from Mr. and Mrs. Lanigan both that something Mr. Cantillon said to them indicated he would go through with the case; but Mr. Cantillon says that is not the case. Apparently the defendant has suffered some prejudice by that to this extent that I understand he has no counsel at all and will have to be represented by the Public Defender." The court replied that on January 28th the defendant Lanigan had been admonished to be ready for trial on March 9th either with Mr. Cantillon as his counsel or with other counsel. The court then asked Lanigan if he recalled the admonition. The reply was "Yes, but it puts we in a difficult position. I was advised that he [Cantillon] would be ready * * * I thought I was prepared to go to trial."

The following then occurred:

"The Court: Under those circumstances I don't see anything to do but to go to trial today.

"Defendant Lanigan: You wouldn't want me to go to trial without counsel, would you?

"The Court: I gave you every opportunity, Mr. Lanigan. I told you the case would go to trial and it has to go to trial."

The defendant then asked for a continuance until he could secure counsel. The district attorney opposed the request on the ground that witnesses were present from the East and that Mr. Lavine was present at the first trial as counsel for Giardano, intimating, it is assumed, that Mr. Lavine might then also represent the defendant Lanigan. The trial judge stated to Mr. Lavine that he thought there were no conflicting interests as between the defendants. Mr. Lavine replied that he felt that their interests might conflict. The record then discloses the following: "The Court will deny the motion for continuance and will appoint Mr. Lavine to represent the defendant Lanigan."

"Mr. Lavine: Let the record show that that is over the objection of myself and the defendant Lanigan. * * *

"The Court: The record will so show. We will proceed to trial at 10 o'clock."

At 10 o'clock the case was called and the following occurred:

"Mr. Lavine: The defendant Giardano is ready. As far as Mr. Lanigan is concerned, as previously stated, he objects to proceeding to trial at this time for the reasons heretofore stated. He is not prepared and that he was under the belief that his former counsel would again come into the case. He just learned this morning, he states, that he will not come into the case. Therefore he is not ready to proceed. On the further ground that the representation of Mr. Lanigan by the counsel for Mr. Giardano is opposed by Mr. Lanigan on the ground that there would be conflict of interests and the representation of Mr. Lanigan by counsel for Giardano is opposed on the same ground.

"The Court: In order to keep the record clear in this matter the motion for continuance made in propria persona by the defendant Lanigan having been denied the Court at this time asks the defendant Lanigan to elect between representing himself or having Mr. Lavine represent him.

"Defendant Lanigan: Well, can I consult Mr. Lavine?

"Mr. Lavine: Mr. Lavine objects to being consulted on that motion.

"The Court: All right, let the record show that Mr. Lavine objects to being consulted on the question of the Court. It is up to you, Mr. Lanigan.

"Mr. Lavine: On the ground that there will be a conflict in the interests and the two interests are separate and apart.

"The Court: I will request you to make the election at this time, Mr. Lanigan, either represent yourself in the matter or be represented by Mr. Lavine as an officer of the Court.

"Defendant Lanigan: If the Court please, if Mr. Lavine represents me it is with my objection. I cannot represent myself.

"The Court: I understand that you are objecting to the order of the Court requiring you to elect and whichever course you adopt will be over your objection.

"Defendant Lanigan: Yes.

"The Court: At the order of the Court.

"Defendant Lanigan: I am in the position where I have to have an attorney. In other words, I am between the devil and the deep blue sea.

"The Court: Having had some 30 days notice, however, of the fact that the case was going to trial on this date and that you would be required to have counsel at this time.

"Mr. Lanigan: As I stated before I did believe I had counsel and I am not ready to go to trial.

"The Court: That question has been disposed of. I am now asking you to elect as to whether you want to represent yourself or have Mr. Lavine represent you as an officer of the Court.

"Defendant Lanigan: I should like an opportunity to consult some counsel as to that.

"The Court: I am afraid we can't give you that opportunity. You have had 30 days in which to prepare for this and I will have to ask you to declare your choice at this time.

"Defendant Lanigan: I am in an awful spot. I don't know what to do. I can't defend myself.

"The Court: You don't feel capable of defending yourself?

"Defendant Lanigan: No. It has always been taught to me that every person in this country has a right to counsel.

"The Court: You are correct about that.

"Defendant Lanigan: This is an important matter in my life. Fortunately we have a higher court.

"The Court: Yes, that is right. That is why I want to keep the record straight in this matter so that if it goes to a higher court the higher court will know just what the proceedings were.

"Defendant Lanigan: I realize that. I am not qualified to answer your question. I can't defend myself and I don't care to have Mr. Lavine defend me.

"The Court: You don't want to represent yourself?

"Defendant Lanigan: No.

"The Court: In that circumstance the Court will appoint Mr. Lavine as an officer of the Court and the record will show it is over your protest and over the protest of Mr. Lavine."

The defendants contend that prejudicial error was committed in denying to Giardano the undivided assistance of his counsel and in forcing upon Lanigan an attorney whom he did not wish to have as his counsel. The defendants insist that the present case is strikingly similar to the case of Glasser v. United States, 315 U.S. 60, 62 S.Ct. 457, 464, 86 L.Ed. 680, decided January 19, 1942, by the United States Supreme Court, in which the facts were as follows: Glasser, an Assistant United States Attorney for the Northern District of Illinois, and Kretske, another Assistant District Attorney, and others were charged with conspiracy to defraud the United States in the prosecution of liquor cases. At the opening of trial, McDonnell, the counsel who had been appointed to represent Kretske, informed the court that Kretske did not wish to have him as his attorney. The court suggested that Stewart, Glasser's attorney, represent both defendants. Glasser objected. The court then informed McDonnell he would have to continue with the case until Kretske could get another lawyer. Kretske then told the court that Mr. Stewart had said that if the court wished to appoint him "I think we can accept the appointment." Stewart was appointed, and Glasser registered no further objections. On appeal Glasser charged as prejudicial the denial of his right to counsel of his own choosing and the undivided assistance of that counsel. The Supreme Court reversed the conviction as to Glasser on the ground that the Sixth Amendment had been violated. It was pointed out that the conflict of interests had made it necessary for Stewart to fail to object to certain testimony admissible as to Kretske but inadmissible as to Glasser. Furthermore the court stated: "There is yet another consideration. Glasser wished the benefit of the undivided assistance of counsel of his own choice. We think that such a desire on the part of an accused should be respected. Irrespective of any conflict of interest the additional burden of representing another party may conceivably impair counsel's effectiveness.

"To determine the precise degree of prejudice sustained by Glasser as a result of the court's appointment of Stewart as counsel for Kretske is at once difficult and unnecessary. The right to have the assistance of counsel is too fundamental and absolute to allow courts to indulge in nice calculations as to the amount of prejudice arising from its denial. [Citing cases.] Of equal importance with the duty of the court to see that an accused has the assistance of counsel is its duty to refrain from embarrassing counsel in the defense of an accused by insisting, or indeed, even suggesting that counsel undertake to concurrently represent interest which might diverge from those of his first client, when the possibility of that divergence is brought home to the court. * * *"

[1] Although the Sixth Amendment is applicable only to trials in Federal courts (Betts v. Brady, 316 U.S. 455, 62 S.Ct. 1252, 86 L.Ed. 1595), the same right is protected in this state by article 1, section 13 of our Constitution providing that "In criminal prosecutions, in any court whatever, the party accused shall have the right * * * to appear and defend, in person and with counsel."

In the Glasser case the co-defendant Kretske consented to the appointment of Glasser's counsel to represent him. Glasser objected and was in the same situation as the defendant Giardano in the present case. Unlike Kretske in that case, the co-defendant Lanigan in this case vigorously objected.

[2, 3] There are many reasons why the objections of Mr. Lavine and the defendants themselves should have been respected. Mr. Lavine had been employed by Giardano as his sole counsel. That employment carried with it a very definite professional obligation on the part of Mr. Lavine. The engagement required him to "maintain inviolate the confidence and at every peril to himself to preserve the secrets, of his client" (subd. (e) sec. 6068, State Bar Act, St.1939, p. 355). That admonition to lawyers is as old as the canons of professional ethics. Undivided loyalty to the cause of his client is essential to the personal integrity of counsel and to the maintenance of the high standards of the legal profession. Under the circumstances here presented, fidelity to the client who first employed him would have foreclosed Mr. Lavine from voluntarily representing the co-defendant. Since voluntary employment in that behalf would have been improper, compulsory representation should not have been imposed. Mr. Lavine was therefore well within his rights in objecting to his appointment as counsel for Lanigan and Giardano was entitled to the undivided assistance of the counsel whom he had employed. As to the defendant Lanigan, he requested but was refused the right to consult counsel as to the important question whether he would be prejudiced by being represented by counsel for the other defendant. He was represented by order of court by counsel with whom he had no opportunity to confer. When the time came for the presentation of their defense Mr. Lavine was confronted with the delicate question whether to advise them to testify in their own behalf, for the failure of a defendant "to explain or to deny by his testimony any evidence or facts in the case against him may be commented upon by the court and by counsel, and may be considered by the court or the jury". Cal.Const., art. I, § 13, as amended in 1934. In criminal cases it frequently occurs that circumstances which make it advisable for one defendant to testify are not present when consideration is given to the question of offering another defendant as a witness. One may be vulnerable to impeaching questions and the other not. It might be highly desirable that the one not so vulnerable take the witness stand and the other not. If the former should do so and the other not, the circumstance might weigh heavily against the latter in the minds of the jury. A like prejudice might not occur if the defendants were represented by separate counsel. Each of the defendants was entitled to have questions of this nature considered and decided by counsel independently of the interests of the other. And counsel should not be hampered or embarrassed by being compelled to choose one course as against the other because of the action taken by the court.

[4] In Powell v. Alabama, 287 U.S. 45, 53 S.Ct. 55, 65, 77 L.Ed. 158, 84 A.L.R. 527, it was stated that "the failure of the trial court to make an effective appointment of counsel was likewise a denial of due process within the meaning of the Fourteenth Amendment." So in the present case there was a failure to make an "effective appointment of counsel." It must therefore be concluded that the trial court erred prejudicially in forcing the defendant Giardano to share the attention and efforts of his counsel with the other defendant, and that the court likewise so erred in forcing the defendant Lanigan to be represented by counsel who did not wish to represent him, who objected to the order of the court appointing him and who did not feel that he could properly represent him. In such circumstances counsel was not in a position freely to decide what was most advantageous for the defense of one client without weighing against it the disadvantage that might result to the other.

[5, 6] There is no merit in the contention of the defendants that error was committed by the substitution of an alternate juror. On the second day after the case had been submitted to the jury one of the woman jurors became ill from an intestinal disturbance and continued to be in distress for several hours. She was examined by a physician who reported to the court that he could give no definite assurance as to when she would recover. With the consent of both parties the judge also questioned the juror privately and was told by her that her illness was due in some degree to the nervous strain of the deliberations. After careful inquiry as to her physical condition the court concluded that the juror was ill to the extent that she was unable to perform a juror's duties and that the alternate should be substituted in her place. The jury continued its deliberations on the following morning and at about three o'clock that afternoon reached a verdict finding the defendants guilty as charged.

All of the defendants' contentions in this connection are answered by statute law and the decisions. In People v. Ross, 85 Cal. 383, 24 P. 789, it was held that the discharge of the jury, on account of sickness of one of the jurors, over the defendant's objection, did not constitute jeopardy. That case was decided in 1890. In 1895 (Stats.1895, p. 279), in order to obviate a discharge of the jury in such cases, the Legislature enacted section 1089 of the Penal Code to provide for alternates in protracted trials, and the substitution of an alternate for a juror who might become ill before the submission of the case to the jury. The constitutionality of those provisions was sustained in People v. Peete, 54 Cal.App. 333, 202 P. 51, where it was held that the right to be tried by a jury of twelve was not thereby infringed. In 1933 (Stats.1933, p. 1342), the section was further amended to provide that "if at any time, whether before or after the final submission of the case to the jury," a juror was unable to perform his duty on account of illness he may be replaced by an alternate. The amendment was upheld in People v. Von Badenthal, 8 Cal.App.2d 404, 48 P.

2d 82, 84, where an alternate was substituted "after the jury had been deliberating for some time without arriving at a verdict." That case also answers the contention that the evidence was not sufficient to justify the discharge of the juror, because it was shown at a later time that in a few days she was back at her employment. It was pointed out that the "action of the court must be tested in the light of the evidence before it at the time of the decision", which, in this case, unquestionably warranted the court in discharging the juror. In the case of People v. Love, 21 Cal.App.2d 623, 70 P.2d 202, the contention was made and rejected that the provision for the substitution of a juror after submission of the case to the jury was unconstitutional.

[7, 8] It is contended by the defendants that the trial court should have granted the motion to dismiss the case on the ground that it was not brought to trial within the time prescribed by section 1382 of the Penal Code, and that they were denied their constitutional rights to a speedy trial.

The indictment was returned on September 3, 1941. On September 8 the defendant Lanigan pleaded not guilty and his trial was set for October 27. The defendant Giardano was apprehended later and was arraigned on September 26. He pleaded not guilty and his trial was set for October 31. On October 17, on motion of both defendants, their trial was continued to November 27, 1941, each defendant expressly waiving the statutory time for trial. On November 7, 1941, the cases were advanced on the calendar to that date at the request of the prosecution and the defendants for the purpose of fixing a date later than November 27. At that time the prosecution stated to the court that the defendants wished to take depositions in St. Louis, Missouri, and Reno, Nevada, and that the prosecution would bring witnesses from eastern points, some of whom were scheduled to appear as witnesses in the Federal Court on January 20, 1942, in a case in which the defendants were charged with transporting from one state to another the guns used in the commission of the robbery charged in the present case. When the court informed counsel that the calendar was filled for December both defendants stated that they would be ready on November 27, 1941, and objected to a continuance. The court then set the case for trial for January 9, 1942. Defendant Giardano obtained on December 27, 1941, an order for the issuance of a commission to take the depositions of witnesses residing in St. Louis, Missouri, and on January 5, 1942, obtained the issuance of a commission to take the depositions of additional witnesses residing in St. Louis. Early in January, 1942, defendant Lanigan obtained an order for the issuance of a commission to take the depositions of witnesses residing in Reno, Nevada. On January 9, 1942, when the case was called for trial defendant Lanigan asked that the case be continued until January 14, 1942, basing his motion upon the ground that his counsel was engaged in another trial and on the further ground that depositions which he was taking had not been filed with the court. This motion was granted.

It clearly appears from the record that at the time of their appearance in court on November 7, 1941, all parties were in favor of a continuance to a date later than November 27, 1941. The court's calendar was congested during the month of December and the continuance to January 9, 1942, was not an abuse of discretion. Murphy v. Superior Court, 53 Cal.App. 6, 200 P. 483. Before the end of December and early in January each defendant sought and obtained an order to take depositions out of the state. These facts furnished further justification for the continuance.

Other points are made by the defendants. They relate to matters of procedure which are not likely to recur on a retrial and therefore need not be discussed.

The judgments and the order denying the motion for a new trial are reversed.

1. Evidence 🔑384

Under parol evidence rule a party is prohibited from varying terms of a written instrument by oral testimony.

2. Trusts 🔑94

Where oral trust in favor of transferor of land or oral agreement to reconvey land to transferor are unenforceable under statute of frauds, and transferee refuses to perform trust or agreement, a "constructive trust" arises if transfer was procured by fraud, misrepresentation, duress, undue influence or mistake entitling transferor to restitution, if confidential relation existed or if transfer was made as security for an indebtedness of transferor. Civ.Code, §§ 852, 2224.

See Words and Phrases, Permanent Edition, for all other definitions of "Constructive Trust".

3. Trusts 🔑103(1)

Where confidential relationship exists between parties to transfer of land upon an oral agreement to reconvey, breach of agreement by transferee or his administrator constitutes sufficient "fraud" to create a "constructive trust." Civ.Code, §§ 852, 2224.

4. Trusts 🔑103(1)

Equity courts will prevent one person who is in a confidential relation with another from becoming unjustly enriched by reason of a breach of the trust. Civ.Code, § 2224.

5. Trusts 🔑103(1)

Where there is some sort of a status between grantor and grantee of land upon an oral agreement to reconvey, and confidence is imposed, a "constructive trust" will be imposed upon repudiation of oral promise to reconvey. Civ.Code, §§ 852, 2224.

6. Trusts 🔑102(2)

Where a friendly intimate relationship existed between nephew and uncle who had lived together in house on property in which each had a one-third interest, a "confidential relationship" existed, and, on refusal of uncle's administrator to reconvey to nephew his interest in property which he had conveyed to uncle upon uncle's oral promise to reconvey, a "constructive trust" arose in favor of nephew. Civ.Code, §§ 852, 2224.

See Words and Phrases, Permanent Edition, for all other definitions of "Confidential Relationship".

7. Trusts 🔑96

A constructive trust based on repudiation of oral promise to reconvey property does not arise until transferee repudiates the promise or dies.

8. Trusts 🔑374

Where a constructive trust is imposed court should require beneficiary of trust to do equity, and under such rule beneficiary will ordinarily be required to repay benefits received.

9. Trusts 🔑374

Where constructive trust in favor of nephew arose upon refusal of uncle's administrator to reconvey to nephew land conveyed by nephew to uncle under oral promise to reconvey, administrator was not entitled to a lien for nephew's share of expenditures in reducing mortgage on property and paying taxes, in absence of evidence as to amount of such share or evidence to rebut inference that such expenditures by uncle were intended as a gift.

10. Appeal and error 🔑1071(6)

There was no prejudicial error in failing to find on particular issue where only reasonable inference from the evidence would have been contrary to appellant's contention.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Francisco County; Frank T. Deasy, Judge.

Action by Earle C. Steinberger against Albert I. Steinberger, administrator of the estate of William Edward Steinberger, deceased, to establish a trust in an undivided one-third interest in real property in San Francisco. Judgment for the plaintiff, and the defendant appeals.

Judgment affirmed.

A. B. Bianchi, of San Francisco, for appellant.

John B. Ehlen, of San Francisco, for respondent.

PETERS, Presiding Justice.

Plaintiff, Earle C. Steinberger, brought this action against the administrator of the estate of William Edward Steinberger, who died intestate and who was the uncle of plaintiff, to establish a trust in an undivided one-third interest in real property in San Francisco. From a judgment for plaintiff the defendant administrator appeals.

The facts are as follows: In 1929, or prior thereto, Mary Louise Steinberger, grandmother of Earle and a relative of William Steinberger, deeded the property, then encumbered, to William, Earle and to Earle's brother. William was the uncle of Earle. Each of the grantees received an undivided one-third interest in the property. On September 12, 1930, Earle, at the request of William, executed a grant bargain and sale deed of his one-third interest to his uncle William. This deed was executed on the uncle's oral promise to reconvey upon the request of Earle. This promise was subsequently orally renewed and orally acknowledged. William died on February 8, 1940. Prior to that time there had been no request to reconvey. The administrator refused to recognize Earle's interest in the property. The present action was brought some time prior to June 10, 1941, the amended complaint having been filed on that date.

The court found that a confidential relationship existed between Earle and his uncle; that on the date of the deed Earle was about to leave San Francisco for Los Angeles for an indefinite period; that the uncle requested Earle to execute the deed in order to make it more convenient for William to take care of and manage the property; that the uncle promised that if Earle would execute the deed, he, the uncle, would take care of and manage the property for the benefit of Earle and of himself, and that he would reconvey Earle's one-third interest upon request; that in compliance with such request, and because the plaintiff reposed the utmost trust and confidence in his uncle, and because he believed and relied upon the promise to reconvey, Earle executed the deed in question; that the deed was executed without consideration; that from the date of the execution of the deed until the time of his death William continuously and on repeated occasions recognized that he was holding the one-third interest in trust for Earle; that William at no time repudiated the trust; that the defendant administrator has refused to reconvey upon demand of Earle.

On this appeal the administrator, while not denying that the evidence supports the finding of the oral agreement to reconvey and its subsequent acknowledgement, contends that all such evidence was inadmissible as being in violation of the parol evidence rule, and of the statute of frauds. He also contends that if a constructive trust arose it necessarily arose in 1930 when the deed was executed and the promise made, and for that reason plaintiff's claim is barred by the statute of limitations. It is also urged that he is entitled to a lien on the premises for sums advanced by his intestate. In his reply brief, and in briefs filed at the request of the court since oral argument, he urges that the finding of confidential relationship is unsupported by the evidence. None of these contentions is sound.

[1] The main problem involved centers around the application of the statute of frauds and the parol evidence rule to the facts here involved. Section 852 of the Civil Code provides that:

"No trust in relation to real property is valid unless created or declared:

"1. By a written instrument, subscribed by the trustee, * * * or,

"3. By operation of law."

Under the parol evidence rule a party is prohibited from varying the terms of a written instrument by oral testimony. In the instant case plaintiff deeded the property to William by a grant bargain and sale deed. It is obvious, therefore, that the express trust, resting in parol, is unenforceable as an express trust, and that the oral evidence of such trust does tend to vary the terms of the deed. But this is not an action to enforce the oral express trust. It is an action to enforce a constructive trust which it is claimed arose by operation of law upon the repudiation of the promise to reconvey.

The law generally is unsettled on the question as to whether or not equity will enforce a constructive trust in real property upon breach of an oral contract to reconvey. The English cases hold that the transferee may set up the statute of frauds against enforcement of the oral express trust, and that no penalty will attach to him for so doing, but, if he sets up the statute, he is duty bound to restore the property received on the faith of his oral promise. If the transferee will not voluntarily make restitution, equity will compel such restitution through the medium of a constructive trust. The theory is that the constructive trust will be imposed to prevent the unjust enrichment of the transferee. Some few American cases have reached the same result by holding that the transferee's repudiation of his oral promise to reconvey is a fraud upon the transferor, which gives rise to the constructive trust.

The so-called majority American rule is that the repudiation of an oral promise to reconvey does not give rise to a constructive trust. The theory is that equity must respect and enforce the statute of frauds, and that to enforce a constructive trust is a violation of the spirit, if not the letter, of the statute. For discussion of the two rules, with many cases cited, see 3 Bogert, Trusts and Trustees, p. 1585, § 495 et seq.; 1 Scott on Trusts, p. 246, § 44 et seq.; 1 Perry on Trusts and Trustees, 7th Ed., p. 295, § 181a et seq.

California has apparently aligned itself with the English and the so-called minority American view. In Taylor v. Morris, 163 Cal. 717, 127 P. 66, there was involved a similar problem to the one here presented. Without reference to the confidential relationship there existing, the court stated (page 722 of 163 Cal., page 68 of 127 P.): "The statute of frauds is never permitted to become a shield for fraud, and fraud at once arises upon the repudiation by the trustee of any trust, even if that trust rests in parol. When it rests in parol, either parol evidence must be received to establish the trust, or the faithless trustee will always prevail. Certainly no elaboration of so plain a proposition is necessary, and it should be sufficient to refer to such cases as Butler v. Hyland, 89 Cal. 575, 26 P. 1108; Hayne v. Hermann, 97 Cal. [259], 261, 32 P. 171; Odell v. Moss, 130 Cal. 352, 62 P. 555; Becker v. Schwerdtle, 141 Cal. [386], 391, 74 P. 1029; Fanning v. Green, 156 Cal. 279, 104 P. 308; Cooney v. Glynn, 157 Cal. [583], 589, 108 P. 506; Lauricella v. Lauricella, 161 Cal. 61, 118 P. 430." In Gray v. Walker, 157 Cal. 381, 108 P. 278, however, a department of the Supreme Court expressly adopted the so-called majority view, citing such cases as Feeney v. Howard, 79 Cal. 525, 526, 21 P. 984, 4 L.R.A. 826, 12 Am.St.Rep. 162; Babcock v. Chase, 111 Cal. 351, 43 P. 1105; Sheehan v. Sullivan, 126 Cal. 189, 58 P. 543. See, also, Smith v. Mason, 122 Cal. 426, 55 P. 143, adopting the so-called majority American view. The more recent California cases have clearly followed the rule of Taylor v. Morris, supra, and have held that a constructive trust arises and will be enforced to compel restitution upon violation of the oral promise. O'Brien v. O'Brien, 50 Cal.App.2d 658, 123 P.2d 877; Robertson v. Summeril, 39 Cal.App.2d 62, 102 P.2d 347; People v. Ahern, 31 Cal.App.2d 655, 88 P.2d 787; McRae v. McRae, 67 Cal.App. 480, 227 P. 933; Airola v. Gorham, 56 Cal.App.2d 42, 133 P.2d 78.

This problem has been the source of much discussion by the various legal authorities in the field of trusts. It is the view of these authorities that the English view is sound and that the so-called American view is unsound. It is their view that one of the functions of a court of equity is to prevent unjust enrichment. Just as quasi contracts are used to prevent unjust enrichment in the field of contracts, so quasi or constructive trusts should be used to prevent unjust enrichment in the field of trusts. Neither the parol evidence rule nor the statute of frauds will prevent a grantor from showing that a deed absolute on its face was intended as a mortgage, and upon payment of the obligation the grantor can compel restitution. In that case, just as is so in the problem here involved, the express oral promise to reconvey is unenforceable, but the repudiation of that promise should compel the grantee to restore the grantor to the status quo. 3 Bogert, Trusts and Trustees, p. 1603, § 497; 1 Scott on Trusts, p. 246, § 44; James Barr Ames in 20 Harv.L.Rev. 549; George P. Costigan, Jr. in 12 Mich.L.Rev. 427 and 515; Chief Justice Harlan F. Stone in 6 Columb.L.Rev. 326; see notes 24 Cal.L.Rev. 609; 13 Cal.L.Rev. 174. These arguments seem unanswerable. It should be here noted that in notes attached to § 182 of the Restatement of the Law of Restitution, and § 44 of the Restatement of the Law of Trusts, it is noted that: "The Institute takes no position" on the question here under discussion. If California has adopted the so-called English view, which would seem to be indicated by the above authorities, it is apparent that upon repudiation by the administrator a constructive trust arose, and that the administrator was properly required to restore the property in question.

[2] Although the so-called majority American view is that no trust will arise upon a repudiation of the oral promise to reconvey, several important exceptions to that rule have been recognized. These exceptions are perhaps best stated in § 182 of the Restatement of the Law of Restitution and § 44 of the Restatement of the Law of Trusts, the two sections being substantially identical. Section 182 provides:

> "Where the owner of an interest in lands transfers it inter vivos to another upon an oral trust in favor of the transferor or upon an oral agreement to reconvey the land to the transferor, and the trust or agreement is unenforceable because of the Statute of Frauds, and the transferee refuses to perform the trust or agreement, he holds the interest upon a constructive trust for the transferor, if
> "(a) the transfer was procured by fraud, misrepresentation, duress, undue influence or mistake of such a character that the transferor is entitled to restitution, or
> "(b) the transferee at the time of the transfer was in a confidential relation to the transferor, or
> "(c) the transfer was made as security for an indebtedness of the transferor."

[3-5] These exceptions, and particularly the one relating to confidential relations, are recognized in nearly every American state (see cases collected 3 Bogert on Trusts and Trustees, p. 1594, § 496; 1 Scott on Trusts, p. 253, § 44.2), and have clearly been adopted in California. (See California Annotations to the Restatement of the Law of Trusts (§ 44) and to the Restatement of the Law of Restitution (§ 182.) It is well settled in this state that breach of the oral promise to reconvey by the transferee or his administrator when the transferee was in a confidential relationship with the transferor at the time of the transfer constitutes sufficient "fraud" to create the constructive trust. In Re Estate of Cover, 188 Cal. 133, 143, 204 P. 583, 588, the court defined the terms "confidential relation" as follows: "Confidential and fiduciary relations are, in law, synonymous, and may be said to exist whenever trust and confidence is reposed by one person in the integrity and fidelity of another." However, it is not clear from the cases whether the courts mean a confidential relationship in fact must exist, or whether it must also be a relationship based on status. See cases commented on 13 Cal.L.Rev. 174. The basis of the confidential relationship exception is that under § 2224 of the Civil Code the equity courts will prevent one person who is in a confidential relation with another from becoming unjustly enriched by reason of a breach of the trust. It would seem, therefore, that a confidential relation in fact should be the test. Under such a test relief would be afforded in practically every case where there is a breach of the oral promise to reconvey. Few cases will arise where one person will convey property to another by absolute deed, and where the grantor will be satisfied with the oral promise of the grantee to reconvey, unless the grantor, in fact, has trust and confidence in the integrity and fidelity of the grantee. The result is that under such a test the exception tends to swallow up the rule to which it is supposed to be an exception. That is exactly what has happened in this state. The cases are clear that where there is some sort of a status between the grantor and grantee, and confidence is imposed, a constructive trust will be imposed upon repudiation of the oral promise to reconvey. Thus actual trust and confidence, plus the relationship of parent and child, is sufficient (Robertson v. Summeril, 39 Cal.App.2d 62, 102 P.2d 347; Cooney v. Glynn, 157 Cal. 583, 108 P. 506; Nordholt v. Nordholt, 87 Cal. 552, 26 P. 599, 22 Am.St.Rep. 268; Mead v. Mead, 41 Cal.App. 280, 182 P. 761), as is that of husband and wife (Allen v. Meyers, 5 Cal.2d 311, 54 P.2d 450; Kohn v. Kempner, 59 Cal.App. 621, 211 P. 805; Smith v. Lombard, 201 Cal. 518, 258 P. 55; Taylor v. Bunnell, 77 Cal.App. 525, 247 P. 240; Lauricella v. Lauricella, 161 Cal. 61, 118 P. 430; Jones v. Jones, 140 Cal. 587, 74 P. 143; Brison v. Brison, 75 Cal. 525, 17 P. 689, 7 Am.St.Rep. 189), even where the relationship is meretricious Cole v. Manning, 79 Cal.App. 55, 248 P. 1065. The trust has also been imposed where actual trust and confidence existed and the grantor and grantee were brother and brother (O'Brien v. O'Brien, 50 Cal.App.2d 658, 123 P.2d 877; Logan v. Ryan, 68 Cal.App. 448, 229 P. 993; Cummings v. Cummings, 55 Cal.App. 433, 203 P. 452), or were brother and sister (Tench v. McMeekan, 17 Cal.App. 14, 118 P. 476), or where attorney and client (Broder v. Conklin, 77 Cal. 330, 19 P. 513; Id., 121 Cal. 282, 53 P. 699), or principal and agent (Kimball v. Tripp, 136 Cal. 631, 69 P. 428) or client and business advisor (Sanguinetti v. Rossen, 12 Cal. App. 623, 107 P. 560). Coming closer to the relationship here involved, it has been held that actual trust and confidence, plus the relationship of aunt and niece, will be sufficient to raise the constructive trust (Butler v. Hyland, 89 Cal. 575, 26 P. 1108) as is the relationship of uncle and niece and adopted daughter (Alaniz v. Casenave, 91 Cal. 41, 27 P. 521) and where the grantor and grantee were aunt and nephew by marriage (People v. Ahern, 31 Cal.App.2d 655, 88 P.2d 787). Trusts have also been imposed where the grantor and grantee were an engaged couple (McRae v. McRae, 67 Cal.App. 480, 227 P. 933), and where the grantor and grantee had "relations of great confidence" and were later married (Bradley Co. v. Bradley, 165 Cal. 237, 131 P. 750; Id., 37 Cal.App. 263, 173 P. 1011) and where they were brothers-in-law. Anderson v. Broadwell, 119 Cal.App. 130, 6 P.2d 260. In Barr v. O'Donnell, 76 Cal. 469, 18 P. 429, 9 Am.St. Rep. 242, it was held that where one cotenant deeds to another cotenant and the latter breaches his oral promise to reconvey, no trust arises, but in that case it was not contended that the relationship between cotenants was confidential. In Stewart v. Shearman, 22 Cal.App.2d 198, 70 P.2d 702, however, it was held that cotenants stand in a confidential relationship to one another.

[6] In the instant case the trial court found that Earle and his uncle William stood in a confidential relationship to each other. This finding is amply supported. There is not only the evidence of the status of uncle and nephew, and of cotenants, but there is ample evidence to show that a confidential relationship in fact existed. The respondent testified that he had trust and confidence in his uncle. The evidence shows that Earle and William lived in the house on the property here involved from the time of Earle's birth; that the uncle gave Earle money when he needed it, and that Earle reciprocated; that the uncle frequently expressed solicitude for his nephew Earle; that the uncle frequently stated he was keeping and holding the home for the boys. The evidence shows a friendly intimate relationship existed between Earle and his uncle. From this evidence it is apparent that the finding of confidential relationship is amply supported. It follows that whether California follows the English rule or the limited American rule, in the instant case a constructive trust arose upon the death of William and upon the repudiation of the trust by his administrator.

[7] But little need be said about the defense of the statute of limitations. The cases are clear that the constructive trust does not arise until the transferee repudiates the oral promise to reconvey or dies. Norton v. Bassett, 154 Cal. 411, 97 P. 894, 129 Am.St.Rep. 162; Barritt v. Barritt, 132 Cal.App. 538, 23 P.2d 54; Easton v. Geller, 116 Cal.App. 577, 3 P.2d 74; Jones v. Jones, 140 Cal. 587, 74 P. 143; Allen v. Meyers, 5 Cal.2d 311, 54 P.2d 450.

[8-10] The last contention of appellant is that he is entitled to a lien for sums advanced by his intestate. The evidence shows that when the deed was executed to William there was a mortgage on the property for $3,000; that in 1929 the mortgage was renewed by the three donees; that in 1934 the mortgage was renewed by William for $2,000; that in 1939 the mortgage was renewed by William for $1,741.90. It is the theory of appellant that William reduced the mortgage by approximately $1,300, and paid the taxes on the property during the period he was in possession, and that, equitably, he is entitled to a lien on the property for Earle's proportion of these expenses. There can be no doubt that where a constructive trust is imposed the court should require the beneficiary of the trust to do equity. This rule would normally require Earle to repay the benefits he had received from the conveyance. The evidence shows, however, that William requested the conveyance, and that he promised if Earle would so convey that he, William, intended to and would pay the expenses connected with the property, including payments on the mortgage. The evidence also shows that after the conveyance was made William occupied the premises as his home, and paid Earle nothing for this privilege. It was also shown that there was a second mortgage on the premises in the sum of $750, and that Earle paid $350 of this indebtedness, although he owned but a one-third interest in the property. At the close of respondent's case his counsel informed the court that Earle was willing to do equity by paying the portion of the expenses lawfully chargeable to him. The appellant offered no evidence on this issue at all. He made no attempt to show the amount of the taxes, or the value to his intestate of the use of the premises. No evidence was offered to rebut the reasonable inference that all expenditures by the intestate, so far as respondent's one-third interest was concerned, were intended as a gift. The trial court made no findings on this issue. But, had such a finding been made, inasmuch as the evidence is uncontradicted, the trial court would have had to find a gift was intended, that being the only reasonable inference from the evidence. Under such circumstances, it was not prejudicial error to fail to find on the issue.

KNIGHT and WARD, JJ., concur.

VALENCIA v. SHELL OIL CO. et al.

Civ. 6736.

District Court of Appeal, Third District, California.

July 29, 1943.

Hearing Granted Sept. 23, 1943.

1. Damages 🔑62(1)

A person injured by wrongful act of another must exercise reasonable care to avoid loss or minimize the resulting damages.

2. Damages 🔑62(3)

One whose property is threatened with injury by reason of tort or breach of contract by another must exercise reasonable care to protect property against such loss, and if he fails to do so, he cannot charge the other for loss due to his own neglect.

3. Damages 🔑62(1)

One injured by wrongful act of another is not required to make extraordinary expenditures requiring a disproportionate outlay in endeavoring to guard against consequences of wrongdoer's act, and lack of funds to meet the situation presented may excuse efforts to lessen injury.

4. Appeal and error 🔑931(4)

In view of evidence as to truck owner's assets and absence of evidence of any effort to raise money to pay repair bill, it could not be assumed in support of judgment for loss of use of truck that owner was unable to pay repair bill and obtain truck, in absence of finding to that effect.

5. Damages 🔑62(3)

When truck owner was definitely advised that parties responsible for damage thereto would not pay repair bill of approximately $200 it was his duty to minimize damage by paying repair bill if he was able to do so, though parties responsible for damage had promised to pay for repairs.

6. Contracts 🔑28(3)

In action for loss of use of truck due to refusal of party responsible for damage thereto to pay repair bill, conflicting evidence sustained trial court's finding that party responsible for damage had promised to pay for repairs.

7. Appeal and error 🔑959(3)
Pleading 🔑236(5)

Trial court has discretionary power to permit pleadings to be amended to conform to proof at any stage of trial and even after submission, and such discretion will not be interfered with on appeal except in case of its manifest abuse. Code Civ.Proc. § 470.

8. Pleading 🔑237(3), 253

Where action was tried on theory of loss of business and profits resulting from damage to truck and tort feasor's refusal to pay for repairs, trial court did not abuse its discretion in permitting plaintiff, after submission, to amend complaint so as to conform to proofs and warrant recovery for loss of use of the truck, or in denying defendant's subsequent motion to set aside submission and allow defendant to file amended answer and introduce further evidence upon issues presented by amendments. Code Civ.Proc. § 470.

9. Appeal and error 🔑1201(3)

Where plaintiff after submission of case tried on theory of loss of business and profits was permitted to amend complaint so as to conform to proofs and warrant recovery for loss of use of truck and judgment was reversed and cause remanded for a new trial, trial court may in its discretion permit defendant to amend answer and introduce further evidence upon issues presented by amendments. Code Civ.Proc. § 470.

Appeal from Superior Court, Siskiyou County; Albert F. Ross, Judge.

Action by J. R. Valencia against Shell Oil Company and another to recover for loss of use of plaintiff's truck. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal.

Judgment reversed and a new trial ordered in accordance with opinion.

J. T. Blalock and A. P. Black, both of San Francisco, for appellant.

Oliver J. Carter and Daniel S. Carlton, both of Redding, and J. Everett Barr, of Yreka, for respondent.

PER CURIAM.

On September 27, 1935, as the truck of respondent was being driven on the Pacific Highway between Dunsmuir and Weed in Siskiyou County, it was, without fault of the driver for respondent, hit by a Shellaine tank which fell from a truck driven by an employee of appellant Shell Oil Company. As a result of the accident respondent's truck was damaged so badly that it could not be continued in use until it was repaired, and it was taken to a garage in Weed and repaired at a cost of $222.30. There is some conflict in the record as to who authorized the repairs to be made but we believe it may fairly be inferred from the evidence that appellant Shell Oil Company, shortly after the accident, through its representatives, promised and agreed to pay for the repairs to respondent's truck and also to pay for the hire of a truck to be used by respondent while the damaged truck was being repaired.

The repairs to respondent's truck were completed on October 22, 1935, and Vincent Ferrari, the garage owner, sent the bill for the repairs to appellant oil company and notified respondent that the repairs were completed. The Pacific Indemnity Company, appellant's insurance carrier, on December 3, 1935, wrote a letter to Ferrari, refusing to pay the repair bill unless a release in full were given by respondent. Respondent refused to execute such a release and demanded that appellant pay him $800 for asserted damages to his business. This appellant refused to do, and the truck of respondent remained in the garage of Ferrari.

On January 17, 1936, respondent filed his complaint in which he alleged that he was damaged $1,500 for loss of sales, $10,000 loss on contracts, $222.30 for repair of truck, and $155 for hire of another truck. After issue joined the case went to trial, and on the day the trial commenced, March 18, 1937, appellant paid the amount of the repair bill. On April 30, 1940, more than three years after the trial, the trial court filed its memorandum of decision to the effect that respondent was entitled to judgment for the rental value of the truck from September, 1935, to March, 1937, a period of eighteen months, at $250 per month. Respondent then asked and was granted leave to file an amendment to the complaint to conform to proof, and thereupon filed an amendment which alleged: "that immediately after the damage to plaintiff's said truck said defendant, Shell Oil Company of California, promised said plaintiff that it would, at its cost and expense, repair plaintiff's truck and furnish to plaintiff a truck to be used by plaintiff in his said business while plaintiff's truck was being repaired; and pursuant to said promise said defendant placed plaintiff's truck in a garage at Weed, California, with instructions to the owner of said garage to repair plaintiff's truck; that said defendant, Shell Oil Company of California, in violation of its said promise, wrongfully failed to furnish a truck to plaintiff to use in his business except for a period of three days; that the repairs on plaintiff's said truck were completed on the 22nd day of October, 1935, and the reasonable and actual cost thereof was the sum of $222.30, but said defendant, Shell Oil Company of California, wrongfully refused to pay for said repairs unless and until said plaintiff would execute and deliver to said defendant Shell Oil Company of California a written release unconditionally releasing said defendant Shell Oil Company of California from any and all liability to plaintiff for damages caused by defendants' negligence and carelessness, and that plaintiff refused to execute said release, and said defendant, Shell Oil Company of California, wrongfully failed and refused to pay said repair bill, and the owner of said garage which repaired plaintiff's truck refused to deliver possession thereof to plaintiff until the repair bill was paid; that said defendant, Shell Oil Company of California, failed and refused to pay said repair bill until the date of the trial of this action, to-wit, the 18th day of March, 1937, but by that time said garage owner had made a charge for storage of plaintiff's truck and refused to deliver possession thereof to plaintiff before said storage bill was paid; and plaintiff did not receive possession of his said truck until after the 18th day of March, 1937; that plaintiff was by reason of the negligence and carelessness of said defendants, Shell Oil Company of California, and Harvey L. Foster, and the wrongful failure of said defendant Shell Oil Company of California to pay said repair bill deprived of the use of his said truck for a period of seventeen months and nineteen days, that is, from the 27th day of September, 1935, to the 18th day of March, 1937; that the reasonable rental value and reasonable value of the use of plaintiff's said truck during said time was the sum of $250.00 per month, or a total sum of $4,416.67; that plaintiff was unable during said period of time to obtain for hire a truck to use in his said business in the place and stead of his said General Motors Company truck; that by reason of the premises plaintiff has been damaged in the sum of $4,416.67."

Findings of fact following the language of the complaint as amended were filed, but before judgment was entered appellant moved to set aside the submission and that it be permitted to plead to the subject matter set forth in the amendment and offer proof with reference thereto. This motion was denied by the court, and judgment was thereupon entered in favor of respondent for the sum of $4,416.67, and this appeal is from said judgment.

[1] Appellant makes a vigorous attack upon the judgment. Its first contention is that it was error to award damages to respondent which he could have prevented with reasonable care and at small expense. It argues that respondent could have taken his truck out of the repair shop on October 22, 1935, the date the repairs were completed, by the payment of the comparatively small repair bill of $222.30, and that respondent could not permit the truck to remain in the repair shop for seventeen months thereafter and recover for the loss of use thereof for that period. Appellant cites numerous authorities enunciating the well established rule that it is the duty of a person injured by the wrongful act of another to exercise reasonable care to avoid loss or minimize the resulting damages.

[2] In 8 Cal.Jur. 782, it is stated: "It is the duty of one who knows he is threatened with detriment, either in person, property or business, through another's breach of contract or tort, to do all that he reasonably can to prevent or minimize the damage, and if he negligently fails to do this, he cannot recover for what he might have prevented. In cases of contract, the duty is mutual."

In 15 American Jurisprudence 426, the rule is stated as follows: "He cannot recover for that which he might reasonably have avoided. When it is practicable to minimize the loss and injury by a reasonable outlay of money, it is incumbent upon the party injured to make such outlay, which he may recover as a part of his damages in the action for the breach of the contract."

In Vitagraph, Inc., v. Liberty Theatres Co., 197 Cal. 694, at page 697, 242 P. 709, at page 711, the court said: "It is a recognized rule of law that, in a case where injury or damage to a plaintiff's property is threatened as the result of a tort or breach of contract by another, the duty rests upon the plaintiff to use reasonable care and diligence to protect his property against such threatened loss or injury, and, if he fails to do so, he will not be permitted to charge the defendant for that portion of his loss or injury which was due to plaintiff's own neglect in this behalf. This rule has been repeatedly recognized and applied in this state, as well as elsewhere." Citing Mabb v. Stewart, 147 Cal. 413, 81 P. 1073, and Alaska Salmon Co. v. Standard Box Co., 158 Cal. 567, 112 P. 454.

In Schultz v. Town of Lakeport, 5 Cal. 2d 377, at pages 383, 384, 54 P.2d 1110, at page 1113, 55 P.2d 485, 108 A.L.R. 1168, it is said: "On the other hand, it is undoubtedly a settled proposition that the plaintiff may not recover damages which have accrued by reason of his failure to do everything reasonable in his power to reduce the injuries which would otherwise ensue by a discontinuance of the service. In Holly v. City of Neodesha, supra [88 Kan. 102, 127 P. 616], the dispute arose over the imposition of a $6 or $15 yearly rate for furnishing water to the plaintiff, a difference between the parties of but $9, and the question of the installation of a meter. The plaintiff sought damages of $7,490 and was awarded the sum of $4,550. The case was reversed on the holding of the court that reasonable diligence under the facts required the plaintiff to secure water from the city at once by paying the excess claimed and thereafter suing for the overpayment, and that the plaintiff was entitled therefore to recover only the amount he would have been obliged to pay in securing a reconnection of the service and the amount of damages, if any, probable to the time water could again have been turned on." Citing Mabb v. Stewart, supra; Henrici v. South Feather Land, etc., Co., 177 Cal. 442, 170 P. 1135; Severini v. Sutter-Butte Canal Co., 59 Cal.App. 154, 210 P. 49; and Sargent v. North End Water Co., 190 Cal. 512, 213 P. 33. Also see 25 C.J.S., Damages, § 33, pp. 499–501, and 8 R.C.L. 442

[3] Respondent says, however, that the rule cited in the foregoing is not applicable here; that "the facts do not show that plaintiff by the use of reasonable care could have avoided the consequences of defendants' wrongful refusal to pay the repair bill or that he was able to pay the sum of $222.30 at the time the repairs were completed * * *." He argues that the duty to minimize damages by the payment of money does not run to a person who has not sufficient funds to make the payment required, and cites 25 C.J.S., Damages, § 33, p. 502, where it is stated: "The person injured is not required, however, to make extraordinary expenditures requiring a disproportionate outlay in endeavoring to guard against the consequences of the wrongdoer's act. So plaintiff's lack of funds to meet the situation presented may excuse efforts to lessen the injury." Also 15 Am.Jur. 425, to the effect that "It appears that a want of sufficient funds will excuse an absence of effort to lessen damages." However, it appears from the testimony of respondent that he was the owner and operator of a service station in Weed which had cost him $5,000 to build and against which there was an indebtedness of only $500; that there were two or three payments of $71.48 each still remaining unpaid upon the truck which had been purchased new by him in 1933 and upon which he had installed a tank costing $300 and a meter costing $145, and that he had a credit rating of $600 with the Mileage Gasoline Company in 1935 for the payment on the truck and trailer if he wanted to use it. He did testify, however, as follows:

"Well, when my truck was wrecked, I couldn't make any payments on the truck. I was meeting all the obligations as far as I could, as soon as the truck was wrecked, they turned around and they tied up the truck and my car and my bank account, which left me, well, penniless."

[4, 5] But there is no finding by the trial court that plaintiff was unable to pay the repair bill, and we are cited to no evidence in the record that respondent made any effort to raise the $222.30 to pay same; and in view of his own testimony as to his assets we cannot assume on this appeal that he was not, at any time after the repairs were completed, able to pay the bill and get his truck. While respondent may have been justified in relying upon appellant Shell Oil Company's asserted promise to pay the repair bill up to the time that he was definitely advised that it would not pay it unless respondent gave a release, yet when he was so advised, it was his duty to minimize his damage by paying the repair bill, if he was able to do so.

[6] Appellant next contends that the evidence does not substantiate respondent's claim that it agreed either with respondent or with the garageman to pay for the repair of respondent's truck. As hereinbefore stated, there is some conflict in the record as to who authorized the repairs to be made, but the trial court found that appellant Shell Oil Company did, and there is evidence to sustain said finding.

But, as we view the matter, even though appellant's agents did acknowledge that the damage was due to appellant's negligence and did agree to pay the repair bill, this did not justify respondent in refusing to pay the repair bill and take possession of his truck as soon as he learned that appellant would not pay the bill without the execution of a complete release by respondent. In our opinion respondent could not thereafter continue to permit his truck to remain in the garageman's possession by failure to pay the repair bill of $222.30 and recover from appellant for loss of use of the truck for the subsequent period if he could, with reasonable effort, have raised the money to pay said bill; and as we have already pointed out, the record does not show that he made any effort to do this, and there is no finding that he was financially unable to do so. It was the duty of respondent to use reasonable care to minimize the damages arising from the accident, whether appellant's failure to pay the repair bill was due to a breach of duty arising out of tort or out of contract.

It appears from the record that on the day the trial commenced, which was nearly eighteen months after the accident, appellant paid the repair bill, and that the trial court awarded respondent judgment for loss of use of the truck from the date of the accident to the date the bill was paid. We believe that, in the absence of a finding that plaintiff was unable to pay the repair bill, the judgment was erroneous, and that respondent was not entitled to recover for loss of use of the truck after the time that he was definitely and finally informed that appellant would not pay the repair bill, except, perhaps, for a reasonable time thereafter within which to raise the money to pay said bill, if he could, with reasonable effort, have done so.

Appellant's third contention is that the trial court erred in denying appellant's motion to set aside the submission of the case and to allow appellant to file an amended answer to the amendments to the complaint which the trial court permitted respondent to file, and for permission to introduce further evidence upon the issues presented by said amendments. The original complaint alleged the damage to respondent's truck by appellant's truck and that respondent was damaged in loss of sales to the general public in the sum of $1,500, and in the further sum of $10,000 because he was rendered unable to fulfill his station contracts, and in the further sum of $155 for hire of another truck, and prayed for total damages in the sum of $11,655. As hereinbefore stated, after the trial court filed its memorandum of decision, which was three years after the trial, respondent was granted permission to file the amendment to the complaint hereinbefore set forth. Appellants moved to set aside the submission of the cause and that they be permitted to plead to the subject matter set forth in the amendment and offer proof with reference thereto, which motion was denied.

[7] The theory upon which the trial court permitted the amendment was in order to conform to proof. As is stated in Burrows v. Burrows, 18 Cal.App.2d 275, at page 279, 63 P.2d 1135, at page 1136: "Under the provisions of section 470 of the Code of Civil Procedure, the trial court is invested with discretionary power to permit and even to order the pleadings of the parties to be amended at any stage of the trial of the cause, and even after its submission, so as to make such pleadings conform to the proofs; and it has been uniformly held that this discretion will not be interfered with upon appeal except in cases of its manifest abuse. Graham v. Stewart, 68 Cal. 374, 9 P. 555; Firebaugh v. Burbank, 121 Cal. 186, 53 P. 560; Andrus v. Smith, 133 Cal. 78, 65 P. 320; Stohlman v. Martin, 28 Cal.App. 338, 152 P. 319."

[8] We cannot say that the trial court abused its discretion either in permitting the amendment or in denying appellant's motion; but in view of the fact that the amendment changed the theory upon which the action was tried, we believe that the trial court might well have granted the motion to set aside the submission and have permitted appellant to plead to said amendment and offer further proof. The amendment and the judgment were for loss of use of the truck and the case was tried upon the theory of loss of business and profits. Counsel for respondent at the trial stated: "This is an action for damages to recover for loss of profits that plaintiff suffered as the result of his inability to continue his gasoline distributing business." And counsel stated further: "Well, it is true in this action he is not suing for loss of the truck; he is suing for loss of business." No testimony whatever was introduced upon the question of the value of the loss of use of respondent's truck. The court in its memorandum of decision stated he could not say that respondent's business "was destroyed to the extent to justify compensation" but that respondent's compensation should be the value of the loss of use of the truck. The motion to amend to conform to proof was thereupon made and granted, the motion to set aside the submission was denied, and judgment entered in accordance with the amendment.

[9] In view of the fact that the judgment must be reversed and a new trial ordered, the trial court may, in the exercise of its discretion, see fit to permit appellant to file an amended answer to the complaint as amended, so that any defenses which appellant may have to same may be passed upon in the new trial.

The judgment is reversed and a new trial ordered in accordance with the views herein expressed.

Appeal from Superior Court, Humboldt County; Harry W. Falk, Judge.

Action by Frank W. Beckwith, as trustee in bankruptcy of Gladys L. Lyons against Robert A. Bugbee, administrator of the estate of Cordelia F. Bugbee, deceased, to impress a trust upon certain real property alleged to belong to the bankrupt and in the hands of the defendant, and for an accounting. From a judgment for defendant, plaintiff appeals.

Affirmed.

Fletcher A. Cutler, of San Francisco, for appellant.

Hill & Hill, of Eureka, for respondent.

WARD, Justice.

This action by plaintiff, as trustee in bankruptcy of Gladys L. Lyons (formerly Gladys L. Rothe, a minor), was brought for the purpose of impressing a trust upon certain real property alleged to belong to said minor, and in the hands of defendant Robert A. Bugbee, administrator of the estate of his wife, the minor's mother and guardian, and for an accounting.

The facts of the case are as follows: Upon the death of her husband Cordelia F. Rothe (who subsequently married defendant) was, on September 30, 1901, appointed guardian of the estate of their daughter Gladys, then about two years of age. The estate consisted of one-half the property of the deceased husband and father, the other half being distributed to his wife. Shortly thereafter Mrs. Rothe and her child left the state of Oregon, where her husband's estate had been probated, and wherein she had been declared the guardian of their child, and moved to the home of her parents in California, where she purchased the piece of farm property in dispute. There is testimony that the purchase was made by the child's guardian as an investment for her from funds belonging to her. The particular witnesses who gave evidence in support of this contention are the principal creditors in the bankruptcy proceedings and include plaintiff herein, trustee. It does not actually appear that the mother did not make the purchase from her own funds for herself, or with funds belonging to her and her daughter.

The records fail to show that the mother ever filed an account of her administration as guardian in the state of Oregon, or that she had ever been discharged as such. There is testimony, however, that when Gladys attained the age of eighteen, she and her mother reached a settlement of the guardianship matter in the county in which it was pending; the cash bond was returned to the guardian, and mother and daughter sold real property in Oregon which was owned by them jointly, divided the proceeds and apparently considered the guardianship terminated.

There is evidence that a close bond of affection existed between mother and daughter; that the daughter lived at the home of her mother and step-father until she was twenty-nine years of age without paying anything for room and board; that at different times the mother gave the daughter sums of money for travel, clothes, etc., and advanced to her and her husband money with which to go into business.

The complaint herein specifically demanded judgment that the record title to the property be decreed to Cordelia F. Bugbee, deceased, in trust for her daughter Gladys L. Lyons, the true and lawful owner; that the administrator of the Cordelia F. Bugbee estate be directed to execute a deed to plaintiff as the trustee in bankruptcy of Gladys L. Lyons; that the property be sold for the benefit of the creditors of the bankrupt; that the administrator account for the profits derived from the property from the time of its purchase; that judgment be entered for the sum of $4,273.91, the amount distributed to the minor on the settlement of her father's estate, with interest from the date of the appointment of her mother as guardian.

The court found that Cordelia F. Bugbee was at the time of her death the record owner of the property; that she had not purchased it for the minor with funds belonging to the latter, and was not holding it in trust; that Gladys L. Lyons had not, with knowledge of her interest in the property, and with an intent to conceal the same from her creditors, omitted to include the same in her schedule in bankruptcy. The court further found that the action is barred by the provisions of section 343 of the Code of Civil Procedure.

[1, 2] The specific question involved in the first cause of action is based upon an allegation in the complaint that the farm property referred to was purchased with guardianship funds. The paragraph containing this allegation was found "not true" and "not sustained by the evidence." There is some evidence from which an inference might be drawn that the purchase in whole or in part was so made; also, as stated, that decedent, at about the time of the purchase said that she was buying the property for the child. It is appellant's position that this testimony is credible, probable, uncontradicted and unimpeached, and, therefore, must be accepted as proof of the above mentioned allegation of the complaint. See concurring opinion in Stewart v. Silva, 192 Cal. 405, 221 P. 191. The credibility of witnesses, the accuracy of their recollection, etc., are matters for the trial court to decide. Evidence tending to establish an issuable fact may not be arbitrarily disregarded (Stewart v. Silva, supra, 192 Cal. page 411, 221 P. 191), but in the event other evidence warrants a contrary conclusion, the failure to directly contradict it is unimportant. 27 Cal.Jur. 184; Kelly v. Jones, 290 Ill. 375, 125 N.E. 334, 8 A.L.R. 796; Hinkle v. Southern Pacific Co., 12 Cal.2d 691, 87 P.2d 349; Market Street Ry. Co. v. George, 116 Cal. App. 572, 3 P.2d 41.

[3] In the present case the trial court was called upon to decide not only the matter of the credibility of those appearing as witnesses, but the truthfulness of the statement claimed to have been made to them by decedent that the purchase was made from funds belonging to the minor. It was not entirely the credibility and the recollection of the witnesses over a long period of years that was passed upon, but whether in fact the decedent used the whole or part of the guardianship funds in the purchase of the property.

As against the claim of appellant trustee, the following facts appear: He and his wife, the witnesses to the alleged statement, are the principal creditors of the bankrupt; the time that elapsed between the making of such alleged statement and the trial of the cause was some thirty-seven years; that decedent had money of her own with which to buy the property; that decedent never informed her daughter that guardianship funds were used for the purpose; that the bankrupt did not list the property as an asset in the bankruptcy proceeding; that for thirty-five years the daughter made no claim to an interest in the property, although approximately half of that period elapsed after she attained her majority; that the guardianship bond was refunded to the guardian; that thereafter the mother and daughter sold certain property in Oregon and divided the proceeds; that during the many years the daughter lived with the mother she was supported, educated and received numerous sums of money from her for traveling and other expenses, the amount aggregating a sum greatly in excess of that received by her from her father's estate, and that after the daughter's marriage the mother borrowed money to assist her and her husband in conducting a hotel business. There is no evidence to support appellant's contention that if there was forgiveness on the part of the daughter of an indebtedness of the mother such forgiveness constituted a fraud on the creditors of the bankrupt, and there is no renunciation of a legacy such as would bring the case within the holding of Estate of Kalt, 16 Cal.2d 807, 108 P.2d 401, 133 A.L.R. 1424.

[4] In brief, there is no evidence which would compel the trial court to determine that the funds of the minor had been used in the purchase of the property. The evidence supports the claim of respondent that there had been a settlement between the guardian and ward many years before the indebtedness of the bankrupt to plaintiff or to his wife was incurred. Under the circumstances, the invocation of Code of Civil Procedure, § 343 to the first cause of action was proper.

[5] What has been said herein disposes of any contention that subsequent to the ward attaining her majority any funds were held in trust for her by her mother, and therefore the second and third causes of action lack foundation. The present proceeding shows expenditures for the benefit of the daughter, as evidenced by checks, etc., greatly in excess of the amount of the trust fund. An order directing a further accounting would merely result in delay in settling the estate of decedent without possibility of benefit to plaintiff.

[6, 7] If there was no direct legal repudiation by decedent of a trusteeship, the continued acquiescence of the daughter worked an estoppel. Unless the appellant trustee in bankruptcy proved fraud—which does not appear, he is in no better position to maintain the action than the daughter. There is evidence showing repudiation, as the court impliedly found, and acquiescence in such repudiation many years before the present action was brought.

Some inconsistencies appear in the findings as to certain allegations of the complaint being true or untrue, the effect of which was to find certain conceded facts to be false, but there is no doubt of the correctness of the finding that plaintiff failed to establish that the property in question had been purchased with guardianship funds, and this is the main question in the case.

We agree, under all the circumstances of the case, that the action was barred by the statute of limitations under the provisions of Code of Civil Procedure, § 343.

The judgment is affirmed.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Francisco County; Franklin A. Griffin, Judge.

Action by Henrietta Leplat against Raley Wiles and others for injuries sustained by plaintiff when struck by defendant's automobile. From an order denying plaintiff's motion for judgment notwithstanding verdict as against the defendant named, plaintiff appeals. On motion to dismiss the appeal.

Appeal dismissed.

Philander B. Beadle and Samuel Vartan, both of San Francisco, for plaintiff and appellant Henrietta Leplat.

John J. Taheny, of San Francisco, for defendant and respondent Raley Wiles.

PETERS, Presiding Justice.

Defendant Wiles moves to dismiss an appeal by plaintiff from an order denying her motion for judgment notwithstanding the verdict. The motion is on the ground that the appeal was taken too late. The facts are as follows:

Plaintiff brought an action for damages for personal injuries received by her when struck by an automobile driven by one Rosati. Wiles was joined as a defendant on the allegation that he permitted Rosati to drive the car. The jury, on March 10, 1942, returned a verdict against Rosati, but in favor of Wiles. Thereafter, the following occurred:

March 10, 1942—plaintiff moved for judgment against Wiles notwithstanding the verdict, reserving the right to move for a new trial if the motion were denied. The order denying the motion was entered the same day.

March 12, 1942—judgment entered.

March 16, 1942—plaintiff filed a notice of motion for a new trial against Wiles.

April 21, 1942—motion for a new trial granted as to Wiles.

May 15, 1942—plaintiff filed her notice of appeal from the order denying her motion for judgment notwithstanding the verdict. It is this appeal defendant seeks to dismiss.

May 21, 1942—defendant appealed from the order granting the new trial.

Section 963, sub. 2, of the Code of Civil Procedure specifically includes an order "denying a motion for judgment notwithstanding the verdict" in cases where a jury trial is a matter of right, among the appealable orders. Section 939 of the Code of Civil Procedure provides that: "An appeal may be taken from any * * * order * * * from which an appeal lies under any provision of this code, * * * within sixty days from the entry of said * * * order." The time limit thus fixed is jurisdictional.

Defendant urges that, inasmuch as the order here appealed from was entered March 10th, and the appeal was not taken until May 15th, more than sixty days thereafter, the appeal must be dismissed. Although plaintiff filed no written opposition to the motion as required by the rules, at the hearing he urged that under § 629 of the Code of Civil Procedure his time for appeal was extended by implication until after the determination of the motion for a new trial. Section 629 provides that a motion for judgment notwithstanding the verdict must be made before entry of judgment, and may be made, as it was in the instant case, in the alternative, reserving to the moving party the right to move for a new trial if the motion is denied. The section further provides that in such a case the trial court on the motion for a new trial, or the appellate court on appeal from the judgment or order denying the motion for judgment notwithstanding, may order judgment notwithstanding the verdict to be entered, "where a new trial was denied." But "where a new trial is granted * * * the order denying the motion for judgment notwithstanding the verdict shall not be reviewed on appeal, unless the adverse party appeal from the order granting a new trial, in which case the order denying judgment notwithstanding the verdict may be reviewed on appeal."

[1] Plaintiff argues that if she must appeal within sixty days from the entry of the order denying her motion for judgment notwithstanding the verdict, she will be appealing during a period in which the trial court on the motion for a new trial still retains jurisdiction to grant the same relief sought by the appeal. She also points out that if she be required to appeal during the sixty days after entry of the order denying her motion for judgment notwithstanding the verdict, that appeal may be defeated if the trial court should grant her motion for a new trial, and if the adverse party should fail to appeal from that order. There can be no doubt that these results will follow if defendant is correct in his contentions. If there were any room for interpretation the results flowing from defendant's interpretation would be a reasonable ground for refusing to reach the result desired by him. But there is no room for interpretation. Section 939 provides that the appeal must be filed within sixty days "from the entry" of the order. No exceptions are there set forth. It is that section that deals with the time within which appeals must be taken from orders. Section 629 does not purport to deal with the time within which an appeal from an order must be taken. To hold that § 629 extends, by implication, the period as set forth in § 939 would not be to interpret, but to legislate.

[2, 3] It is true that this conclusion creates a most anomalous and confusing situation. Normally, an appeal vests jurisdiction in the appellate court. But in the situation under discussion a party is required to appeal during a period in which the trial court retains jurisdiction on the motion for a new trial to grant the identical relief sought by the appeal. Moreover, if an appeal from the order denying the motion for judgment notwithstanding the verdict is seasonably filed it may be defeated by the trial court granting the motion for a new trial and the other party failing to appeal from that order. The other side has sixty days from the date of entry of the order granting the new trial to appeal. Until that time expires the party appealing from the order denying his motion for a judgment notwithstanding the verdict cannot possibly know whether he can have his appeal from that order heard by the appellate court, but is compelled to appeal therefrom many days before that date. Thus, a party is required to appeal before the order from which he appeals is final. However, absolute finality of a judgment or order is not an indispensable requirement of appealability. Whether an order or judgment is appealable, and at what stage of the proceedings the order or judgment becomes appealable, are matters of legislative determination. The legislature having spoken, and there being no room for interpretation, the appellate courts, through the guise of interpretation, should not attempt to amend the statute by judicial mandate. The clarification required must come through the legislative and not through the judicial process.

It will be noted that defendant has appealed from the order granting the motion for a new trial. That appeal is now pending. At this time we express no opinion on the question as to whether, in view of the last sentence of § 629 above quoted, the validity of the order denying the motion for judgment notwithstanding the verdict may be passed upon on that appeal.

The appeal from the order denying the motion for judgment notwithstanding the verdict is dismissed.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Thurmond Clarke, Judge.

Mandamus proceeding by Gertrude Jenkins, a minor, by Estelle Watt as guardian of the person and estate of the minor, against the City of Los Angeles and others to require granting to the petitioner of a pension under city charter, as a child of a deceased who had retired as a member of the fire department of the city. From an adverse judgment, defendants appeal.

Affirmed.

Ray L. Chesebro, City Atty., Robert J. Stahl, Deputy City Atty., and Edward J. Olstyn, Deputy City Atty., all of Los Angeles, for appellants.

R. Lee Heath, Bodkin, Breslin & Luddy, and E. E. Hitchcock, all of Los Angeles, for respondent.

SHINN, Acting Presiding Justice.

This is an appeal by the Board of Pension Commissioners of the City of Los Angeles, and its members, from a judgment in mandamus ordering them to grant to petitioner, Gertrude Jenkins, a minor, a pension under section 183 of Article XVII of the Charter of the City of Los Angeles, as a child of Charles S. Jenkins, deceased, who retired as a member of the fire department of said city on August 1, 1923.

Respondent herein was born January 3, 1926, to said Charles S. Jenkins and Estelle Olme, who were never married to each other. She later, by adoption, became a legitimate child of her father.

Two points are urged on the appeal, namely, that no child of a city pensioner, born after his retirement, is entitled to receive a pension, and further that a child born illegitimate but adopted by its father is not entitled to a pension under the city charter, regardless of when it was born.

Section 183 of the city charter provides in substance as follows: "Whenever any member of the Fire or Police Department shall die * * * after retirement * * * then an annual pension shall be paid in equal monthly installments to his widow, or child or children, or dependent parent or parents * * * Said pension shall be paid to the widow during her lifetime or until she remarries, and thereafter * * * to the legally appointed guardian of the child or children of such deceased member until such child or children shall have attained the age of eighteen years, or to his child or children should there be no widow until such child or children shall have attained the age of eighteen years * *."

[1] We do not consider either of appellants' contentions to be sustainable. As to the first contention, we see no reason for holding that the child or children who have pension rights are those only who are in being at the time of the retirement of their father, to the exclusion of those born afterward. No such limitation is found in the charter, nor can the words which would be necessary to create that limitation be read into the charter under the guise of interpretation. From all that we find there, it would appear that the framers of its pertinent provisions had in mind any child or children living at the time of the death of the retired pensioner, without distinction between those born before and those born after retirement. The section would be no clearer to us if it referred in so many words to children born after retirement as well as to those born before. The word "child" as used means to us any child, and the word "children" means all children. They could have no other meaning unless the charter defines them, which it does not. No good reason has been suggested to us why the plan of the charter should have embraced a purpose to discourage the birth of children to city firemen after their retirement by depriving them of the right to receive their father's pension or to share it with the children born before his retirement. However that may be, no such purpose found expression in the charter.

[2] Upon the second point, we do not deem it necessary to discuss the cases cited by appellant in which it has been held that the words "child" or "children" refer to legitimate children, in the absence of words indicating that illegitimates are included and which express the thought that any tendency toward recognition of claims of illegitimate children would be a bad one. We may concede that illegitimates would have no pension rights under the charter. But at the time of the death of Charles S. Jenkins, respondent herein was his legitimate child by virtue of acts of adoption as found by the court and the force of the statute. The court found that respondent was publicly acknowledged by her father, taken into his family with the consent of his wife, and otherwise treated as if she were a legitimate child, and that she was duly adopted as his child. Section 230 of the Civil Code reads as follows: "The father of an illegitimate child, by publicly acknowledging it as his own, receiving it as such, with the consent of his wife, if he is married, into his family, and otherwise treating it as if it were a legitimate child, thereby adopts it as such; and such child is thereupon deemed for all purposes legitimate from the time of its birth. The foregoing provisions of this chapter do not apply to such an adoption." This has been the law for three-quarters of a century and it is not to be presumed that in adopting their charter the people of Los Angeles held an unsympathetic attitude toward this humane policy of the state.

The results which follow adoption of children by strangers under adoption statutes have been frequently stated. In Estate of Newman, 1888, 75 Cal. 213, at page 219, 16 P. 887, 7 Am.St.Rep. 146, the court construed the provision of section 228 of the Civil Code that the adopted child and the person adopting "shall sustain towards each other the legal relation of parent and child, and have all the rights and be subject to all the duties of that relation" and held that one of the rights acquired by the child was that of inheriting the estate of the adopting parent. In Estate of Jobson, 1912, 164 Cal. 312, 128 P. 938, 43 L.R.A.,N.S., 1062, it was held that by virtue of the same language the adopting parent is entitled to inherit the estate of an adopted child. These are but some of the rights of the legal relation of parent and child established by adoption. An adoption under section 230 of the Civil Code is no less potent. The declaration of the section that upon adoption by its father of a child born illegitimate, "such child is thereupon deemed for all purposes legitimate from the time of its birth" is as forceful and all-inclusive as words could make it. We do not doubt that the section was intended to mean just what it says. It is based upon an act of March 31, 1870 (Stats. 1869–70, p. 530, sec. 9), and our code commissioners, in speaking of its inclusion in the code, said: "This provision, like the rest, is new, but is so manifestly just, and the present state of the law so unmerciful to innocent children, that it is presumed that no objection will be made to the change. * * *" In Wolf v. Gall, 1916, 32 Cal.App. 286, 293, 163 P. 346, 349, 350, after quoting the above the court further said of section 230: "This is perhaps the most liberal of all enactments removing the disabilities of children born out of wedlock" and the court later, on the same page, made reference to the "increasingly liberal and humane tendency of legislation in respect to illegitimate children."

[3] In Estate of Wardell, 1881, 57 Cal. 484, it was held that an illegitimate child is the "child" of its mother within the meaning of a statute preserving rights of children omitted from wills of their parents, because the word is to be given its statutory rather than its common-law meaning. And if because of its statutory right to inherit from its mother an illegitimate is her "child," upon what reasoning could we conclude that such a one is not the "child" of its father after its adoption by him? Any reason that might be advanced would be irreconcilable with the provisions of section 230. When adoption takes place, the eyes of the law are closed to the former status; so must the former status of respondent remain unseen to the Board of Pension Commissioners.

The judgment is affirmed.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Everett C. McKeage, Judge.

Action by O. D. Adams against the American President Lines, Ltd., for injuries suffered in fall on stairway. From an order granting a new trial after verdict for plaintiff, plaintiff appeals.

Reversed.

KNIGHT, Justice.

Plaintiff was employed as a seaman aboard the S. S. President Pierce, and while carrying a case of canned goods on his shoulder up a stairway in the regular course of his duties, he slipped and fell, and was injured. The accident happened while the ship was four days out from San Francisco, on its return from the Orient, and plaintiff brought this action for damages against his employer under a federal statute known as the Jones Act, 46 U.S.C.A. § 688. The cause of action was based on allegations to the effect that plaintiff's injuries were caused by his employer's negligence in failing to maintain the stairway in a safe condition, the particular charge made being that it failed to keep the steps free from refuse and other foreign substances, as the result of which plaintiff slipped on an orange peel which had been carelessly discarded on the stairway by a fellow employee. The action was tried before a jury and defendant moved for a directed verdict. The motion was denied and the jury returned a verdict in favor of plaintiff for $1,750. Defendant then moved for judgment in its favor notwithstanding the verdict, and the motion was denied. Judgment was entered on said verdict in favor of plaintiff; but the trial court thereafter granted defendant's motion for a new trial; and from the order made in that behalf plaintiff appeals.

Insufficiency of the evidence was not specified in the order as a ground for granting the motion; consequently "it will be conclusively presumed that the order was not based upon that ground". § 657, Code Civ. Proc. The order recites merely that the motion was granted upon the grounds of "error in law at the trial and excepted to by the defendant," and in support of the order defendant contends that the trial court erred in giving and refusing to give certain instructions, and in denying defendant's motions for directed verdict and for judgment notwithstanding the verdict. It is our conclusion that the order is not sustainable on either of those grounds.

The following are the essential facts: The ship had four decks, designated as decks "A", "B", "C", and "D". The dining room for passengers was located on B deck and the engine crew and sailors ate in a messroom on C deck. Plaintiff was working as a galley scullion and as part of his daily duties he was required to bring up food-stuffs from the storeroom located on D deck to the galley on B deck. The food supplies kept in this storeroom were dry stores, such as canned goods, beans, cereals, etc.—no fresh fruits or vegetables; and in going to and from the storeroom it was necessary to use this particular stairway. It ran from C deck only to the storeroom on D deck, and was used exclusively by members of the crew, the passengers not being allowed below B deck. On the morning of the accident, about 10:15, plaintiff went down this stairway and got from the storeroom a case of canned vegetables, containing six one-gallon cans, each weighing about 7½ pounds. He placed the case on his right shoulder, held it with his right hand, and using his left hand to hold on to a railing on the left side of the stairway he started up the stairs to C deck. When he reached the fourth or fifth step from the top his foot slipped from under him and as he fell he put his right hand out in front of him to protect his face. The case of vegetables fell on his hand, the edge of one of the cans severely lacerating and breaking the bone of his right little finger. It was a comminuted fracture and the finger was "hanging off." He went immediately to the office of the ship's doctor, but the doctor was not in his office at the time and plaintiff waited for him for about 45 minutes. The doctor then stitched the finger together with two stitches and placed a metal clamp on the finger to hold it. The finger was then bandaged with a splint to hold it in place, but afterwards it became infected, and he was still suffering from the effects thereof at the time of trial. Immediately after plaintiff had fallen he looked back down the stairway to see what had caused him to slip, and he saw a large piece of orange peel that had been stepped on; and as soon as the doctor had finished bandaging his finger plaintiff went back to the stairway, picked up the orange peel and threw it into a garbage receptacle which was placed on C deck about four feet from the head of the stairway. The evidence supporting the implied finding of the jury that the presence of the orange peel on the stairway was due to the carelessness of some fellow employee was in substance as follows: Every day fresh fruit was placed in the crew's messroom on C deck, and it was the custom of the crew, after finishing their meals, to take the fruit out on C deck and eat it while standing around talking with each other. This was done with the knowledge of the company. The men had been instructed to put any refuse in the receptacles which had been placed on the deck for that purpose, but it was common for them to throw the fruit peels and other refuse on the deck or down the stairway. Sometimes this was done deliberately, and at other times in aiming for the garbage receptacle they would miss it and leave the refuse lying on the deck, and afterwards it would be kicked down the stairway, either purposely or accidentally; and there is evidence showing that the ship's officers were aware of this practice. In this regard the steward in charge of the storeroom testified that many times he had seen and picked up refuse on this stairway leading to the storeroom which members of the crew had dropped on the deck and then kicked so that it had fallen on the stairs; also that many times he had seen refuse and peelings lying on C deck close to the stairway. The doctor also testified that many times during the course of his daily inspection of the ship he had picked up pieces of peeling or debris lying on C deck, and other witnesses testified that they had on many occasions seen orange peelings and other refuse on C deck in the vicinity of the garbage receptacle and on the stairway leading to the storeroom. Several members of the crew testified that on this particular morning they had made their regular inspection of the ship between 10 and 11 o'clock, and that they did not remember having seen any orange peel on the stairway; and one of them testified that shortly after the accident he went to the stairway for the purpose of seeing if there was any orange peel there and that he found none. But the testimony so given at best could do no more than raise a conflict with that given by plaintiff. The jury's determination of that issue is therefore conclusive. Furthermore, the evidence definitely shows that the orange peel could not have been discarded by any of the passengers, because passengers were not allowed to go below B deck and consequently had no access to C deck or the stairway in question; nor is there the slightest evidence from which the inference may be drawn that the presence of the orange peel on the stairway was due to some malicious act.

With respect to the matter of the instructions, the trial court gave several upon the doctrine that an employer is responsible for the negligent acts of an employee committed within the scope and in the course of his employment. Defendant concedes that the doctrine was correctly stated in some of them, but three of those given are challenged upon the ground that they omitted the qualification that in order to hold the employer liable it must be shown that the negligent act of the employee was committed within the scope and in the course of the employment. The first of the three instructions so given was as follows: "You are instructed that the master or captain of the ship had the authority and the duty to maintain discipline aboard ship and to issue such orders as were reasonably necessary to keep the stairways and passageways safe for use by the employees. You are also instructed that it was the duty of the officers and crew to obey all reasonable orders and commands issued by or under the authority of the master or captain pertaining to the safety of stairways and passageways. If you find from the evidence that any officer or member of the crew negligently deposited or negligently caused to be deposited, a fruit peeling on the stairway in question, whether because of the absence of a rule or in disobedience of a rule prohibiting the same, and if you further find that the stairway in question was thereby made unsafe for use by the plaintiff, then you are instructed that under such circumstances, if you so find, the defendant is liable in damages for injury, if any, proximately caused plaintiff thereby." The other two instructions complained of are couched in different language, but the qualification above referred to was omitted therefrom, and defendant contends, therefore, that all three were prejudicially erroneous.

Plaintiff's answer to defendant's contention is two-fold: first, that the challenged instructions were not erroneous for the reason that as a matter of law the evidence established that the negligent act of the employee which caused plaintiff to slip and fall was committed by said employee within the scope and in the course of his employment; and secondly, that in any event the jury could not have been misled by the omission complained of because it was embodied in other instructions which the trial court gave. Both points, in our opinion, are well taken.

[1-3] As shown by the authorities cited in plaintiff's briefs, where an employee is required to live or board on the premises where he is employed, either by the terms of the contract or the necessities of his work, the performance of such acts on his part as are necessary to his life, comfort and convenience, although strictly personal to himself and not acts of service, are held to be incidental to the service, and therefore are deemed to fall within the scope and in the course of his employment, even though he is not actually performing the particular tasks for which he was employed. Union Oil Co. v. Industrial Acc. Comm., 211 Cal. 398, 295 P. 513; Whiting Mead Co. v. Industrial Acc. Comm., 178 Cal. 505, 173 P. 1105, 5 A.L.R. 1518; see, also, Campbell on Workmen's Compensation, Vol. 1, §§ 196, 208. And in the cases of persons employed aboard ship, it is held that such employment "includes not only the performance of the physical tasks required of him, but also includes the performance of such ordinary tasks for his own comfort and convenience as are incident to and necessarily connected with the employment" (States S. S. Co. v. Berglann, 9 Cir., 41 F.2d 456, 457); and that this includes the taking of meals, sleeping, resting, etc. Charles R. Davidson & Co. v. M'Robb, [1918] L.R.App.Cas. 304, 327. Here it is admitted that the fruit was supplied by the employer to the members of the crew as part of their regular meals, and that they were permitted to eat the fruit outside on C deck; and the uncontroverted evidence shows that the piece of orange peel on which plaintiff slipped had been carelessly discarded by one of the crew while eating the fruit on C deck. Therefore, applying the foregoing legal principles to the above uncontroverted facts, it appears as a matter of law that the negligent act of the employee was committed within the scope and in the course of his employment.

Defendant does not claim that the eating of the fruit would not be in the course of the employment, but contends that the instructions were not predicated upon eating the fruit, but upon the disposal of the refuse from it, and that the disposal of the peel was not necessarily incidental to eating the fruit; but there is no evidence that the disposition of the peel was intentionally wanton or malicious, and obviously it was as much incidental to the employment as the eating of the fruit itself, and the discarding of the refuse from the fruit must have been contemplated by the employer because garbage receptacles were placed on C deck and the crew was instructed to place the refuse therein.

[4] Defendant states that in determining whether the employee "was acting in the scope of his employment the jury should have been permitted to consider the fact that he ate the fruit in an unauthorized place and likewise disposed of the refuse in an unauthorized and forbidden place, neither of which situations were covered by the instructions." The uncontroverted facts of the case show, however, that the custom of the men to eat the fruit out on C deck was carried on with the approval of the ship's officers, and the fact that the crew may have violated instructions as to the disposal of the refuse could not have the effect of relieving defendant of liability, because it has been held in numerous cases that an employer is liable for acts of his employee within the scope of the latter's employment notwithstanding such acts are done in violation of rules, orders or instructions of the employer. 35 Am.Jur. p. 993; Ruppe v. City of Los Angeles, 186 Cal. 400, 199 P. 496; Johnson v. Monson, 183 Cal. 149, 190 P. 635; Griffin v. Industrial Acc. Comm., 19 Cal. App.2d 727, 66 P.2d 176; Dowdall v. Gilmore Oil Co. Ltd., 18 Cal. App.2d 1, 62 P.2d 1051.

[5, 6] Furthermore, it is apparent, as plaintiff points out, that defendant was not prejudiced by the challenged instructions because the omitted element was covered by the following instructions which were given to the jury: "You are instructed that an employer is responsible for the acts or omissions of his employee, agent or servant committed by such employee, agent or servant within the course and scope of such employment, agency or service." "The negligence of an officer or employee of the defendant committed while such officer or employee is engaged within the course and scope of his employment is in law the negligence of the defendant." "You are instructed that any negligence committed by an officer or employee of defendant cannot be imputed to such defendant unless it be shown that such negligence was committed by such officer or employee while engaged within the course and scope of his employment." (Italics added.) Defendant contends that the instructions complained of were formula instructions and the error in omitting the above element could not be cured by the giving of other general instructions. Doubtless such is the general rule, but there are several well recognized qualifications thereto, one of them being that where the so-called formula instructions, when separated from the other instructions given, omits an element essential to recovery by plaintiff, but the very method of giving the so-called formula instructions indicates plainly that they were not intended, nor did they purport to state the several elements essential to a verdict as such in detail, but instead, those matters are made the subject of separate specific instructions, the giving of the so-called formula instructions does not constitute prejudicial error. Brower v. Arnstein, 126 Cal.App. 291, 14 P.2d 863. And such was the case here, for at the beginning of the court's charge and as part thereof the court stated: "If in these instructions any rule, direction or idea be stated in varying ways, no emphasis thereon is intended by the Court, and none must be inferred by you. For that reason, you are not to single out any sentences, or any individual instruction or portion thereof, and ignore the others, but you are to consider all the instructions as a whole, and to regard each instruction in the light of the other instructions." (Italics added.) Moreover, as said in Reuter v. Hill, 136 Cal.App. 67, 28 P.2d 390, which is cited with approval in Klenzendorf v. Shasta, etc., School Dist., 4 Cal.App.2d 164, 40 P.2d 878, there is a disposition to relax the rigid application of the rule regarding formula instructions when the record fails to show a miscarriage of justice, and that, in our opinion, is the situation here. As will be seen, the instructions above quoted were clear and correct statements of the law; and that being so, it cannot be fairly said that the jury was misled by the omission of that element from those challenged or that the defendant was prejudiced thereby.

[7] Likewise without merit is defendant's contention that the trial court erred in refusing to give defendant's proposed instruction No. 7, for the reason that the subject matter thereof was covered by other instructions which the court gave, especially those appearing on page 238 of the transcript.

[8-13] Defendant's second major point, that the trial court erred in denying its motions for a directed verdict and for judgment notwithstanding the verdict, is based largely upon the contention that the evidence fails to show that the negligent act of the employee in discarding the orange peel was committed within the scope and in the course of his employment. This contention has already been disposed of adversely to defendant's view in the consideration of the matter of the instructions. It is true that most of the cases involving the question as to whether a particular act was committed or performed by an employee within the scope and in the course of his employment are cases arising out of the application of the Workmen's Compensation Act, St.1937, p. 265, § 3201 et seq.; but as will be seen from the following cases, the same rules of measurement are used in determining that question in cases of respondeat superior. Curcic v. Nelson Display Co., 19 Cal.App.2d 46, 64 P.2d 1153; Breland v. Traylor Eng., etc., Co., 52 Cal.App.2d 415, 126 P.2d 455; Richards v. Metropolitan Life Ins. Co., 19 Cal.2d 236, 120 P.2d 650. Nor was it necessary for the plaintiff to establish that the defendant had actual or constructive knowledge of the presence of the orange peel on the stairway. Such proof is necessary only where the dangerous condition is brought about by natural wear and tear, or third persons, or acts of God, or by other causes which are not due to the negligence of the owner or his employees. Where, as here, the dangerous condition is brought about by the employees acting within the scope of their employment, knowledge of the condition is imputed to the defendant as a matter of law. Hatfield v. Levy Brothers, 18 Cal.2d 798, 117 P.2d 841; Lorenz v. Santa Monica, etc., School Dist., 51 Cal.App.2d 393, 124 P.2d 846. Therefore the court would not have been legally justified in granting either of defendant's motions on that ground.

The remaining points urged by defendant in support of the trial court's order are incidental to those already discussed, and do not require special attention.

The order is reversed.

MARKS, Justice.

This is an appeal from a judgment restraining defendants from transferring or disposing of funds derived from the sale of raisins in a surplus commodity pool and ordering Commodity Credit Corporation to pay to plaintiff, and those growers of raisin grapes occupying a similar position with him, the sum of $145,166.04 after deducting attorneys fees and other expenses of suit.

The judgment followed the granting of a motion to strike considerable portions of the answers of Commodity Credit Corporation and of other answering defendants, and a motion for judgment on the pleadings. This necessitates a rather careful examination of the pleadings of the parties.

To properly understand the pleadings a brief summary of the purposes of the Agricultural Proration Act of 1933, Stats. 1933, p. 1969, as amended, seems advisable.

The act contains a legislative declaration of its purpose which is to prevent agricultural waste by removing from the competitive market the surplus of an agricultural product which can not be marketed profitably in the usual channels of trade, and also a declaration that the act was passed under the police powers of the State to promote the general welfare.

It provides for an Agricultural Prorate Commission of the State, its members to be appointed by the Governer, by and with the consent and approval of the Senate. This Commission is given power to permit the organization of Proration Zones in which the marketing of a particular agricultural commodity may be regulated. Each Zone must have a Proration Program Committee which, after a hearing before a duly called meeting of the agriculturists in the Zone affected thereby, may propose and adopt a marketing program for the commodity, the marketing of which is to be regulated. The marketing program cannot go into effect until approved by the Agricultural Prorate Commission. After its adoption it becomes binding on every producer of the commodity in the Zone and must be followed by all of them. Penalties are provided for any disobedience.

Speaking very generally, the program should determine the total of the regulated commodity to be produced in a crop year, the percentage of that total that can be marketed profitably in the usual and ordinary channels of trade, and the percentage that cannot be so marketed without flooding the market and breaking the market price. The percentage of the commodity that can be absorbed by the market is left under the free control of the producers who may market and dispose of that proportion of their crops as they please without any restrictions. As the subject of the proration program in this case is sun-dried, or partly sun-dried, raisins we will refer to this portion of the crop as free raisins. The balance of the crop that cannot be absorbed in the usual channels of trade is designated as surplus which must be delivered to the Proration Program Committee of the Zone and put into what is called a stabilization pool, and must be held, cared for and disposed of by that committee so that it will not be marketed or disposed of in competition with the portion of the crop designated as free raisins. It will be necessary to consider in considerable detail the powers of the Proration Program Committee in connection with the disposition of surplus raisins in the stabilization pool in a subsequent part of this opinion.

With this brief explanation of the purposes of the Agricultural Proration Act, and the machinery set up to carry out those purposes, we may proceed to a consideration of the pleadings of the parties.

The complaint was filed on March 14, 1940. The events leading up to the cause of action occurred in 1938 and 1939, so references made to statutes will be to those laws in effect at that time, unless otherwise indicated.

Sun-Maid Raisin Growers of California, a corporation, was originally joined as a defendant, but the action was dismissed as to it so no further reference need be made to it.

Paragraphs 1 to 5, inclusive, of the complaint allege that Raisin Prorate Zone No. 1 (hereinafter called the Zone) was established and organized under the provisions of the Agricultural Proration Act, Stats. 1933, p. 1969, as amended; that it included the producers of raisins in Fresno, Kings, Kern, Tulare and other adjacent counties; that certain named persons comprise the membership of the Proration Program Committee of the Zone; that Raisin Proration Association is a corporation organized under the laws of California; that the members of the Proration Program Committee of the Zone compose its board of directors; that Commodity Credit Corporation is a corporation organized under the laws of the United States for the purpose of making commodity loans and other financing.

Paragraph six alleges that, in September, 1938, pursuant to provisions of the Agricultural Proration Act, the Proration Program Committee of the Zone adopted a program for raisins for the 1938–1939 marketing season, which required the producers of raisins in the Zone to deliver twenty per cent of their raisins to the Zone to constitute a stabilization pool of surplus raisins to be withheld from the usual channels of trade and commerce in competition with the balance of the raisin crop which we will call the free raisins.

Paragraph seven alleges that plaintiff was a grower and producer of raisins in the Zone and delivered approximately thirty-five tons of raisins, which represented twenty per cent of his crop, to the stabilization pool as his surplus raisins; that other growers of raisins in the Zone delivered into the stabilization pool about fifty-two thousand tons of surplus raisins.

Paragraph nine alleges that the Zone has raisins delivered into the stabilization pool by the various growers have been commingled; that plaintiff and the other growers contributing surplus raisins to the stabilization pool are beneficial owners of those raisins and of any funds derived from the sale thereof which were held in trust by the Proration Program Committee as trustee.

Paragraph nine alleges that the zone has delivered the surplus raisins composing the stabilization pool into various warehouses and that Raisin Proration Association and other named defendants, as agents of the Zone, are in possession of parts of them and of funds derived from sales.

Paragraph ten alleges that Raisin Proration Association, the Zone, and other defendants negotiated a loan by Commodity Credit Corporation to such producers of raisins in the Zone who desired to make loans of $50 per ton on free raisins; that various producers of raisins in the Zone secured such loans from Commodity Credit Corporation in amounts that exceeded the total sum of $500,000.

Paragraph eleven alleges, on information and belief, that Raisin Proration Association and its board of directors, and the Zone and its Proration Program Committee purported and attempted to pledge to Commodity Credit Corporation all of the raisins in the stabilization pool as security for the loans made to the various producers of raisins in the Zone; that plaintiff did not consent to, approve of, or ratify such pledge; that it was not consented to, authorized or ratified by plaintiff's co-owners of the raisins in the stabilization pool; that plaintiff borrowed no money from Commodity Credit Corporation or from any other defendant and has neither pledged nor hypothecated any of his raisins in the stabilization pool.

Paragraph twelve alleges that Commodity Credit Corporation claims the right to hold all of the raisins placed in the stabilization pool, by reason of the pledge, to secure repayment of the loans made by it to the various raisin growers; that the other defendants acquiesced in that claim and unless enjoined will co-operate with Commodity Credit Corporation in holding such raisins and the proceeds from their sale as security for the loans to the individual growers; that the Zone has caused a portion of the stabilization pool raisins to be sold and the proceeds to be paid to Commodity Credit Corporation to apply on the loans made to individual growers; that contracts for the sale of other raisins in the stabilization pool have been made and that the proceeds will be paid over to Commodity Credit Corporation unless defendants are enjoined from so doing; that the raisins remaining in the stabilization pool amount to more than ten thousand tons; that large balances remain unpaid on the loans to the individual growers and cannot be paid even by the sale of all the raisins, including those in the stabilization pool, as the loans to the individual growers were made "without recourse".

We quote paragraph thirteen of the complaint as follows: "That plaintiff brings this action for and in behalf of himself and all of his co-owners of said Stabilization Pool similarly situated, to protect and conserve the raisins, funds, and other assets of said pool against the aforementioned threatened and illegal acts of the said defendants aforementioned; that the total value of the raisins and other assets comprising said pool was, and is, largely in excess of one hundred thousand dollars ($100,000); that it is necessary, and meet and proper, for plaintiff to bring this action to protect said pool and its said assets, because the officers and agents thereof have failed to do so, and will not do so, but to the contrary intend to, and will, unless enjoined, fully cooperate with the defendant Commodity Loan Corporation in its aforementioned illegal and unauthorized effort and plan to deprive plaintiff and the other beneficial owners of said pool of their property and rights as aforesaid."

The answer of Commodity Credit Corporation admitted the allegations of paragraphs one to five, inclusive, of the complaint and added the allegations that Raisin Proration Association is a nonprofit corporation and that Commodity Credit Corporation is an instrumentality and agency of the United States organized under the laws of Delaware pursuant to an Executive Order of the President; that the direction and management of its affairs are under the general direction of the Secretary of Agriculture.

The allegations of paragraph six of the complaint were denied except that it was admitted that on September 12, 1938, the Zone adopted a proration program for raisins grown within its boundaries. A copy of the resolution establishing the program is attached to the answer. That program does not differ materially from the summary of it contained in the complaint.

The allegations of paragraph seven of the complaint are denied except that it is admitted that "Dickey Properties", the name under which plaintiff transacted his business, delivered not to exceed twenty tons of raisins into the stabilization pool; that all of the producers of raisins in the Zone delivered approximately 52,004 tons of raisins into that pool.

Defendants denied the allegations of paragraph eight of the complaint but admitted that the majority of the raisins were commingled in October and November, 1939, when they were sold and that a small portion was "dumped" in March of that year. It was alleged that the members of the Proration Program Committee did not act as trustees for the growers in taking possession of the raisins in the stabilization pool.

The allegations of paragraph nine of the complaint were denied, but it was admitted that on or about October 15, 1938, an agreement was entered into by Commodity Credit Corporation and the Program Committee of the Zone and Raisin Proration Association under the terms of which all raisins in the stabilization pool were pledged to Commodity Credit Corporation. A copy of the agreement was attached to the pleading. It was there recited that the Proration Program Committee proposed to deliver to Raisin Proration Association all of the raisins in the stabilization pool; that Raisin Proration Association will pledge those raisins to Commodity Credit Corporation "as additional collateral to all loans made or purchased by Commodity upon the security of raisins of the 1938 crops". The resolution of the Zone, adopted September 12, 1938, establishing the market program, did not disclose nor contain any reference to the plan of having the Commodity Credit Corporation furnish funds for loans to the raisin growers to the amount of $50.00 per ton on the free raisins, nor was there any intimation in it that the stabilization pool raisins were to be pledged to Commodity Credit Corporation as security for these loans to individual raisin growers. The same is true of the contract of October 15, 1938, with the exception that it contained the following: "Whereas, Commodity (Credit Corporation) has authorized loans upon the security of raisins of the 1938 crop in accordance with a certain resolution approved by Commodity under date of September 24th, 1938, which shall be considered as a part thereof; * * *." In this resolution it was disclosed that Commodity Credit Corporation proposed to loan individual growers, through Raisin Proration Association, $50 per ton on their free raisins and take as partial security for those loans a pledge of each grower's free raisins and also a pledge of all raisins in the stabilization pool as additional security for the total of the loans. We will have occasion to advert to other provisions of this resolution in a subsequent portion of this opinion.

It was also alleged that plaintiff, and all the other raisin growers in the Zone, consented to, acquiesced in and ratified such agreement and pledge.

The allegations of paragraph ten of the complaint are not denied. Therefore it must be accepted as an admitted fact that the Zone, in conjunction with Raisin Proration Association, a non-profit California corporation not organized under the Agricultural Proration Act, made the arrangement with Commodity Credit Corporation for the loans to individual growers of $50 a ton on their free raisins; that these loans were made to individual growers by Commodity Credit Corporation. It elsewhere appears that these were non-recourse loans to individual growers made through the agencies of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation and Raisin Proration Association; that all of the raisins in the stabilization pool, including the raisins of plaintiff and other non-borrowing growers, were pledged to secure the payment of the loans made by the individual borrowing growers.

The allegations of paragraph twelve of the complaint were denied, but it was alleged that Commodity Credit Corporation claimed a valid and subsisting lien on the raisins in the stabilization pool or the proceeds from their sale. It was also alleged that all of the free raisins had been sold and the proceeds properly applied; that the loans made to the individual growers had not been paid; that "there is and was at the time of the filing of the complaint also due, owing, and unpaid to this defendant a large sum of money on account of advances or loans made to the Zone and the Raisin Proration Association to defray the expenses of operating, maintaining, and handling the stabilization pool. That the balance due, owing and unpaid to this defendant, as aforesaid, exceeds the amounts obtained from the sale or disposition of both said free tonnage pool raisins and said surplus pool raisins."

The allegations of paragraph thirteen of the complaint were denied except that it was admitted that the total value of the raisins in the stabilization pool was largely in excess of $100,000.

The answer of the Commodity Credit Corporation set forth a second, separate and further defense in which estoppel was pleaded. It set forth the due organization of the Zone which included the counties of San Joaquin, Stanislaus, Merced, Madera, Fresno, Tulare, Kings and Kern, and all growers of Thompson Seedless, Sultana and Muscat grapes therein which were cured into sundried or partly sundried raisins. It also alleged the corporate existence of Sun-Maid Raisin Growers of California and of Commodity Credit Corporation.

After setting forth some of the difficulties of the growers in disposing of the 1937 raisin crop, and the financial assistance of Commodity Credit Corporation in marketing that crop, it was alleged that on or about and prior to September 1, 1938, the Proration Program Committee of the Zone and the directors of Raisin Proration Association negotiated with Commodity Credit Corporation and applied for a loan of $9,000,000 to be made available to Raisin Proration Association, the California corporation, in the form of non-recourse loans to producers of raisins in the Zone who desired the same to aid in stabilizing the prices to be received by all producers of raisins within the Zone. It was alleged that pursuant to notice a meeting of all the growers within the Zone was called by the Agricultural Prorate Commission of California to consider amendments to and modification of the existing raisin program; that such meeting was held on September 7, 1938; "that on or about September 10, 1938, the Commission duly made its Order and Decision, approving said program as amended and modified at said hearing; that, among other things, the said program as modified and amended and as approved by the Commission authorized the pledging or hypothecation of raisins in the stabilization pool to Commodity in order to secure loans made to the Committee and the Association for the purpose of handling and storing said stabilization pool raisins, and also for the purpose of providing further security for loans or advances proposed to be made to such producers as desired same."

It was further alleged that on September 12, 1938, the Proration Program Committee of the Zone adopted the resolution, hereinbefore described, setting forth the proration program; that the Agricultural Prorate Commission of California, the Proration Program Committee of the Zone and the Board of Directors of the Raisin Proration Association all assured Commodity Credit Corporation that the Zone and its Proration Program Committee, and the Raisin Proration Association and its board of directors, had power and authority under the Agricultural Proration Act of 1933, as amended, to pledge and hypothecate the twenty per cent of the raisins produced, which was to constitute the stabilization pool, as additional security for the non-recourse loans which Commodity Credit Corporation proposed to make; that Commodity Credit Corporation relied on these representations and on September 24, 1938, adopted and promulgated its resolution, heretofore referred to, whereby it agreed to make available to Raisin Proration Association (the California corporation) an amount not to exceed $9,000,000 upon the security described in that resolution; that on October 10, 1938, Commodity Credit Corporation accepted and received from Raisin Proration Association its promissory note for $9,000,000, payable on or before November 1, 1939, such sum to be available for making the non-recourse loans to growers desiring the same; that relying on the assurances of lawful authority to make the agreement hereinbefore referred to, Commodity Credit Corporation executed the pledge agreement with the Proration Program Committee of the Zone, and with Raisin Proration Association, whereby all raisins in the stabilization pool should be delivered by the Zone to the Raisin Proration Association and be pledged and hypothecated by it to Commodity Credit Corporation as added security for the loans made to growers; that Commodity Credit Corporation advanced to Raisin Proration Association $3,000,000 which was used by it in making non-recourse loans of $50 per ton on the free raisins of growers desiring such loans; that approximately 2500 growers of raisins made such non-recourse loans and delivered approximately 54,919 tons of free raisins into a free raisin pool as security for such loans; "that, pursuant to agreement between Commodity and the (Raisin Proration) Association, Commodity agreed to advance, and did advance and lend, to the Zone and Association not to exceed the sum of $4.00 per ton for carrying charges of the stabilization pool raisins, including storage, insurance, and handling expenses incurred in operating such pool, and received from said Zone and Association the pledge and hypothecation of the stabilization pool raisins as security therefor."

It was also alleged that all of the raisins in the free raisin pool had been sold and those in the stabilization pool either had been sold or were contracted for sale and that a large amount of money advanced by Commodity Credit Corporation to those growers making the non-recourse loans remained unpaid with no source of payment of that balance being available.

The balance of this defense contains allegations upon which Commodity Credit Corporation relies to estop plaintiff and his associates from maintaining this action. It is alleged that, from September 7, 1938, plaintiff knew, or had the opportunity of knowing the financing plan adopted; that he made no objection thereto and consented to, acquiesced in and ratified it, including the pledge of his raisins in the stabilization pool to secure the non-recourse loans to other growers; that he had eighty tons of free raisins and twenty tons of raisins in the stabilization pool; that he sold his free raisins in the usual channels of trade at a price considerably in excess of the price he would have received but for the financing made possible by the money advanced by Commodity Credit Corporation; that plaintiff and all other growers in the Zone, having knowledge or means of knowledge of the financing plan put into effect, having largely benefitted thereby and having stood by while the money furnished by Commodity Credit Corporation was expended for their benefit and the benefit of all other growers in the Zone, are estopped from denying the legality of the pledge of their stabilization pool raisins to secure the non-recourse loans made to other growers.

In a third defense it was alleged that Commodity Credit Corporation had advanced and loaned to the Zone and to Raisin Proration Association the sum of $226,418.11 to be used, and which was used, in handling, storing, insuring and otherwise caring for the raisins in the stabilization pool; that no part of this sum had been repaid.

As a fourth defense it was alleged that there was no other grower of raisins in the Zone who was similarly situated as to the stabilization pool raisins as plaintiff and that he could not bring a class or representative action and could only bring an action for himself.

As a fifth defense Commodity Credit Corporation incorporated all of the allegations of its second defense therein and alleged that the cause of action was barred by the provisions of section 17 of the Agricultural Proration Act of 1933 as amended.

As a sixth defense Commodity Credit Corporation pleaded laches.

All defendants except Commodity Credit Corporation and Sun-Maid Raisin Growers of California joined in a separate answer containing two separate defenses which did not materially differ from the first and second defenses of Commodity Credit Corporation except in containing somewhat more detail.

The resolution of Commodity Credit Corporation made the manager or acting manager of the San Francisco Loan Agency of Reconstruction Finance Corporation its agent in connection with the $9,000,000 loan to the Raisin Proration Association and the loans to individual growers. It provided Raisin Proration Association should execute a note for $9,000,000, payable November 1, 1938, bearing interest at four per cent per annum, payable quarterly; that each advance made to an individual grower be endorsed on this note as credit; that $50 per ton be advanced to growers desiring such loan on non-recourse agreements signed by each grower assigning his free raisins as well as his raisins in the stabilization pool as security for the loan; that the raisins be stored and insured.

The agreement to which a copy of the resolution is attached provided that all raisins in the stabilization pool be delivered to Raisin Proration Association and be pledged by it to Commodity Credit Corporation to secure the loans to the individual growers. This pledge agreement contained the following: "Commodity may sell all or any part of the pledged raisins at any time, without demand or notice, at one or more pledge sales (which may be public or private, as determined by Commodity) on such terms and for such prices as Commodity may deem fair, subject only to the same restrictions as if such raisins were sold or otherwise disposed of by the Committee or the Association, or Commodity may release all or any part of such surplus raisins to the Association on trust receipt for disposition and the net sales proceeds upon such disposition will be remitted by the Association promptly to Commodity."

The material factual situation presented by these involved pleadings may be summarized as follows: That the Agricultural Prorate Commission of California was duly and regularly appointed as an existing agency of the State of California; that the Zone was regularly organized under the provisions of the Agricultural Proration Act; that there was adopted pursuant to that act an agricultural prorate marketing program for the Zone which was approved by the Agricultural Prorate Commission; that the resolution of the Proration Program Committee adopting this program contained nothing concerning loans to individual growers in the Zone or a pledge of the raisins in the stabilization pool to secure such loans; that Raisin Proration Association, a nonprofit California corporation, was organized with its directorate composed of the members of the Proration Program Committee of the Zone; that these directors negotiated with Commodity Credit Corporation for loans of $50 per ton on the free raisins of growers in the Zone who desired such loans which served as a floor under the price of raisins keeping the price equal to or above that figure; that Commodity Credit Corporation agreed to supply $9,000,000 for such loans; that the Zone delivered the raisins in the stabilization pool to Raisin Proration Association which pledged them to Commodity Credit Corporation as security for such loans; that about $3,000,000 was actually loaned to individual growers through Raisin Proration Association which acted as the conduit through which the money for each loan flowed; that each grower making a loan executed a non-recourse agreement pledging his free raisins and his raisins in the stabilization pool as security with authority given to Commodity Credit Corporation to foreclose the pledge and sell the pledged raisins under restrictions already mentioned; that in excess of fifty-two per cent of the growers in the Zone made loans and executed the non-recourse contracts; that in excess of forty-seven per cent of the growers in the Zone, of which plaintiff was one, did not make loans, but sold their free raisins in the open market; (these percentages are admitted in all the briefs); that plaintiff and other non-borrowing growers had no actual knowledge of the pledge of his stabilization pool raisins when the pledge was made but had available means of acquiring that knowledge; that all of the pledged raisins have been sold but there remains a considerable balance unpaid to Commodity Credit Corporation on loans to individual growers after crediting thereon all receipts from the pledged raisins; that Commodity Credit Corporation advanced $226,418.11 which was used in paying the expenses incurred by Raisin Proration Association in handling, storing, insuring and caring for raisins delivered into the stabilization pool, no part of which sum has been repaid.

The trial court on motion of plaintiff struck out the allegations in the first defense of Commodity Credit Corporation and the other answering defendants to the effect that plaintiff and his associates had consented to, acquiesced in and ratified the agreement for the pledge of their raisins in the stabilization pool to secure the loans made to borrowing growers. It also struck out from both answers the defenses of estoppel and all the other special defenses numbered three to six, inclusive, in the answer of Commodity Credit Corporation.

The motion for judgment on the pleadings was then granted and an interlocutory judgment entered in favor of plaintiff and his associates and an accounting was ordered. To obviate the long accounting it was stipulated that the Zone should prepare and file a report showing the data as to which an accounting was ordered. Defendants reserved their rights to appeal and urge any grounds on the appeal which they might have done had the stipulation not been entered into.

This account was filed. Attached to it was a list of the names of four thousand twenty-six non-borrowing growers who had contributed raisins to the stabilization pool and the quantity delivered by each. This list contains the names of two defendants who were members of the Proration Program Committee of the Zone and of the board of directors of the Raisin Proration Association.

The report showed that there was a balance of $145,166.04 remaining from the sale of the raisins of the non-borrowing growers in the stabilization pool after deducting all charges and expenses charged against that pool. $56,281.27 of that amount was paid into court to await disposition on final judgment in this case and judgment was rendered against Commodity Credit Corporation for the balance.

The first important question argued by counsel is the authority of the Zone to pledge the raisins of non-borrowing growers in the stabilization pool to secure the debts of the borrowing growers. In this connection it should be observed that the pledge was not made by the Zone but by an independent corporation to which the Zone had delivered the raisins. The loans were not made to the Zone or by the Zone to borrowing growers but through an independent corporation to individual growers.

[1] The Agricultural Proration Act has been held constitutional by both the State and Federal courts so that question is settled. See, Agricultural Prorate Commission of California v. Superior Court, 5 Cal.

2d 550, 55 P.2d 495; Parker v. Brown, 317 U.S. 341, 63 S.Ct. 307, 312, 87 L.Ed. —.

In the opinion in the Parker case we find the following: "The committee is authorized to pledge the raisins held in those pools in order to secure funds to finance pool operations and make advances to growers." The question of the pledge of the raisins was not an issue and was not involved in that case. The cause of action in that case arose after the amendments of 1939 went into effect and whether or not those amendments lend support to the quoted statement is not important here. In the instant case it is sufficient to say that the provisions of the act in effect in 1938 contained no language giving express authority to the Zone or to the Proration Program Committee to pledge any of the stabilization pool raisins to secure loans to any one. This seems to be admitted by counsel for all parties. It is argued by defendants that the pledge of the stabilization pool raisins must be implied and incidental power flowing from the express powers granted to the Proration Program Committee of the Zone and necessary to carrying out and accomplishing the purpose of the act which is to withhold from the market, surplusses that would glut it and crowd prices down to a point below the cost of production. It is argued that to accomplish this the Proration Program Committee has almost unlimited power to deal with surplus raisins so long as its acts do not violate the express provisions of the Agricultural Proration Act. In this connection it is also argued that the Zone is not trustee for the growers in handling the surplus raisins in the stabilization pool so that plaintiff and his associates cannot demand an accounting of any funds derived from their sale.

The powers granted the Proration Program Committee are set forth in section 19.1 of the act, St.1935, p. 1537, from which we quote the following:

"In any marketing program approved by the commission, a program committee shall be empowered to determine the method, manner and extent of proration and the movement of the prorated commodity from harvest into a primary channel of distribution. * * *

"(a) To establish and maintain surplus pools which shall be authorized to receive from each producer from time to time his surplus of the prorated commodity and market the same by grades for the account of the producer when it can be advantageously disposed of either in its original or some converted state; provided, however, such surplus shall not be marketed in any form which would directly compete with that part of the crop which is regularly certificated; and provided, further, that any part of any such surplus may be turned over by a program committee to charitable organizations, self-help cooperatives, and similar agencies under proper safeguards to prevent any part of the commodity so disposed of from directly competing with the part of the crop marketed through the usual channels of trade. In operating any such surplus pools, a program committee may fix grading, packing, and servicing charges to be assessed against such commodities received by the pool and requiring such surplus pool, a program committee shall handle all commodities received by a surplus pool and account for the same on a pooled basis. Each producer delivering his surplus to a pool shall be credited for his proportionate share of the surplus so delivered.

"(b) To create, establish or otherwise obtain and operate facilities for the grading, packing, servicing, processing, preparing for market and disposal of such surplus in such manner as to maintain stability in the markets and to sell such surplus and/or any of its derived products. * * *

"The cost of the exercise of such powers as are herein granted to the program committee shall be a part of the cost of the operation of the program and shall be obtained through fees in the same manner as other costs of the program."

The act provides for the appointment of an agent for the Zone by the Proration Program Committee. This agent is entrusted with the primary administration of the proration program. Section 20 of the act, St.1935 p. 1539, requires the agent to issue to each producer primary and secondary certificates. The primary certificate indicates the total volume of free raisins each producer may dispose of. The secondary certificate entitles each grower to place in the primary channels of trade the quantity of free raisins therein specified, not to exceed the total of his free raisins specified in the primary certificate.

Section 21 of the act, St.1935, p. 2089, requires the agent to "collect for each certificate issued to the producers, a reasonable and proportional fee to be fixed by the program committee so calculated as to produce the expenses of the administration of the program, the costs of the institution of the program, and a proper proportion of the cost of the maintenance of the commission which shall be fifteen per cent of the fees collected for certificates, by the agent of the zone unless the commission determines that a lesser precentage will provide sufficient revenue for its maintenance." This is the only provision in the act which provides a fund with which to pay the administrative and other costs of the Agricultural Prorate Commission and the Zone. The purpose of these fees is expressly to defray the costs (1) of initiating the program, (2) the maintenance of the Agricultural Prorate Commission, and (3) the administration of the program.

[2] We cannot agree with the argument of defendants to the effect that the act grants to the Proration Program Committee general implied powers to deal with the surplus raisins in the stabilization pool in any manner it desires in order to stabilize the market price of the free raisins at a point above the cost of production. While it is the purpose of the act to stabilize prices, it is clear from its provisions that this purpose is to be accomplished by removing the surplus raisins from the channels of trade until the free raisins are marketed. If those free raisins are marketed before the end of a marketing season it would seem to be the duty of the Proration Program Committee to market the surplus raisins in the stabilization pool, or as many of them as may be sold "by grades for the account of the producer when it can be advantageously disposed of either in its original or some converted state." If they cannot be so marketed it seems clear that the whole or any part of the raisins in the stabilization pool may be turned over, given, if necessary, to charitable organizations, self-help cooperatives, and similar agencies under restrictions preventing the surplus raisins from competing with the free raisins in the usual channels of trade.

[3] The act requires the Proration Program Committee to handle the surplus raisins in the stabilization pool and to account for them on a pooled basis. This clearly implies an obligation to account to each producer for his raisins in the stabilization pool for he is to be "credited for his proportionate share of the surplus so delivered" into the stabilization pool.

This language clearly imports an agency on the part of the Zone and its Proration Program Committee to receive and dispose of the raisins in the stabilization pool for the benefit of the growers who are the owners of at least an equitable interest in them. It also creates the obligation to account to the growers for the net receipts, if any, derived from the disposition of the surplus raisins.

Defendants argue that the relation created is not that of a trust. They contend that "clearly the Zone and the Program Committee were not trustees of a formal or statutory trust for the benefit of contributors to the stabilization pool nor were the contributors as such cestuis of a trust. On the contrary the Agricultural Prorate Commission and the Program Committee were official administrative agencies of the State of California and the members of these agencies were officers of the State. In inaugurating and carrying out a prorate program they were acting in behalf of the State and for the public at large and not primarily for the benefit of the contributors to the stabilization pool."

This argument lacks convincing force and is not borne out by the clear language of the statute. Whether the relationship created be called that of a trust or by some other name, it possesses the characteristics of a true trust. The corpus is created and is composed of the surplus raisins in the stabilization pool. This corpus is placed in the possession of the Proration Program Committee with the power of sale or other disposition under the limitations imposed. The Proration Program Committee is required to account for the same on a pooled basis to the beneficiaries who are the growers having surplus raisins in the stabilization pool. We can see no reason why such a trust may not be created by statute. Nor can we see why the mere fact that its operation might benefit all the people of the State by improving the financial condition of the raisin growers, should be a sufficient reason for the defeat of the clear purposes of the statute in creating such a trust. It was primarily for the benefit of the raisin growers, who form an important class of the population of the State, with a secondary benefit to the other inhabitants of the State.

Defendants argue that since the Proration Program Committee is empowered by the act to give surplus raisins in the stabilization pool to charitable and like institutions, under the restriction that the raisins given away do not compete with the free raisins in the usual channels of trade, the power to pledge those raisins to Commodity Credit Corporation for a loan should be implied.

This argument divides into two separate heads: First: There is the loan of about $3,000,000 to the individual growers who borrowed parts of this sum from Commodity Credit Corporation, each borrowing grower giving to it a non-recourse agreement whereby he pledged his free raisins, and his surplus raisins in the stabilization pool, as security for the loan to him, and where Raisin Proration Association, a private non-profit corporation, and not the Zone nor the Proration Program Committee, pledged the raisins in the stabilization pool placed there by non-borrowing growers as further security for the loans to borrowing growers. The second question is the right to pledge the raisins in the stabilization pool to secure the loan of $226,418.11, made by Commodity Credit Corporation to the Zone and Raisin Proration Association to pay the expenses of handling, storing, insuring and otherwise caring for the raisins in the stabilization pool. This will be considered when we come to the order of the trial court striking out the third separate defense of Commodity Credit Corporation.

[4] The arguments, by defendants, that the Agricultural Proration Act gives the Zone the implied power and authority to pledge the raisins in the stabilization pool to secure debts is based upon the express authority given to turn over and to "dispose of" (give away, as they argue) those raisins. This authority is contained in the second paragraph of section 19.1 of the act already quoted.

We believe that the expressions "turn over" and "dispose of", as they are used in this paragraph, must be given synonymous meanings. We agree that these expressions must include the right to give the raisins away. See "dispose of", Black's Law Dictionary; State v. Deusting, 33 Minn. 102, 22 N.W. 442, 53 Am.Rep. 12; Scott v. State, 6 Ga.App. 332, 64 S.E. 1005. But the right to give the surplus raisins away is strictly limited in this paragraph of the section so that the gift may be made only to charitable and other similar organizations and then only upon condition that those raisins will not compete with the free raisins in the usual channels of trade. The raisins were first delivered by the Zone to the Raisin Proration Association, a non-profit California corporation. There is no intimation in the record that this corporation could be classed as a charitable organization, or as a self-help corporation, so a gift to it would not have been authorized under the statute. This corporation pledged these raisins to Commodity Credit Corporation. There is no claim that Commodity Credit Corporation is a charitable organization nor a self-help cooperative even though its lavish use of public funds might have indicated that some of its officers had charitable impulses.

[5] The third paragraph of section 19.1 of the act empowered the Zone to acquire and operate facilities for preparing for market and disposal of the stabilization pool raisins in any manner so as to maintain market stability and to sell them. This paragraph must be read as a whole and its language construed together. Its purpose seems to be to give the Zone latitude in preparing for market and disposing of the surplus raisins within the limitation of the last conjunctive clause "and to sell such surplus and/or any of its derived products". The language used would seem to indicate an intention on the part of the legislature to give the Zone rather broad powers in preparing the surplus raisins for market, either as raisins or in some converted form, and in selling them for the benefit of the producer.

[6, 7] It is a cardinal rule of construction of statutes that when they are free from ambiguity and their meaning is clear there is no need for interpretation by the courts. In such cases the courts should not legislate by extending the clear meaning of the language used by the legislature but should give effect to that language as it is used in the statute and give to the words their common and ordinary meaning. Davis v. Hart, 123 Cal. 384, 55 P. 1060; Frinier v. C. J. Kubach Co., 177 Cal. 722, 171 P. 952; Pasadena University v. Los Angeles County, 190 Cal. 786, 214 P. 868; McNamara v. Steckman, 202 Cal. 569, 262 P. 297. The same rule is recognized in the Federal courts. United States v. Missouri Pac. R. Co., 278 U.S. 269, 49 S.Ct. 133, 73 L.Ed. 322; Commissioner v. Gottlieb, 265 U.S. 310, 44 S.Ct. 528, 68 L.Ed. 1031; In re Kunkle, D.C., 40 F.2d 563.

[8] We can see nothing obscure, uncertain or ambiguous in the language used in the Agricultural Proration Act. Its purposes are clearly set forth. They are to stabilize the market price of an agricultural product by withholding from market the surplus portion of the crop that cannot be marketed without crowding the market price of the commodity below the cost of production. That end is to be accomplished in the manner already set forth. The whole plan is to sustain the market price by withholding the surplus and by feeding into the market the amount of free raisins it will conveniently absorb, thus maintaining the price under the familiar law of supply and demand. The Agricultural Proration Act being clear and unambiguous we cannot read into its provisions powers which the legislature failed to include.

[9, 10] Defendants maintain that the power to make the loans and pledge the stabilization pool raisins to secure their payment must be implied from the provisions of the act. "An intention to legislate by implication is not to be presumed." First M. E. Church v. Los Angeles County, 204 Cal. 201, 267 P. 703, 704; Crowell v. Gilmore, 18 Cal. 370. There must be some direct connection between the powers sought to be implied and the powers expressly granted, and the implied powers must be necessary to carry out the inherent and express powers granted by the act. In re Allowance of Myers' Claim by Board of County Commissioners, 146 Minn. 103, 177 N.W. 1013.

Here the express purpose of the act is to stabilize the market price of raisins by determining the quantity the market can absorb and withholding the surplus from the market until the free raisins have passed into the hands of purchasers so that the surplus raisins cannot compete with them. The methods to be used in obtaining this end are clearly set forth in the act and ample powers to accomplish that purpose by use of those methods are granted.

The methods here used to effect the loans to the individual growers are entirely without the machinery set up in the act for the stabilization of the price of raisins. The Zone did not make the loan, or loans, and did not pledge the raisins in the stabilization pool to secure its, or their, repayment. It surrendered possession of those raisins to a private corporation which executed a promissory note for $9,000,000 payable to Commodity Credit Corporation. That private corporation did not receive, and was not intended to receive, as its own, any part of this money which it promised to pay. It served as the conduit through which passed the money loaned to individual borrowing growers by Commodity Credit Corporation. It received credit on its note for money it did not repay to Commodity Credit Corporation but which that corporation loaned to individual growers. These were non-recourse loans and each was secured by the pledge of each borrowing grower of his free raisins in the stabilization pool. The loans were also secured by an attempted pledge of the stabilization pool raisins by the private corporation to which they had been delivered by the Zone.

[11] As far as the pleadings are concerned the only connection the Zone had with the transaction was the activity of its Proration Program Committee, the members of which also constituted the board of directors of the private corporation, in negotiating with Commodity Credit Corporation to furnish money for financing these loans and the surrender of the raisins in the stabilization pool to the private corporation. The Zone then passed out of the picture and thereafter the transaction became one between Commodity Credit Corporation, the private corporation and the borrowing growers. This transaction was private in its nature and entirely without the contemplation of anything in the Agricultural Proration Act. None of the powers assumed and used in this complicated transaction were necessary to carry out the inherent or express powers granted by that act and it would be judicial legislation of the worst kind to hold that those powers were granted by implication. We must hold that the transaction we have described, whereby the raisins of plaintiff and his associates in the stabilization pool were pledged by Raisin Proration Association, a private corporation, to secure the note of the private corporation for money which it did not receive, and the debts of borrowing growers, were unauthorized by any express or implied powers granted by the Agricultural Proration Act.

We are fortified in this conclusion by the case of Hawxhurst v. Rathgeb, 119 Cal. 531, 51 P. 846, 847, 63 Am.St.Rep. 142, where an agent entrusted with securities pledged them as security for his own debt. The Supreme Court there said: "This transaction was not within the terms of the power conferred. The language of the power was, 'to sell, transfer, and release two certain mortgages executed by Gotthard Kunz (describing them); to indorse and transfer the notes secured by said mortgage; to sell and transfer my claims for said notes and mortgages filed in the superior court of said San Luis Obispo county, state of California, in the matter of the estate of said Gotthard Kunz, now deceased; and to receive payment of said claims, and give acquittances therefor.' The effect of this language was to confer a power to sell and transfer the title to the securities absolutely, or, if not so sold, to collect them from the estate of Kunz. There is nothing in the language which by any proper construction purports to confer a power to pledge or hypothecate the securities for any purpose, or to borrow money thereon. The words 'sell and transfer', as there used, are of no broader signification than the words 'sell and convey,' used with reference to a conveyance of real estate; and the latter, employed as the operative words in a power to convey land, do not carry authority to mortgage or otherwise dispose of the property."

We will next consider the third separate defense of Commodity Credit Corporation which was stricken out on motion of plaintiff. This defense alleged that on October 15, 1938, Commodity Credit Corporation, Raisin Proration Association and the Zone entered into an agreement whereby Commodity Credit Corporation agreed with the Zone and Raisin Proration Association to advance the sum of $4.00 per ton to be used in handling, storing, insuring and otherwise caring for raisins to be delivered into the stabilization pool; that it did advance $226,418.11 to the Zone and Raisin Proration Association which was used for such purposes; that no part of that sum has been repaid.

The creation of the stabilization pool and the delivery of surplus raisins into it was expressly authorized by the Agricultural Proration Act. The Zone was given power to create, establish or otherwise obtain and operate facilities for grading, packing, servicing, processing, preparing for market and disposing of, in a certain manner, the raisins in the stabilization pool and to assess grading, packing and servicing charges against those raisins requiring such handling.

Also the Zone was required to receive the surplus raisins in the stabilization pool and keep them off the market for a time at least. This would require storing or warehousing these raisins during that time. It is clear there would be an expense in connection with this operation as well as expenses in connection with preparing those raisins for market. While such costs and charges were "to be assessed against such commodities" it would seem that the act failed to provide an immediate fund to pay those expenses as they accrued as the assessments might not be collected until the surplus raisins were disposed of.

[12] As the direct duty of caring for, processing and selling (if possible) these raisins is expressly placed on the Zone, it would seem to follow that the power to borrow money to pay those charges, if other funds were not available, must be implied as the borrowing of such money might have been necessary to carry out the duties expressly placed on the Zone by the statute. As was said in Southern Pac. R. Co. v. Stibbens, 103 Cal.App. 664, at page 678, 285 P. 374, at page 379: "The duties of a public officer include, not only those which lie within the direct definition of the statute, but also those which are necessary to the accomplishment of the purpose of his office, even though they may be an incident of his main duties, where they promote the execution of a mandate of law."

The exact status of the Raisin Proration Association in this part of the transaction is not made very clear by the pleadings. Whether or not the money advanced to it and used by it to care for the stabilization pool raisins may be set off by Commodity Credit Corporation against any judgment obtained by plaintiff and his associates may be left to the trial court when the cause is returned for trial. It is sufficient to reach the conclusion here that it was error to strike out this defense and to grant a motion for judgment on the pleadings in its absence from the answer of the Commodity Credit Corporation.

We may now proceed to consider the defenses of consent to, acquiescence in, and ratification of the agreement to pledge the stabilization pool raisins as well as the estoppel of plaintiff and his associates to maintain that the pledge of their raisins was illegal and void. These several defenses are so closely related here and rely on similar allegations of the answers that we will not extend this opinion by considering them separately although the elements of the several defenses may not be the same in every case. Acquiescence, consent and ratification may sometimes amount to equitable estoppel. 10 Cal.Jur. 625, sec. 13.

Plaintiff seeks to support the ruling of the trial court on the ground that the pledge of the stabilization pool raisins was void and contrary to law. In support of this argument he quotes the first two sentences of section 11, 10 Cal.Jur. p. 623, and cites the case of Silverthorne v. Percey, 120 Cal. App. 83, 7 P.2d 746; Lukens v. Nye, 156 Cal. 498, 105 P. 593, 36 L.R.A., N.S., 244, 20 Ann.Cas. 158; Raisch v. City and County of San Francisco, 80 Cal. 1, 22 P. 22; Higgins v. San Diego Water Co., 118 Cal. 524, 45 P. 824, 50 P. 670, and Edge v. City of Lexington, 277 Ky. 750, 127 S.W.2d 393.

The author of the quoted paragraph of California Jurisprudence cites Lukens v. Nye, supra, in support of the text. In that case the legislature passed a bill appropriating money to pay a claim against the State. The Governor signed the bill but before doing so exacted a contract from the claimant to accept in full payment an amount considerably less than the amount appropriated and directed to be paid in the approved bill. In holding this void and thus not furnishing any basis of estoppel against the claimant, the court said [156 Cal. 498, 105 P. 596, 36 L.R.A.,N.S., 244, 20 Ann.Cas. 158]:

> "The Constitution expressly declares that no payment of public funds shall be made upon any claim against the state, under any contract made without express authority of law, and that all unauthorized agreements or contracts therefor shall be null and void. Article 4, § 32. The entire proceeding was clearly contrary to public policy.
> "The agreement in question being wholly void, and also against public policy, it cannot be the foundation for an estoppel."

[13] The other California cases cited by plaintiff involved void acts that were either contrary to express statutes or against public policy or both. It is thoroughly settled that an estoppel cannot arise under such circumstances and this is all that is held by those cases relied upon by plaintiff.

[14] We have no such situation here. There is no provision in the Agricultural Proration Act prohibiting individual growers from borrowing money and pledging their free raisins for security. Nor does the act contain any provision prohibiting a borrowing grower from encumbering his interest in his raisins in the stabilization pool subject to the right of the zone to dispose of them as provided in the act. Those transactions are not prohibited by any law called to our attention and may be regarded here as private transactions between the borrowing growers and the Commodity Credit Corporation entirely without the purview of the Agricultural Proration Act. There is no express and direct provision of law prohibiting the Zone from pledging the stabilization pool raisins of the non-borrowing growers as added security for the debts of the borrowing growers. As such a pledge was not within the powers granted the Zone, either expressly or by implication, we regard the attempted pledge as invalid because it was an unauthorized act and not because it was in violation of an express statute. There is a vast difference in effect between an unauthorized act in excess of a power and an unlawful act contrary to law or to public policy. The former may be ratified and form the basis of an estoppel while the latter cannot. California C. P. Growers v. Harkey, 11 Cal.2d 188, 78 P.2d 1137; Julian v. Schwartz, 16 Cal.App.2d 310, 60 P.2d 887; New York Life Ins. Co. v. Occidental Pet. Corp., 43 Cal.App.2d 747, 111 P.2d 707; Carlston v. Shenson, 47 Cal.App. 2d 52, 117 P.2d 408; Lukens v. Nye, supra.

In this case defendants have pleaded estoppel by silent acquiescence in acts which were not contrary to express statutory provisions nor against public policy but which were in excess of authority. If the other elements of estoppel, acquiescence and ratification were properly pleaded the trial court erred in striking out those portions of the answers.

Plaintiff maintains there can be no estoppel here because, (1) he and his associates did nothing which "led or induced another to do that which he otherwise would not have done", and (2) that Commodity Credit Corporation relied on misrepresentations of law which do not form a proper basis for estoppel and that those representations were neither made by plaintiff nor his associates.

[15] It is true that plaintiff did nothing affirmatively to mislead Commodity Credit Corporation. He simply stood by silent and inactive while Commodity Credit Corporation loaned about $3,000,000 to growers on security partly composed of plaintiff's raisins in the stabilization pool. Silence and inaction may form the basis for an estoppel where the person against whom the estoppel is invoked in good conscience and good morals should have spoken or acted. Julian v. Schwartz, supra; New York Life Ins. Co. v. Occidental Pet. Corp., supra; 10 Cal.Jur. 631, sec. 16.

It is true that plaintiff personally was not a party to the contracts made by the borrowing growers, Raisin Proration Association and the Zone with Commodity Credit Corporation, but the Zone took an active part in the plan in delivering the raisins to Raisin Proration Association for pledge and plaintiff maintains the Zone was his trustee. If plaintiff had knowledge of these transactions and was to profit from them, as alleged, it seems to us he should have objected to the pledge of his raisins if he did not approve the plan, before Commodity Credit Corporation had loaned very large sums of money to borrowing growers, the total of which it now appears it cannot recover. This may well be a case where plaintiff should in good conscience and morals have spoken and acted, or, upon failing to have done so, be estopped from contesting the legality of the transaction. If plaintiff should have spoken or acted and if his silence and inaction misled Commodity Credit Corporation to its damage, and plaintiff profited thereby, a case for the application of the doctrine of estoppel was presented.

It is urged by plaintiff that the Agricultural Prorate Commission, the Proration Program Committee and the board of directors of Raisin Proration Association, upon advice of the Attorney General of California given in a letter dated August 8, 1938, advised Commodity Credit Corporation that there was legal authority for the pledge of the raisins in the stabilization pool for the loans made to the individual growers; that plaintiff and his associates did not join in these representations and cannot be bound by them; that these representations were made concerning matters of law and not of fact; that misrepresentation as to matters of law ordinarily cannot form the basis for an estoppel.

[16] Subject to certain exceptions not important here, misrepresentations as to matters of law afford no sufficient basis for an estoppel. 10 Cal.Jur. 630. However this does not answer the problem before us. The misrepresentation charged against plaintiff was his failure to object to the pledge of his raisins in the stabilization pool to secure the debts of others thus giving rise to the belief that he consented to, acquiesced in, and ratified such a pledge. This was not a representation that he considered the pledge lawful, but was a representation of a fact and may be sufficient, if proved, to establish the defense of estoppel.

[17] We therefore conclude that the defenses of consent, acquiescence, ratification and estoppel were available to defendants and should not have been stricken from their answers.

[18, 19] Laches is a plea that is available to a party in a court of equity. It was defined in Cahill v. Superior Court, 145 Cal. 42, 78 P. 467, 469, as follows: "'Laches' is defined as 'such neglect or omission to assert a right as, taken in conjunction with the lapse of time, more or less great, and other circumstances causing prejudice to an adverse party, operates as a bar in a court of equity.' [18] Am. & Eng.Ency. of Law, 2d Ed., p. 97. 'In determining what will constitute such unreasonable delay, regard will be had to circumstances which justify the delay, to the nature of the case and the relief demanded, and to the question whether the rights of the defendant, or of other persons, have been prejudiced by such delay.'"

While laches is not the same as estoppel it has been called quasi estoppel. Although the rules governing equitable estoppel do not apply to laches (Bell v. Hudson, 73 Cal. 285, 14 P. 791, 9 Am.St.Rep. 791) they both may involve acquiescence and consent. Under the facts pleaded in the answer of Commodity Credit Corporation, the defenses of laches and estoppel are so closely related that no good could be accomplished by considering the defense of laches in detail. It should be sufficient to say that this defense should have been made available to Commodity Credit Corporation and that it was error to strike that defense from the answer.

Commodity Credit Corporation strenuously argues that the allegations of the complaint are insufficient in law to permit plaintiff to maintain a class or representative action to recover for non-borrowing growers other than himself. It urges that the complaint fails to allege there were many non-borrowing growers who stood in the same position as plaintiff, for whom he could act. It asserts that the only allegations on this subject are those contained in paragraph thirteen of the complaint, which we have quoted. Were this true there would be much justification for this argument. In this connection it must be admitted that the allegations on this subject could have been much more clear and specific.

[20] Section 382 of the Code of Civil Procedure provides in part that "when the question is one of a common or general interest, of many persons, or when the parties are numerous, and it is impracticable to bring them all before the court, one or more may sue or defend for the benefit of all." It is clear that either or both of the factors set forth in the section must appear from the allegations of the complaint. The question must be one of common or general interest of many persons or the parties must be so numerous that it is impracticable to bring them all before the court.

[21, 22] We are permitted to take judicial notice of facts concerning the raisin industry of California. Agricultural Prorate Commission v. Superior Court, supra; Parker v. Brown, supra. It is a matter of common knowledge to each one of us and to every inhabitant of those counties composing the Zone that there are many thousands of persons engaged in the growing of raisin grapes in those counties. The questions presented here which involve the Raisin Proration Program, adopted and put into effect, must have been of common and general interest to all of those growers because the stabilization of the market price they would receive for their raisins depended to a considerable extent on the details of the marketing program, some of which are before us for consideration.

Further, we believe that the fair implication may be drawn from paragraphs seven, ten, eleven, twelve, and thirteen of the complaint that there were many growers having raisins in the stabilization pool who had not borrowed from Commodity Credit Corporation and so occupied positions similar to that of plaintiff in so far as this action is concerned.

[23, 24] Plaintiff points out that the judgment discloses that two members of the Proration Program Committee of the Zone, who were directors of Raisin Proration Association and as such negotiated with Commodity Credit Corporation, were nonborrowing growers and were given judgment against Commodity Credit Corporation. It is argued that at least these growers should be estopped from obtaining such judgment. On the face of the record, including the judgment, this argument would seem to possess considerable merit. However the sufficiency of a complaint is to be judged by the allegations it contains. Estoppel is usually an affirmative defense that should be pleaded by a defendant. It may defeat the cause of action set up in the complaint. The purpose of estoppel is not to test the sufficiency of a complaint but to defeat the cause of action set forth in it. If these two growers, and others, be estopped to bring the action or benefit by the judgment, this is a matter to be determined at the trial either because of failure of proof on the part of plaintiff or of successful defense. Such growers might be permitted to intervene in the action if they so desire or to join in its defense.

There are numerous cases in this State involving the right to bring class or representative actions. We cite the following which support the conclusions we have reached. Wheelock v. First Presbyterian Church, 119 Cal. 477, 51 P. 841; Coachella Valley County Water Dist. v. Stevens, 206 Cal. 400, 274 P. 538; Peterson v. Donelley, 33 Cal.App.2d 133, 91 P.2d 123.

Commodity Credit Corporation pleaded the defense of the limitation on the time of bringing the action contained in section 17 of the Agricultural Proration Act. That section in effect in 1938, provided as follows: "Any order of the commission instituting a proration program and any other order of the commission substantially affecting the rights of any interested party may be reviewed by any court of competent jurisdiction. Any such action must be commenced within thirty days after the effective date of the order complained of or within thirty days after the injurious effect complained of." (Stats.1935, p. 1535.)

This section was amended by the legislature in 1939, Stats.1939, p. 2495, to read as follows: "Any order of the director instituting a proration program and any other order of the commission or director substantially affecting the rights of any interested party may be reviewed by any court of competent jurisdiction. Any such action must be commenced within thirty days after the effective date of the order complained of."

This amendment went into effect on September 19, 1939, so it had been in full force and effect for almost six months when this action was filed.

The section in effect in 1938 when the proration program was adopted, and when the attempted pledge of the raisins in the stabilization pool was made, contained two limitations on the time in which an order of the Agricultural Prorate Commission could be reviewed. One was thirty days after the effective date of the order. The other was thirty days after such an order had injuriously affected a complaining party. Thus, as applicable here, the limitation on a review was not necessarily a fixed thirty day period after the order went into effect, but might be thirty days after it appeared that the order would injuriously affect the rights of plaintiff. Thus the date on which the plaintiff's right of action would be barred by the provisions of the section then in effect could not be fixed until the determination of the date that the order injuriously affected him.

The amendment of 1939 removed this uncertainty from the section and fixed the 30th day after the effective date of the order on or before which the proceeding to review it must be instituted. It seems to be clear that under some circumstances the 1939 amendment would materially shorten the time in which a plaintiff might seek to review an order of the Agricultural Prorate Commission such as we have before us here. The effective date of the order under attack was in September, 1938. If the 1939 amendment be given the exact effect of its language the proceeding to review the order would have been barred thirty days thereafter, or in October, 1938.

[25] No person has a vested right in any particular period of limitation. Ordinarily the determination of that period is within the sound discretion of the legislature which may lengthen or shorten it subject to the important exception thus stated in Edwards v. Kearzey, 96 U.S. 595, 603, 24 L.Ed. 793, as follows: "Statutes of limitation are statutes of repose. They are necessary to the welfare of society. The lapse of time constantly carries with it the means of proof. The public as well as individuals are interested in the principle upon which they proceed. They do not impair the remedy, but only require its application within the time specified. If the period limited be unreasonably short, and designed to defeat the remedy upon preexisting contracts, which was part of their obligation, we should pronounce the statute void. Otherwise, we should abdicate the performance of one of our most important duties."

The same rule was announced in Coleman v. Superior Court, 135 Cal.App. 74, 26 P.2d 673, 674, as follows: "The authorities appear to be uniform in holding that the Legislature has the right to either lessen or lengthen a statute of limitations, subject only to the exception that an existing right cannot be cut off summarily, that is, without giving a reasonable time after the act becomes effective to exercise such right."

The general rules governing changes in periods of limitations of action are clearly stated in 34 Am.Juris. 29, et seq., secs. 21 to 26, inclusive. The cases there cited support those rules.

[26] By analogy the case of Shea v. City of San Bernardino, 7 Cal.2d 688, 62 P.2d 365, should govern the decision of the effective date of the bar of the statute under the 1939 amendment. In the Shea case one of the plaintiffs was injured in an accident which happened on April 19, 1931. In 1931 the legislature passed an act (Stats. 1931, p. 2475) requiring claimants to file a verified claim for damages sought to be recovered from a municipality. This act went into effect on August 14, 1931, more than ninety days after the happening of the accident so that it was impossible for the plaintiffs to comply with the language of the statute. A claim was filed on the 90th day after the effective date of the statute which was held to be compliance with it. The effect of that holding is this: Where a statute of limitation takes effect after a cause of action has accrued, and bars the remedy, the plaintiff will be given a reasonable time after such effective date in which to comply with its terms. The 90 days provided in the statute for filing the verified claim was held to be a reasonable time after the act went into effect within which to file the claim, and filing it within that time was held to be compliance.

When we apply the holding in the Shea case to the facts of the instant case we must conclude that the plaintiff had thirty days after the effective date of the amendment, or until October 19, 1939, in which to review the order in question. The question remains: Was this a reasonable time within which plaintiff could act to protect his rights?

What is a reasonable time within which to exercise a right has been the subject of a multitude of decisions in the courts of the various states and of the United States. It was remarked in Kinyon v. Kansas Soldiers' Compensation Board, 118 Kan. 367, 234 P. 949, that under some circumstances a period of three months within which to institute an action had been held insufficient, while under others a limitation restricted to thirty days had been upheld. Merely by way of illustration, we cite the following cases where limitations of from thirty days to eight months have been held reasonable: Randolph v. City of Springfield, 302 Mo. 33, 257 S.W. 449, 31 A.L.R. 612; Mulvey v. City of Boston, 197 Mass. 178, 83 N.E. 402, 14 Ann.Cas. 349; Osborne v. Lindstrom, 9 N.D. 1, 81 N.W. 72, 46 L.R.A. 715, 81 Am.St.Rep. 516; Steele v. Gann, 197 Ark. 480, 123 S.W.2d 520, 120 A.L.R. 754; Crawford v. Hunt, 41 Ariz. 229, 17 P.2d 802, and Wheeler v. Jackson, 137 U.S. 245, 11 S.Ct. 76, 34 L.Ed. 659, 664.

In California we have various statutes of repose. In certain street improvement proceedings a property owner must file objections in periods ranging from ten to thirty days or he will be considered to have waived non-jurisdictional objections. See Warren v. Russell, 129 Cal. 381, 62 P. 75; Williams v. Bergin, 108 Cal. 166, 41 P. 287; Smith v. Hazard, 110 Cal. 145, 42 P. 465; Chase v. Trout, 146 Cal. 350, 80 P. 81. A contest of an election, except on certain grounds, must be filed in thirty days (Sec. 8511, Elections Code, St.1939, p. 263; McClintock v. Abel, 21 Cal.App.2d 11, 68 P.2d 273), but formerly in forty days. Carlson v. Burt, 111 Cal. 129, 43 P. 583. An action on a rejected claim against an estate must be filed within three months after notice of rejection. Sec. 714, Probate Code; Fifield v. Bullwinkel, 81 Cal.App. 440, 253 P. 962.

The foregoing cases are illustrative of those in which quite brief periods of limitations have been upheld. On the other hand there are well considered cases holding that a reduction of the time for bringing an action to three years was unreasonable and could not be enforced. Some of those cases are cited in the notes to American Jurisprudence already referred to.

Our study of the question has led us to the conclusion that there is no hard and fast rule as to what is a reasonable limitation of time within which to bar a party bringing an action or protecting a property right. That question is usually left to the sound discretion of the legislature, which will not be disturbed except in case of an abuse of that discretion, subject to an exception important here, that where the period of limitation has been reduced it cannot be so reduced as to destroy an existing right of action. This exception seems to be generally recognized in the various jurisdictions.

In applying these rules to the instant case we must first consider when plaintiff's cause of action would have been barred under the statute in effect in 1938, or in other words, when he would have been injuriously affected by the pledge of his stabilization pool raisins to secure the debts of others.

[27] We must remember that each borrowing grower signed a non-recourse contract whereby he pledged both his free raisins and his raisins in the stabilization pool as security for the money loaned him by Commodity Credit Corporation. This was the primary security for repayment of the loan. As further and additional security the raisins of the non-borrowing growers in the stabilization pool were pledged to secure the total of all loans. It would seem that in accordance with the principles of equity the creditor should be required to exhaust its primary security, given by the borrowing growers, before resorting to the secondary security belonging to the non-borrowing growers. If this be true all of the free raisins pledged and the raisins in the stabilization pool belonging to borrowing growers would have had to have been disposed of before it could have been determined if resort would be had to the raisins in the stabilization pool of the non-borrowing growers, for if the debts were fully paid by the raisins of the borrowing growers there would be no occasion to resort to the raisins of the non-borrowing growers. Thus the time when it would appear that plaintiff and his associates might be injuriously affected by the pledge of their stabilization pool raisins would not have arrived until November, 1939, when, it is alleged in the answers, that the stabilization pool raisins were finally disposed of. Thus (assuming the truth of the allegations in the answers) under the provisions of section 17 of the Agricultural Proration Act, as it existed in 1938, the cause of action of plaintiff would not have been barred until December, 1939. The 1939 amendment barred the cause of action on October 19, 1939, before the stabilization pool raisins had been disposed of and before plaintiff and the other non-borrowing growers could have determined whether or not they had been injuriously affected by the pledge of their stabilization pool raisins. Under these circumstances we must conclude that the amendment of 1939 did not give plaintiff and his associates a reasonable time within which to exercise their right to contest the legality of the pledge of their stabilization pool raisins to secure the debts of others, and that the provisions of the amended section cannot be controlling here as they would destroy an existing cause of action. The appropriate statute of limitation, contained in the Code of Civil Procedure, would be the only one applicable to this action as the limitation of section 17, in effect in 1938, had been abrogated by the 1939 amendment and that amendment cannot be given effect.

Whether or not the limitation of thirty days, as contained in the 1939 amendment, as affecting actions arising after its effective date is reasonable, is not involved here and has not been considered.

[28] Commodity Credit Corporation argues that section 17 of the Agricultural Proration Act furnishes a complete remedy through which the validity of a marketing program and its effect on the public, growers and packers may be judicially determined; that this is an exclusive remedy which must be followed; that the Agricultural Prorate Commission is a necessary party to any attack on its marketing program. Richfield Oil Corporation v. City of Syracuse, 287 N.Y. 234, 39 N.E.2d 219, and Myers v. Bethlehem Shipbuilding Corporation, 303 U.S. 41, 58 S.Ct. 459, 82 L.Ed. 638, are cited in support of this argument. The Richfield Oil Corporation case involved an attack on a street widening proceeding under a local improvement act which specified a procedure that must be followed to attack such proceedings where such attack did not involve the constitutionality of the act. The court held that the property owner attacking the proceeding on grounds not involving constitutionality must follow the procedure there prescribed. The Myers case involved an attack on the jurisdiction of the National Labor Relations Board in a case involving a labor dispute. The action was started in the Federal District Court. All that was held was that the National Labor Relations Act, 29 U.S.C.A. § 151 et seq., vested exclusive jurisdiction of such proceedings in the Circuit Court of Appeals so the Federal District Court had no jurisdiction of the action. Neither case can be controlling here as the brief provisions of section 17 of the Agricultural Proration Act cannot be said to lay down the procedure and afford a complete remedy to review an order of the Agricultural Prorate Commission. Its purpose is to impose a limitation on the time in which such proceedings may be instituted.

[29-31] The reasoning of defendants in support of this argument is not at all clear. We take it to be this: It is provided in the section that an order may be reviewed by a court within thirty days of the effective date of the order; that the word "review", we assume the argument to be, must be construed as a writ of review as known in the law. Such an argument cannot prevail in California as a writ of review can not be directed to a board having state wide jurisdiction. Standard Oil Co. v. State Board of Equalization, 6 Cal.2d 557, 59 P.2d 119. To give the act such a construction would be to nullify it which is contrary to the established rules of statutory construction. We believe the word "review" is used in the section in the very general sense of a critical study or examination in any appropriate action in a court of competent jurisdiction.

[32] While the Agricultural Prorate Commission might have been a proper party to this action it was not a necessary party. The purpose of the action was to enjoin the payment to Commodity Credit Corporation of money derived from the sale of raisins of non-borrowing growers in the stabilization pool and to recover from that corporation money paid to it which had its source in such sale. Agricultural Prorate Commission had none of that money under its control and, as far as the pleadings disclose, had nothing to do with the sale of those raisins and the payment of money to Commodity Credit Corporation.

In view of the present state of the pleadings the parties should be given a reasonable time within which to file amended pleadings.

The judgment is reversed with directions to the trial court to permit the parties to file amended pleadings if they be so advised.

Where respondent filed no brief, appellate court was entitled to accept as true statement of facts in appellants' brief.

2. Trial 🔑404(1)

Findings that water distributing system was used to deliver water to about 75 residences in unincorporated residence district adjacent to municipality in consideration of monthly payments supported contention that such system was a "public utility" subject to regulation of railroad commission. 3. Waters and water courses 🔑188(2)

A water company is a "public utility" subject to regulation of railroad commission when it holds itself out, expressly or impliedly, as engaged in the business of supplying water to the public as a class, not necessarily to all of the public, but to any limited portion of it, such portion, for example, as can be served by its system, as contradistinguished from one holding itself out as serving or ready to serve only particular individuals, either as a matter of accommodation or for other reasons peculiar and particular to them. Where appeal was not taken from order striking from files a cross-complaint against one not otherwise a party to the action and appeal from judgment for plaintiff against defendant was taken after time for taking appeal from such order had expired, appeal as to cross-complainant would be dismissed.

Appeal from Supreme Court, Stanislaus County; B. C. Hawkins, Judge.

Action by Dora B. Trask against Joseph A. Moore and Arlie S. Moore to quiet title to water distributing system, for an accounting and other relief, wherein the defendants filed a cross-complaint against Edward Ealey. From a judgment for plaintiff and cross-defendant, the defendants and cross-complainants appeal.

Attempted appeal as to cross-defendant dismissed, and judgment in favor of plaintiff reversed.

T. B. Scott and Nathan B. McVay, both of Modesto, for appellants.

Francis O. Hoover, of Modesto, for respondent.

DOOLING, Justice pro tem.

Defendants appeal from a judgment quieting title in plaintiff to "that certain water distributing system including the pipes, situate in the Modesto High School Tract now in the possession of defendants and formerly connected to wells and pumping plants located upon Lots 7 and 8, in Block 'D' and Lots 22 and 23, in Block 'B' of the Modesto High School Tract"; directing defendants to reconnect said distributing system to said wells and pumping plants; and decreeing that plaintiff is entitled to an accounting by defendants of all moneys received by them from the operation of said distributing system from November 18, 1940. The notice of appeal further recites that defendants as cross-complainants appeal from the judgment in favor of cross-defendant Ealey.

[1] Plaintiff and respondent Trask has filed no brief on this appeal and this court is therefore entitled to accept as true, in deciding the appeal from the judgment in her favor, the statement of facts set out in appellants' brief. Zeigler v. Bonnell, 52 Cal.App.2d 217, 126 P.2d 118; Ramacciotti v. Galiano, 59 Cal.App.2d 8, 137 P.2d 722. From this source the following facts appear: The Modesto High School Tract is an unincorporated residence district adjacent to the City of Modesto. On and prior to February 21, 1939, cross-defendant Ealey owned the lots mentioned in the judgment. On that date he executed a deed of trust of these lots to secure the payment to respondent Trask of a promissory note. Upon default in the payment of this note the property was sold under the deed of trust, and respondent Trask purchased the property at the trustee's sale. Before this sale, but after execution of the deed of trust, cross-defendant Ealey sold the same lots to appellants Moore and by a separate conveyance transferred to appellants the water distributing system. The portion of the distributing system here involved lies entirely outside the lots covered by the deed of trust, and consists largely of pipes and mains laid in the streets and alleys of the Modesto High School Tract. Before the trial of the action appellants Moore had disconnected the distributing system from the pumps on plaintiff's lots and connected it to a pumping system on other lands owned by themselves. The court found that the distributing system, although lying entirely outside the lots described in the deed of trust, was covered by such deed, apparently on the theory that the distributing system was an appurtenance of such lots. This conclusion is attacked on appeal but we need not decide that question.

The trial court made the following findings with regard to the distributing system:

"II. That at that time there was situated upon said premises two wells and pumping plants. That the said pumping plants were established for the purpose of furnishing water to residents in said Modesto High School Tract, and did furnish to approximately 75 homes water pumped by the said pumping plants from underneath said lots and also other lots not owned by said Ealeys, said distribution being by means of a system of pipes connected to said pumping plants and leading to the various homes so served.

"That on or about 1935 there was one pump on said Lots 22 and 23 in Block B, and that said pump was used to pump water which was distributed through pipes to certain people living in said Modesto High School Tract; that in 1937 a second pump was installed from which water was pumped to people living in said Modesto High School Tract; that said people who used said water paid so much a month to said Ealeys."

"IV. That at the time said deed of trust was made, executed and delivered by said Ealeys to said plaintiff, Dora B. Trask, and for a long time prior thereto, said pumping plants and pipes leading from said pumping plants were used to deliver water to residences in said Modesto High School Tract.

"That the Railroad Commission of the State of California did not authorize said Ealeys to execute said note and said deed of trust on said property.

"That at the time said note and deed of trust was given by Ealeys to said plaintiff there were about seventy residences in which people lived that were being supplied with water and were making monthly payments to Ealeys for same."

[2, 3] These findings support appellants' position that the system here in question was a public utility. "A water company is a public utility when it holds itself out, expressly or impliedly, as engaged in the business of supplying water to the public as a class, not necessarily to all of the public, but to any limited portion of it, such portion, for example, as can be served by its system, as contradistinguished from one holding itself out as serving or ready to serve only particular individuals, either as a matter of accommodation or for other reasons peculiar and particular to them." 26 Cal.Jur. 459; Samuel Edwards Associates v. Railroad Comm., 196 Cal. 62, 70, 235 P. 647; Nail v. Jacks, 201 Cal. 668, 258 P. 593; Babcock v. C. W. Clarke Co., 213 Cal. 389, 2 P.2d 155.

The public utilities act provides in § 52(d), Deering's Gen.Laws 1937, act 6386, p. 3167: "All stock and every stock certificate or other evidence of interest or ownership, and every bond, note or other evidence of indebtedness, of a public utility, issued without an order of the [railroad] commission authorizing the same then in effect shall be void * * *."

[4] Under the express language of this section the note and deed of trust insofar as they may have attempted to make the property of a public utility security for the debt "without an order of the commission authorizing the same then in effect" were rendered void. For this reason the judgment in favor of plaintiff and respondent Trask must be reversed.

On the attempted appeal from the judgment in favor of cross-defendant Ealey the following appears from the record. A cross-complaint was filed against Ealey and he was brought in as a cross-defendant by order of court. On January 15, 1942, the trial court made an order striking the cross-complaint from the files. The judgment was rendered on May 11, 1942, and contains by way of recital only the statement "the cross-complaint having been stricken from the files upon motion of the cross-defendant." Notice of appeal was filed July 17, 1942, and purports to appeal only from the judgment entered on May 11, 1942.

[5, 6] The order of January 15, 1942, striking the cross-complaint from the files was as to Ealey the cross-defendant, not otherwise a party to the action, a final and appealable judgment. Howe v. Key System Transit Co., 198 Cal. 525, 246 P. 39; Young v. Superior Court, 16 Cal.2d 211, 105 P.2d 363; Halterman v. Pacific Gas & Elec. Co., 22 Cal.App.2d 592, 71 P.2d 855. The notice of appeal, even if liberally construed as an attempt to appeal from this order of January 15, 1942, was filed too late.

The attempted appeal as to cross-defendant Ealey is dismissed. The judgment in favor of plaintiff is reversed.

FIRST NAT. BANK OF RICHMOND v. THOMPSON et al.

Civ. 12418.

District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California.

Aug. 2, 1943.

1. Limitation of actions 🔑55(5)

Where conditional buyer of gas shovel sold it without consent of conditional seller to innocent third parties who openly removed and retained the shovel, a cause of action for "conversion" of shovel arose immediately on sale to third parties without demand for return thereof, and hence action in claim and delivery brought against third parties more than three years after date of sale to them was barred by limitations. Code Civ.Proc. § 338, subd. 3.

See Words and Phrases, Permanent Edition, for all other definitions of "Conversion".

2. Limitation of actions 🔑95(1)

Where there was an actual conversion of gas shovel resulting from its wrongful sale by conditional buyer to innocent third parties, that conditional seller had no knowledge of its cause of action did not toll running of three-year limitation from date of sale to third parties. Code Civ. Proc. § 338, subd. 3.

Appeal from Superior Court, Mendocino County; W. D. L. Held, Judge.

Action by the First National Bank of Richmond against Ira Thompson and another in claim and delivery to recover possession of a gas shovel or judgment for its value together with damages for its detention. From an adverse judgment, the plaintiff appeals.

Charles Kasch, of Ukiah, for appellant.

Preston & Gibson, of Ukiah, for respondents.

WARD, Justice.

This is an action in claim and delivery to recover possession of a Speeder gas shovel, or a judgment for its value, together with damages for its detention by defendants.

The facts are undisputed. On September 13, 1934, plaintiff, the owner of the shovel, entered into a conditional sales contract with E. H. Higgins for its sale for the amount of $1,000. Twenty-five dollars was paid on the execution of the contract, and the balance was to be paid in monthly installments, with interest on balances at the rate of 6% per annum. The contract gave the seller the option, upon default, to declare all unpaid sums immediately due with the right to sue therefor, or to retake possession of the equipment and credit the purchaser with the reasonable value thereof, or resell it, and in either event, to recover any deficiency. Notwithstanding Higgins paid only the initial payment of $25, and on November 4, 1937, the sum of $77.64 as interest, plaintiff allowed the shovel to remain in his possession, and he used it in construction work in which he was engaged. When the equipment had been badly wrecked Higgins placed it in his storage lot, located about two blocks from plaintiff's establishment, where it remained for a period of more than two years, during which time the bank endeavored to find a purchaser at a price of $300. At the same time it gave Higgins "verbal authority to sell the equipment on approval of the bank of any deal that was made." In July 1938, Higgins, representing himself to be the owner, offered to sell the equipment to defendants for the sum of $400. He advised the bank that "he had a friend up on the coast that might desire to take this machine up there and repair it and use it in digging a drainage ditch across his place, and he would do that repair work for the use of the machine." Incidentally, no evidence was offered to prove that this "friend up on the coast" was either of the defendants. The bank, relying upon such representation, agreed to the arrangement, and on July 28, 1938, defendants paid Higgins the $400 and received delivery of the equipment, which they removed to their ranch, repaired at an expense of approximately $600 and have ever since used in their work. They at all times continued to believe Higgins to be the owner of the equipment. Appellant states that at no time did it suspect that the transaction with the "friend up on the coast" was other than a "use-repair" job as had been represented; that from time to time its representative attempted to learn from Higgins and his son the name and location of the party in possession of the shovel, but that they evaded him in various ways and the information was never furnished. Finally, it became necessary for the bank to take over all the equipment that Higgins had under conditional sale, and Higgins disappeared. Shortly thereafter, the bank, having a prospective purchaser for the shovel, located it in the possession of respondents, upon whom, on November 22, 1941, it served a demand in writing for its possession. Delivery was refused and this action was filed on January 7, 1942. The value of the equipment at the date of the trial was stipulated to be the sum of $350.

The court held that plaintiff's cause of action was barred by subdivison 3 of section 338, Code Civ.Proc., the complaint having been filed on January 7, 1942, more than three years after July 28, 1938, the date of the purported sale by Higgins to respondents; also, that the plaintiff was estopped to set up its title as against defendants. Judgment followed in defendants' favor and plaintiff appeals.

Appellant points out in its argument that Higgins was given verbal authority to sell the shovel only "on approval of the bank of any deal that was made"; that the bank's consent to his transfer of possession to respondents was upon his statement that the transaction represented "a use-repair job"; that Higgins sold not only without appellant's approval, but without its knowledge; that appellant is not presumed to have waived facts of the existence of which it was unaware, and, finally, that in any event no cause of action arose until demand was made on November 22, 1941, which fixes the date from which the statute commenced to run.

An action to recover personal property, or for the taking, detaining or injuring of such property must be commenced within three years. Code Civ.Proc. sec. 338. Appellant's demand on respondents for the return of the shovel was made, and this action filed, more than three years after the transfer from the conditional vendee to respondents.

[1, 2] According to the agreement, the conditional vendee had no authority to sell without appellant's consent. To sell surreptitiously was a breach of that agreement. The sale constituted a representation that he was transferring an absolute title, and a cause of action against the transferee of the property immediately arose, their claim being hostile to that of appellant. The latter made no demand for payments of installments due, and respondents did not pay or offer to pay such installments. The facts prove a conversion by respondents though innocent purchasers of the property. 24 Cal.Jur., p. 1028, sec. 6, 6 Cal.Jur. 525. The court found that "said shovel is not wrongfully detained by said defendants or either of them" and the evidence shows that the taking by Higgins was wrongful from the outset. In California under such circumstances no demand was legally necessary as a prerequisite to the accrual of the cause of action. Coy v. E. F. Hutton & Co., 44 Cal.App.2d 386, 112 P.2d 639; 141 A.L.R. 375. Appellant consented to the use, not the sale, of the shovel. It may be mentioned that while the sale was surreptitious on the part of Higgins, respondents removed and retained the shovel openly and notoriously. The tortious act of Higgins, who is not a party to this action, and the acts of respondents, constitute a conversion of appellant's property. Harpending v. Meyer, 55 Cal. 555; San Francisco Credit C. House v. Wells, 196 Cal. 701, 239 P. 319; Reed v. Molony, 38 Cal. App.2d 405, 101 P.2d 175. The fact that the appellant had no knowledge of its cause of action does not toll the statute of limitations where there has been an actual conversion. Coy v. E. F. Hutton & Co., supra; Byer v. Canadian Bank of Commerce, 8 Cal.2d 297, 65 P.2d 67; Rose v. Dunk-Harbison Co., 7 Cal.App.2d 502, 46 P.2d 242.

The finding and conclusion that the action is barred by the statute of limitations (Code Civ.Proc. sec. 338, subd. 3) must be upheld. This conclusion eliminates the necessity for considering respondents' contention that appellant was estopped to maintain the action.

The judgment is affirmed.

LLOYD CORPORATION, LIMITED, et al. v. INDUSTRIAL ACCIDENT COMMISSION et al.

Civ. 14037.

District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 3, California.

July 27, 1943.

Hearing Denied Sept. 23, 1943.

1. Workmen's compensation 🔑1432

Evidence held sufficient to support Industrial Accident Commission's finding of decedent's special employment by oil well owner and operator when fatally injured while working as welder in completion and bringing in of well under contract of his general employer with such owner.

2. Workmen's compensation 🔑208

A corporate oil well owner and operator, directing work on its own equipment by welder, sent to owner by contractor at owner's request, exercised sufficient control over work to render owner jointly liable with contractor, as such welder's general employer, for compensation for welder's death from injuries sustained while doing work, even if there was some division of authority and control over work as between owner and contractor.

Proceeding on writ of review by the Lloyd Corporation, Limited, the Zurich General Accident Liability Insurance Company, Limited, and others to annul an award of compensation by the Industrial Accident Commission to Rachel Bethel Burleson and others for the death of Arthur A. Burleson, employee, as against the insurance company.

Award affirmed.

J. L. Kearney and Herbert S. McCartney, Jr., both of Los Angeles, for petitioners.

Everett A. Corten and Fred G. Goldsworthy, both of San Francisco, for respondents.

SHINN, Acting Presiding Justice.

Upon a hearing before the Industrial Accident Commission an award was made, which was confirmed on rehearing, in favor of the widow and daughters of Arthur A. Burleson, who was fatally injured in an explosion while working as a welder in the completion and bringing in of an oil well. The award was against State Compensation Insurance Fund, as insurer of the drilling contractor, Drilling and Exploration Company, and Zurich General Accident Liability Insurance Company, Ltd., insurer of Lloyd Corporation, Ltd., owner and operator of the well, upon findings that the contractor was the general employer and that Lloyd was the special employer of Burleson at the time of the accident. Zurich Company and Lloyd Corporation seek annulment of the award as against the former upon the ground that the evidence before the commission was insufficient to prove that the relationship of employer-employee existed as between Lloyd and Burleson.

[1] The contractor agreed to do certain drilling and repair work upon two oil wells of the operator, was to receive a flat sum for rigging up and taking out its equipment, a stipulated daily rental for the equipment, and its pay roll expenses in the work. The arrangement between the companies was one which called for a measure of collaboration in the work. The wells had been drilled two or three years before and D. & E. was working under a contract of re-employment to do repair work on them at the time of the accident. The agreement, which was evidenced by a letter from the contractor to the owner, did not specify the repair work to be done. It does not appear that Lloyd had anything to do with this work, which consisted in part of further drilling, other than to direct D. & E., generally, as to the results to be accomplished. We have referred to the terms of the agreement and the nature of the work undertaken not because they are material to the questions to be decided, but only because they explain the relations between the two companies in the work and the fact that Lloyd had equipment of its own at the wells on which welding was sometimes required and which was entirely separate from the equipment furnished and used by D. & E. Burleson was in the employ of the contractor as a welder at wages of approximately $1 per hour; his services were furnished by the contractor to the operator to work upon the latter's equipment whenever requested, and for the time thus spent the contractor charged the operator $3 per hour, which covered Burleson's services, and a rental charge for the use of the contractor's truck and welding equipment, which Burleson used in his work.

The work on one of the wells had progressed to the point where it was being brought onto production. At the time of the fatal accident Burleson was in the cellar of the well, welding a riser nipple to a flange on the casing, the purpose of which was to extend tubing to the floor of the derrick where a "Christmas tree" was to be added for control of the well.

The commission was called upon to decide whether Burleson in this welding operation was in the employ of D. & E. exclusively or had been furnished by that company to Lloyd and was then also in the employ of Lloyd for the special purpose of doing welding on the latter's equipment. After reviewing extensive evidence addressed to this point, we conclude that it was sufficient to support the finding of a special employment.

D. & E. had a superintendent on the job who directed the work of the drilling crews and also Burleson's work as a welder when working for D. & E. Burleson's compensation was the same whether he was working for D. & E. or for Lloyd, but when he worked for the latter he kept his time separate, which was billed to and paid by Lloyd at the rate we have stated. At these times he also turned in time cards to Lloyd, which were O. K.ed by the latter's foreman. His services on the day of the accident were billed and paid for in this manner. Lloyd kept a superintendent of its own on the job, who called for the services of Burleson when they were required by Lloyd. Under the superintendent was a foreman who conferred with him each day about the work to be done and carried out the instructions he received. On the day of the accident the foreman informed the superintendent that there was welding to be done, was advised that Burleson would be sent for, and Burleson shortly thereafter came to do the work. Burleson and the foreman brought up the welding truck, and at the foreman's direction Burleson made one weld in an oil line and did some work on bolts to fit the "Christmas tree." The foreman and Burleson then talked to Lloyd's superintendent about welding the riser nipple and were told to "get busy and get it done." After the cellar was tested for gas, the welding was undertaken and the explosion occurred. Burleson was an experienced welder, was given no specific instructions as to how to make any of the welds and needed none. Lloyd's foreman helped him in his work by measuring pipe, lining it up, and directing where welding was to be done. There was testimony that it is customary for the well owner to issue orders when the well is being brought in and to direct the manner in which the work shall be done, and that Lloyd, upon the occasion in question, was supervising the work of bringing in the well. There was further testimony that the welding which Burleson was doing at the time was a part of the bringing in of the well and that the superintendent of D. & E., although present while the well was being brought in, was there only part of the time, took no part in the work, and gave no orders as to how the well was to be completed. This, he testified, was because the work of bringing in a well is customarily under the direction of the owner.

[2] A reasonable conclusion from the facts thus briefly stated would be that Burleson, immediately before and at the time of the accident, was subject to and was working under the directions of Lloyd. He was not receiving directions from D. & E. and was working on equipment which was being installed under the direction of Lloyd. The general purport of the testimony is to the effect that when Burleson was sent to Lloyd, at the latter's request, he worked under Lloyd's direction, and that he was so working at the time of the fatal accident. During the times when he was working on Lloyd's equipment there seems to have been no division of authority and control over his work as between Lloyd and D. & E., although D. & E. might have had the right to recall him at any time. But even if there had been some division of authority and control, certainly that exercised by Lloyd was sufficient to make it jointly liable with the general employer, under the principles stated in Department of Water and Power v. Industrial Acc. Comm., 1934, 220 Cal. 638, 641, 32 P.2d 354, and cases there cited. See also Silberman v. Industrial Acc. Com., 1943, 21 Cal.2d 609, 134 P.2d 228.

The award is affirmed.

BISHOP, Justice pro tem.

Plaintiff, as a trustee faced with rival claims to the corpus of the trust which it had become duty bound to distribute to someone, brought this action to secure a judgment designating the proper distributee. From the judgment, which instructs the plaintiff to deliver the trust fund and property to the estate of the widow of Francis S. Ott, his brother appeals.

Francis S. Ott and Phebe Ott, husband and wife, executed the trust agreement appointing the plaintiff as trustee. The property assigned to the trustee was the separate property of the husband, consisting of the personal property to be distributed to him from the estate of his sister. In general, the trust provided for semi-annual payments of income and of a small fraction of the principal to the two trustors so long as they both live, and to the survivor of the two during his or her lifetime. The first paragraph of the Fifth subdivision of the trust instrument leads us toward the point of conflict in this case. It reads: "Fifth: Upon the death of the survivor of the Trustors, the Trustee shall distribute the entire principal of the Trust Estate, or so much thereof as then remains, together with any undistributed income therefrom, to such persons and in such manner and proportions as the Trustor, Francis S. Ott, shall appoint by his Last Will and Testament duly admitted to probate in the State of California, or in default of such appointment or to the extent to which same shall not be effective, to the heirs of such Trustor, as such heirs shall then be determined in accordance with the laws of succession of the State of California now in full force and effect, and this Trust shall thereupon cease and terminate."

The trust agreement was executed in March of 1930. Francis S. Ott died in June of the same year, leaving a will which he had made in July of the previous year and which was duly admitted to probate in the State of California. By this will two specific bequests were made, one to Louis L. Ott, his brother, the appellant here, in "the sum of Ten Dollars ($10.00) in cash, and no more," and the other, the sum of five hundred dollars, to the Midnight Mission, Inc. Again it is the fifth subdivision of the instrument that merits detailed attention: "I give, devise and bequesth to my beloved wife, Phebe Ott, of Los Angeles, California, all the rest and residue of my estate, both real, personal and mixed, of every kind and nature, wherever the same may be situate, absolute, forever." Upon the death of the wife in February of 1941, the plaintiff, as trustee, had one remaining duty to perform, that is, to distribute the trust estate, consisting of about twenty-five thousand dollars in cash and one hundred shares of stock, to the proper person. If by his will Francis S. Ott had effectively appointed anyone to receive the trust estate, then the trustee's duty was to deliver it to that person. In default of such appointment, or if the appointment should prove ineffective, the trust estate should go to Louis L. Ott, the brother and only surviving heir of Francis S. Ott. The problem, before the trial court, then, was to determine whether or not Francis S. Ott had by his will made an effective appointment of some one to take the trust estate. An antecedent question may be phrased in these words: Did Francis S. Ott intend that his will should be an exercise of his reserved power?

[1, 2] The trial court found "that said Francis S. Ott, Deceased, intended to and did exercise in his Last Will above set forth, his power of appointment." We have reached the conclusion that the finding is supported. The will of Francis S. Ott purports, certainly, to devise all his real and personal property; the fifth subdivision clearly gives it that effect, following as it does the two specific bequests. Section 1330 of the Civil Code, as it read from the adoption of that code in 1872 until the section was repealed to emerge as a part of section 125, Probate Code, in 1931, provides: "Real or personal property embraced in a power to devise, passes by a will purporting to devise all the real or personal property of the testator." We entertain no doubt that the effect of section 1330 has not been affected by its reenactment in a new context and in new words (Prob.Code, sec. 2; Childs v. Gross, 1940, 41 Cal.App.2d 680, 687, 688, 107 P.2d 424), but we do not need to so hold, for the section, being one of interpretation, continues to control in this case, where the will and trust agreement were both drawn before the section was rewritten into the Probate Code. See Medical Finance Ass'n v. Wood, 1936, 20 Cal.App.Supp.2d 749, 750, 63 P.2d 1219, and cases cited. By virtue of section 1330, therefore, the will was properly interpreted as an exercise of the power, to devise the trust property, which the trustor-husband had retained.

[3] The fact that the will was written before the trust agreement was executed does not except it from the effect section 1330, Civil Code, gives it. "A power existing at the donee's death but created after the execution of his will is effectively exercised thereby if the will is an otherwise effective appointment." Restatement, Property, sec. 344, "donee" having been defined, in section 319, as the person in whom the power to appoint is created or reserved. See also Annotation, 91 A.L.R. 631-642.

[4, 5] It is true, of course, that Phebe Ott would never receive the trust property into her own hands, because so long as she lived the trustee would hold it. But a provision that property held in trust for the benefit of a person during his lifetime shall vest absolutely in him upon his death, is not so incongruous that it is not to be given effect. In Estate of Wilson, 1920, 184 Cal. 63, page 68, 193 P. 581, 583, it is stated: "* * * it has often been held that there is no legal inconsistency in an heir who is made a life tenant by a will being included among 'the heirs' to whom the remainder is given." In Estate of Goldberg, 1938, 10 Cal.2d 709, 76 P.2d 508, 509, there was involved a will which placed certain property in trust for Fritz, a son of the testator, followed by the provision: "Should my son Fritz die without either wife or child then said property shall vest absolutely in my children Gustave-Fritz-Amelia and Mrs. Emma Blue." Some thirty-five years later Fritz died, and the question before the court had to do with the proper decree of distribution. It was held that Fritz (though deceased) should have been named as a distributee, the court stating (page 714 of 10 Cal.2d, page 511 of 76 P.2d): "it appears as a matter of law that the estate of Fritz was empowered to take as a remainderman." The circumstance that Phebe Ott would of necessity be deceased when the trust property was to be delivered to the person to be appointed by the will of her husband, does not require us to conclude that the trial court should not have found that her husband intended his will to be an exercise of his reserved power of appointment.

The judgment is affirmed.

CHURCHMAN v. SONOMA COUNTY et al.

No. 12412.

District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California.

July 24, 1943.

Rehearing Denied Aug. 23, 1943.

Hearing Denied Sept. 20, 1943.

1. Negligence ⚷56(1)

Where one has been put in sudden peril by negligence of another and, in an instinctive effort to escape such peril, either suffers injury himself or does injury to a third person, negligent act is "proximate cause" of injury notwithstanding that under different circumstances such person might and ought to have seen and avoided latter danger.

See Words and Phrases, Permanent Edition, for all other definitions of "Proximate Cause".

2. Negligence ⚷58

Where defendant's negligence creates a condition which plaintiff reasonably apprehends to be a source of danger to himself, defendant is liable to plaintiff for an injury received by plaintiff in a natural and reasonable attempt to escape from apprehended danger.

3. Automobiles ⚷282

Where, by reason of county's negligence in maintaining road, motorist was placed in a position in which imminent peril was reasonably apprehended when his automobile overturned and motorist was injured while attempting to escape from automobile after it had come to rest, county's negligence was "proximate cause" of motorist's injuries.

4. Automobiles ⚷282

Where plaintiff's automobile, by reason of county's negligence in maintaining road, overturned and was teetering at an angle of 45 degrees, and plaintiff, an elderly man, was unsuccessful in effort to get out by himself, plaintiff was in a "perilous situation" which authorized attempt to escape from automobile when assistance arrived and injuries received in such attempt were "proximately caused" by original negligence of county.

See Words and Phrases, Permanent Edition, for all other definitions of "Perilous Situation".

5. Appeal and error 🔑1008(1)

Where motorist's automobile overturned as result of county's negligence in maintaining road and came to rest teetering at a 45 degree angle, whether motorist exercised due care in attempting to extricate himself from automobile was for trier of facts.

6. Automobiles 🔑306(8)

In motorist's action against county for injuries sustained when motorist was attempting to extricate himself from automobile which overturned as result of county's negligence in maintaining road, evidence sustained finding that motorist was not negligent.

7. Automobiles 🔑306(8)

Where evidence disclosed that defective condition of pavement which gave way under motorist's automobile by reason of erosion of soil underneath pavement was not apparent to one driving along road, motorist's testimony that he was familiar with highway and had observed holes and depressions therein which had been filled with dirt did not establish contributory negligence on motorist's part so as to relieve county of liability for injuries sustained by motorist in attempting to extricate himself from his overturned automobile.

8. Automobiles 🔑284

Where pavement at edge of highway gave way under motorist's automobile causing it to overturn as motorist was meeting another automobile and there was nothing to warn motorist of danger, county's contention that motorist should have stopped to let other automobile pass was without merit.

9. Automobiles 🔑306(7)

Where motorist was injured while attempting to extricate himself from automobile which overturned when pavement gave way, evidence sustained finding that motorist's injuries were proximate result of defective condition of highway and thereby authorized judgment against county road commissioner. Appeal from Superior Court, Sonoma County; Hilliard Comstock, Judge.

Action by J. W. Churchman against County of Sonoma and others for injuries sustained as plaintiff was attempting to leave his automobile after it had overturned as the result of defendant's negligence in maintaining roadway. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants County of Sonoma and Marshall M. Wallace, as County Road Commissioner of the County of Sonoma, appeal.

Affirmed.

Barrett & McConnell, of Santa Rosa (A. Dal Thomson, of San Francisco, of counsel), for appellants.

Geary & Tauzer, of Santa Rosa (John H. Moskowitz, of Santa Rosa, of counsel), for respondent.

KNIGHT, Justice.

Plaintiff sued the County of Sonoma, its road commissioner, and the members of its board of supervisors to recover damages for personal injuries of a permanent nature sustained by him in attempting to extricate himself from his capsized automobile which had partly overturned into a drainage ditch alongside of the highway, as the result of the defective and dangerous condition of the edge of the pavement. The cause was tried before the court sitting without a jury, and judgment was rendered against the county and the road commissioner, from which they have appealed.

The judgment is based upon findings to the effect that the northerly side of the paved roadway at the place of the accident was in a dangerous and defective condition, in that the pavement was deprived of lateral support to the extent of rendering it incapable of carrying the weight of a motor vehicle; that the failure of the lateral support was caused by erosion of the south bank of a ditch constructed along the edge of the pavement through and along which storm and drainage waters were conveyed; that such dangerous and defective condition existed for many months prior to the accident, and that appellants were aware of such condition but did not remedy the same, nor place any signs or barriers on the road to warn the motoring public of its dangerous and defective condition; that on account of such dangerous, defective and generally unsafe condition the edge of the pavement underneath the wheels of respondent's automobile gave way, causing the automobile to tip over into the drainage ditch; "That as a direct and proximate result of the dangerous and defective condition of said highway as hereinbefore described and the failure and neglect of said Defendants County of Sonoma and the said County Road Commissioner, and each of them, for a reasonable time after acquiring knowledge and receiving notice of the dangerous, hazardous and defective condition thereof to remedy the same and the failure and neglect of said Defendants for a reasonable time after acquiring knowledge and receiving notice of the dangerous and hazardous and defective condition of said highway hereinbefore described the said Plaintiff received severe injuries consisting of the following: A fracture of the right temporal bone, a fracture of the right clavicle, concussion of the brain, two fractured ribs and severe nervous and mental shock and strain, all of which has rendered and does now render the said Plaintiff lame, sick, sore and disabled; that said injuries received by the Plaintiff are permanent in character and by reason thereof the Plaintiff has been damaged in the sum of Twenty-five Hundred Dollars ($2500.00)." The trial court further found that in no manner connected with the accident was plaintiff guilty of contributory negligence.

Appellants make no claim that the evidence is insufficient to support the trial court's findings as to the dangerous and defective condition of the highway, nor do they assail the soundness of the finding that they were guilty of negligence in failing to remedy such condition or to give suitable warning of the existence thereof to the motoring public; but they contend that since plaintiff's injuries were sustained in attempting to extricate himself from his car after it had toppled over into the ditch, the trial court was in error in holding that either the dangerous and defective condition of the roadway or their negligence in failing to repair the same or give warning thereof was the proximate cause of such injuries. In other words, it is their theory that the act of respondent in attempting to extricate himself from the overturned car broke the chain of causation created by their negligence and initiated a new chain of events for the consequences of which they were not responsible. They further contend that in any event respondent was operating his automobile over and along the highway in a manner which constituted contributory negligence as a matter of law. There is no merit in any of the foregoing contentions.

The accident happened in the afternoon during the dry season of the year on a road known as the Lewis road, which lies back of Santa Rosa and leads to Healdsburg. The travelled portion of the road varied in width from 14½ to 15 feet, and was paved with a so-called California pavement approximately two inches in thickness and consisting of a combination of macadam and tar or some similar substance, and gravel and crushed rock. Along the northerly side of the road and running parallel with and adjacent to the paved portion was a dirt ditch two to three feet deep and from three to six feet wide, which had been constructed to take care of the storm and drainage waters, and several months prior to the accident the waters had washed away the lateral support of the edge of the pavement. The respondent, J. W. Churchman, an elderly man, was driving westerly in a Studebaker sedan. His wife was riding on the front seat with him. As they approached the place of the accident they met a car travelling in the opposite direction. It was being driven by a Mr. Barham, and he was accompanied by a neighbor named Mrs. Laumann, who lived nearby. Both cars were travelling at a slow speed of eight or ten miles an hour, and as they passed each other with a clearance of about a foot or a foot and a half between them the right side of the pavement under the wheels of respondent's car gave way and the car lurched and then toppled over into the ditch, throwing respondent violently against the steering wheel. The car did not fall flat on its side, but was left teetering at an angle of about 45 degrees. After first ascertaining that his wife was not injured, respondent tried to get out of the car, but could not do so because he was unable to hold the door open. Immediately after passing respondent's car Barham swung back into the middle of the roadway to make a right turn off the Lewis road onto a side road leading to Mrs. Laumann's home, and looking into the rear vision mirror of his car he saw respondent's car topple over into the ditch. Barham knew respondent, and he stopped his car at once and went back to help extricate respondent and his wife from their car. As Barham reached the car respondent and his wife were still trying to get out. Barham opened the left front door and asked if they were hurt, and they replied they were not. Barham then told Mrs. Churchman to wait until he could get Mr. Churchman out and that he would then help her out. Barham then held the door open and steadied the car while respondent climbed out on the running board. He stood up partly on the running board and partly on the body of the car, and was about to jump down to the pavement; but the edge of the running board was more than waist high above the pavement, and on account of the distance and respondent's advanced age Barham suggested that respondent "come down around the front of the car and slide over the hood towards the low side." Respondent agreed but instantly slipped and fell, his head striking hard on the pavement, knocking him unconscious, and his body slid down underneath the car. There was imminent danger that the teetering car would tilt back and crush him, so Barham directed Mrs. Laumann, who was standing nearby, to steady the car while he pulled respondent from beneath it. Mrs. Churchman was then extricated from the car and respondent was taken to the hospital where it was found that he had sustained the injuries above mentioned.

[1, 2] The legal doctrine governing cases such as this is well stated in 38 American Jurisprudence at page 736 as follows: "Where a person has been put in sudden peril by the negligent act of another, and, in an instinctive effort to escape from that peril, either suffers injury himself, or does injury to a third person, the negligent act is the proximate cause of the injury, and it is immaterial that under different circumstances he might and ought to have seen and avoided the latter danger. The intervening attempt to escape does not supersede the negligent act as the proximate cause of the injury, since it is prompted or set in motion by the negligent act. * * * Accordingly, one whose negligence creates a condition which another reasonably apprehends is a source of danger to himself is liable to the latter for an injury received by the latter in a natural and reasonable attempt to escape from the apprehended peril. Thus, if a traveller leaps from his carriage because of its near approach to a dangerous defect in the highway, or if a passenger in a railroad train, placed by the carrier's negligence in imminent peril, endeavors to escape it by leaping from the car, and thereby sustains an injury, he may, if there is no contributory negligence on his part, recover for the injury, although had he remained in the carriage or car, he would not have been injured. * * * In order for the general principle stated above to be applicable, however, the act must have been the result of fear. Moreover, the principle does not apply to preserve a cause of action unless the plaintiff was in a position of peril, either actual or apparent, caused by the negligence of the defendant."

[3] In the present case the facts show beyond question that by reason of appellants' negligence respondent and his wife were placed in a perilous situation, or at least in a position in which imminent peril to them was reasonably apprehended; and that while respondent was attempting to escape from such peril and from the dangers which one in his position reasonably could anticipate he was injured. Therefore, the case falls clearly within the legal doctrine above quoted.

[4] Appellants argue that respondent was not in a perilous situation, and in this connection they say that "there is no conceivable reason why the plaintiff could not have remained seated there for an indefinite length of time had he so desired." The fallacy of this argument is at once apparent. Here was an elderly man and his wife trapped in a closed automobile which had overturned into a ditch on a country road, and according to the positive testimony of Barham the car was teetering. Respondent tried to get out of it through his own efforts, but was unable to do so, and there was no way he could drive his car out of the ditch while it was teetering at an angle of 45 degrees. In that situation respondent might well have believed that if the car did fall on its side he or his wife, or perhaps both, would be injured thereby, or that the car would catch on fire when it fell. It would seem idle to say, therefore, that respondent was not justified in apprehending that he was in a perilous situation. He had to get out of the car some time, and obviously to have remained in the car, under the existing circumstances, after Barham came to his aid, would have been contrary to common sense.

[5, 6] Appellants also state that "there was no excuse for the plaintiff to sustain these injuries in the simple act of leaving the automobile, even under the method adopted by him"; that he "had an easy and simple course to adopt" by following the suggestion of Barham; and that by doing so he could have "reached the ground upon the right hand or low side of the car, without any risk of injury at all." The testimony given by Barham at the trial shows, however, that respondent agreed to his suggestion, but instantly fell. In any event, it is wholly immaterial whether or not he was attempting to follow Barham's suggestion when he fell, for the reason that the question of whether he failed to exercise due care in attempting to extricate himself from the overturned car was a question of pure fact for the trial court's determination, and the evidence amply supports its finding that respondent was in no way negligent or careless.

Numerous cases have been cited by appellants in furtherance of their theory that the act of respondent in seeking to extricate himself from the disabled automobile initiated a new chain of causation which brought about "a second accident"; but as shown by the analysis of those cases in respondent's brief the factual situations therein clearly differentiate them from the present case. Most of them deal with situations in which the negligent act of a third party intervened between the negligent act of the defendant and the plaintiff's injuries; others involve successive accidents wherein the act of a third party intervened; and another line of cases involves the element of intoxication, that is, where a drunken man has sustained injuries after having been ejected from a train, or where he has been injured after becoming intoxicated by reason of the sale of liquor to him by the defendant. The case upon which appellants seem particularly to rely is Johnson v. Union Furniture Co., 31 Cal.App.2d 234, 87 P.2d 917, but a glance at the decision therein shows that factually it bears no resemblance to the present case; therefore it is not here controlling.

[7] Appellants' contention that respondent was operating his car in a manner constituting contributory negligence as a matter of law is based mainly upon respondent's testimony that he was familiar with the highway and that in travelling over it on several other occasions he had observed holes and depressions therein which had been filled with dirt. The evidence definitely shows, however, that the dangerous and defective condition of the edge of the pavement which gave way under respondent's car was not apparent to one driving along the road. The erosion of the soil was underneath the pavement, and the dangerous condition of the pavement was revealed only by an inspection of the ditch and the subsurface. As one witness described it, a person walking along the road would not "know it was undermined because you couldn't see it. The only way you could see it would be to get down in the ditch." Clearly, therefore, in the absence of any warning signs along the highway respondent had the right to assume that the entire paved portion of the road would be strong enough to support the weight of an automobile.

[8] Appellants argue also that there was no reason why respondent should not have stopped his car to let the Barham car pass. It will be noted, however, that this was a regular two lane highway along which no signs or other markings were displayed warning motorists against travelling along the edge of the highway, nor were there any physical conditions present indicating that any of the paved portion of the road was dangerous. Respondent was justified in assuming, therefore, that the two automobiles could pass abreast in safety; and the evidence shows that they would have done so with a clearance of about a foot and a half between them had the edge of the pavement not crumbled underneath the right wheels of respondent's car. The remaining points urged by appellants under this heading have less merit than those already discussed, and therefore need not be given special attention.

[9] The cause of action against the road commissioner is based on the provisions of a statute which requires proof that "the injury sustained was the direct and proximate result of such defective or dangerous condition" (Stats.1919, p. 756, Deering's General Laws, Act 5618; italics ours); and in his behalf it is contended that the evidence herein does not measure up to that standard of proof. However, as the trier of the facts, the trial court expressly found that respondent's injuries were sustained "as a direct and proximate result of the dangerous and defective condition of said highway" (italics ours); and it is our opinion that the circumstances attending the accident were such that no other reasonable conclusion could have been reached.

The judgment is affirmed.

Appeal from Superior Court, Napa County; Percy S. King, Judge.

Suit by Columbus A. Smith, also known as C. A. Smith, and another, against Katherine S. Brown for rescission of property exchange contract and for damages, on ground of fraudulent misrepresentations. From an adverse judgment, the defendant appeals.

Reversed.

Clarence N. Riggins, of Napa, for appellant.

Wallace Rutherford, of Napa, and Joseph G. Gallagher, of San Francisco, for respondents.

NOURSE, Presiding Justice.

The plaintiffs sued for the rescission of a contract exchanging real property and for damages on the ground of fraudulent misrepresentations. The plaintiffs had judgment and defendant appeals from the judgment and especially attacks the order denying her motion for a new trial.

Plaintiffs owned real property in Napa County and defendant owned real property in Merced County. On July 5, 1939, they exchanged their properties by deeds executed, delivered and duly recorded. The property belonging to the defendant in Merced County had been encumbered by a mortgage to secure a promissory note executed in June, 1929. The payee of the note deceased in May, 1939, and at the time of the negotiations between the parties hereto the defendant had possession of both the note and mortgage, exhibited them to plaintiffs, and informed them that she had legal advice that the lien of the mortgage had been lost because the statute of limitations had run against the note, and suggested to plaintiffs that they consult the same attorney upon the same subject, which they did.

The plaintiffs also claimed that the transaction was fraudulent because of representations that the land in Merced County was unoccupied and that they could take immediate possession. Further statement of the facts will appear in our discussion of these two issues.

[1, 2] "In order that an action may lie, at law or in equity, on account of a fraudulent misrepresentation, such misrepresentation must be relied upon by the party to whom it is made * * *." 12 Cal.Jur. p. 750. "Unless an untrue statement is believed and acted upon, it can occasion no legal injury." Spinks v. Clark, 147 Cal. 439, 82 P. 45, 47. "It is a fundamental principle of the law of fraud, regardless of the form of relief sought, that in order to secure redress, the representee must have relied upon the statement or representation as an inducement to his action or injurious change of position." 23 Am.Jur. 939. Just as essential as the element of reliance upon the truth of the representations is the representee's belief that they are true, otherwise there is no deceit. Idem. p. 943. Accordingly recovery is not permitted when the representee makes his own investigation, discovers the true facts, and acts without reliance upon the representations. 12 Cal. Jur. p. 760. Nor may he recover where the alleged misrepresentations by one occupying no confidential relation toward him are but expressions of opinion, or statements of law, based upon facts known to both alike. Rheingans v. Smith, 161 Cal. 362, 365, 119 P. 494, Ann.Cas.1913B, 1140; Robbins v. Law, 48 Cal.App. 555, 560, 192 P. 118; 12 Cal.Jur. p. 731.

[3] In this we have assumed a case of fraudulent misrepresentations which is based upon statements which are both fraudulent and untrue. But, where the statements complained of are true in fact, they will not support a charge of fraud or deceit unless they were made in a manner designed to create a false impression and were so acted upon. 12 Cal.Jur. p. 743; 23 Am.Jur. p. 896.

Here the allegations of the complaint are: "That on the 5th day of July, 1939, the defendant, Katherine S. Brown, with intent to cheat and defraud the plaintiffs above named, did falsely and fraudulently represent to the plaintiffs that said property in Merced County belonging to the defendant Katherine S. Brown was free and clear of any encumbrances and that there was no cloud upon the title of the said defendant Katherine S. Brown to said property, save and except for certain accrued real estate taxes. That said defendants also represented that said property was unoccupied and that the said Katherine S. Brown could place the said plaintiffs in immediate possession thereof." The trial court found that defendant "falsely and fraudulently, and with intent to induce the plaintiffs to make such exchange, did represent that her property was free and clear of all encumbrances, save some back taxes. That said property was encumbered by a mortgage securing a note dated June 4, 1926, in the sum of Three Thousand ($3,000.00) Dollars payable to Alice Baker three years after date. That defendant knew said property was so encumbered, but falsely and fraudulently represented to plaintiffs that said mortgage was satisfied and had been released to said defendant by Alice Baker prior to the death of said Alice Baker."

[4] If this finding could have any evidence to support it the variance between the allegations and the finding would not be of serious importance. But the testimony of every witness was without the slightest conflict directly contrary to the finding. These witnesses all agreed that during the negotiations the defendant did not falsely or otherwise represent to plaintiffs that her property was "free and clear of all encumbrances," that, to the contrary, she did represent and inform them that the property was encumbered by a mortgage securing a promissory note for $3,000; that she put both note and mortgage in the hands of plaintiffs, that she informed them that she had been advised by her attorney that the note was outlawed and the lien lost, that she advised plaintiffs to seek legal advice as to the status of the mortgage, that plaintiffs consulted the same attorney and received the same legal advice.

The note and mortgage were dated June 17, 1929. Some interest had been paid on the note during the ten years it was outstanding. The payee had deceased in May, 1939. A short time before she visited the defendant and left with her the note and mortgage. The defendant has since claimed that a valid gift was made at that time, but this is not material to this litigation. What is material is that she "represented" to plaintiffs that the note and mortgage were outstanding—which was true; that she had them in her possession—which was true; that she had been advised by her attorney that the lien was extinguished because the note was outlawed—which was true (section 2911 of the Civil Code); that she advised the plaintiffs to seek legal advice as to the effect of the mortgage, that they consulted the same attorney, and received the same advice, but were further advised that some expense might be incurred "to clear the title." As a result of this advice the defendant executed a written agreement undertaking to hold plaintiffs harmless from any suit or claim arising out of the note, and to take such steps as might be necessary to secure the release of the mortgage and clear the title.

[5] The only other charge of fraud relates to the representation that the premises were vacant. The trial court made no finding on this issue, but the undisputed evidence is that a "share-crop" tenant was in possession through permission of defendant's agent without her knowledge, that plaintiffs visited the premises before the trade was made, found the tenant in possession, made an agreement with him to remain, and received about $90 from the tenant for the share of the crop.

As a part of the trade defendant paid to plaintiffs the sum of $322 which they agreed to use in payment of delinquent taxes. On the hearing of the motion for a new trial it appeared that plaintiffs had failed to pay the taxes, or to account for the money, and that the property is lost to defendant because of the forfeiture and the expiration of the period of redemption. Hence, plaintiffs are no longer able to restore the consideration—that is they cannot return to her the Merced property which they received in the trade. What rights and liabilities the respective parties may be able to establish on a retrial we cannot say. It is sufficient that the judgment appealed from has no evidentiary support.

Hearing Denied Aug. 12, 1943.

1. Poisons 🔑9

In prosecution for unlawfully possessing a preparation of codeine and apromorphine, evidence which did not disclose that defendant occupied residence wherein the preparation was found was insufficient to establish the "corpus delicti". St.1939, p. 758, § 11160.

2. Witnesses 🔑270(1)

Cross-examination on an immaterial matter is improper.

"Reputation" is not what a character witness may know about defendant, but it is the estimation in which an individual is held, that is, the character imputed to an individual rather than what is actually known of him either by the witness or others.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Clement D. Nye, Judge.

Noah Edgar McDaniel was convicted of having unlawful possession of a preparation of codeine and apromorphine, and defendant appeals.

Reversed and remanded for a new trial.

Maurice A. Gleason, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Robert W. Kenny, Atty. Gen., and Eugene M. Elson, Deputy Atty. Gen., for respondent.

DORAN, Justice.

Appellant was charged by information with the unlawful possession of a "preparation of codeine and apromorphine (opium derivatives) in violation of section 11160, Health and Safety Code of the State of California [St.1939, p. 758]". A jury trial resulted in a verdict of guilty as charged and the appeal is from the judgment which followed and from the order denying a motion for a new trial.

A careful reading of the reporter's transcript of the evidence reveals that one Mrs. Cloisea Harman, a witness for the plaintiff, testified that she was a deputy sheriff of Los Angeles County, that she visited what she described as a residence at 1226 East 58th Place in Los Angeles County. The following questions and answers then followed, viz.:

"Q. Was anyone there when you got there? A. Yes, the lady of the house, Mrs. McDaniel, and a friend of hers.

"Q. The wife of this defendant? A. Yes, sir."

The witness then testified further that she searched these premises and found the alleged opium derivatives in a small black satchel. The witness also testified "a doctor's kit and some instruments" were also found in the house. The following pertinent record of the same witness' testimony is as follows:

"Q. Now, I show you a glass jar or vial containing a lot of needles; I don't know how many, I will ask you to examine the jar and contents and state whether or not you have ever seen them before? A. I have.

"Q. When and where did you see those for the first time? * * * A. In the bag.

"Q. In the same bag which you have described to the jury which you found in the residence of this defendant? A. Yes. * * *

"Mr. Cochran (Deputy District Attorney): After you had found those objects, under the circumstances that you have related, did you later see the defendant in this case? A. Yes, sir.

"Q. When was it in reference to the time that you discovered the articles in his home? A. About a half hour later.

"Q. Where? A. At a paper box factory on Alameda, his place of employment."

The witness further testified that she, together with a deputy sheriff and one Mr. Brooks of the State Board of Medical Examiners, then visted defendant's place of employment, at which time defendant was informed that he was to be taken to the sheriff's substation for questioning. Further testimony elicited from the same witness included an alleged confession in which defendant, it was asserted in substance, admitted in reply to questions, that he practiced as a physician and surgeon; that he used the hypodermic needles and syringe on his patients and the narcotics as well.

The record further reveals that the drugs described in the information were found to be as alleged.

With the foregoing record the plaintiff rested.

[1] It is at once evident that the corpus delicti was not established. There was no evidence that defendant ever occupied the residence at 1226 East 58th Street. Reference by the witness to the so-called lady of the house as Mrs. McDaniels, the wife of the defendant, is no more than an assumption, and for all the record reveals, the information of the witness may have come from a crystal ball. The leading questions quoted from the transcript which include references to "residence of this defendant" and "in his home" are equally presumptuous and are not evidence, nor do the answers constitute evidence of anything. Nevertheless the trial proceeded. Defendant testified and in substance admitted possession; explained how the possession was obtained; denied knowledge of the nature of the substance and denied the confession.

A so-called character witness was called on behalf of defendant and on direct examination testified as follows:

"Q. Mr. Postelle, what is your business or occupation? A. I am a laborer at the Pioneer Flintkote Roofing Company.

"Q. How long have you been working there? A. Since July 1942.

"Q. Do you know whether or not the defendant was working there? A. Yes, he was when I came there.

"Q. Do you know his reputation around there where he was working for being a law abiding citizen? A. Yes.

"Q. Is it good or bad? A. Good."

[2] Notwithstanding the obvious immateriality of the foregoing testimony and notwithstanding the well-settled rule that cross-examination on an immaterial matter is improper, the following cross-examination was permitted. It is quoted by reason of its extraordinary character.

"Q. Now you say his reputation is good for being a law-abiding citizen, did you know him as a doctor? A. No.

"Q. Did you ever know that he practiced medicine on people? A. No.

"Q. Did you know that he had given people hypodermic injections of narcotics?

"Mr. Gleason: If the Court please, that is improper cross examination.

"Mr. Cochran: He has opened the gates, if the Court please.

"Mr. Gleason: Not within the issues.

"The Court: Objection sustained.

"Mr. Cochran: I might state for the purpose of the record that I can prove the particular things I am asking.

"The Court: If you intend to bring in evidence of that kind—

"Mr. Cochran: I certainly do intend to bring in that evidence.

"The Court: The objection will be overruled.

"Mr. Cochran: Q. Did you know that about this defendant? A. No.

"Q. And that he performed abortions on women and had used narcotic drugs on them? A. No.

"Q. Did you know that he had admitted having a child by another woman to whom he was not married? A. No.

"Q. You didn't know that? A. No.

"Q. Did you know that he performed an abortion upon a woman and she died? A. No.

"Q. Did you know that the defendant was charged with a felony, a sex offense against his daughter?

"Mr. Gleason: Just a moment, I cite that as misconduct for the reason that counsel knows that issue has not been heard yet. It is coming up for trial.

"The Court: Objection overruled.

"A. No.

"Mr. Cochran: That is all."

[3] Even assuming that the question on direct examination as to defendant's reputation had been a valid one, nevertheless the cross-examination recited above would have been improper. That it was highly prejudicial there can be no doubt. The questions alone were enough to produce such effect but, when the deputy district attorney asserted that, "I can prove the particular things I am asking", followed by the assertion, "I certainly do intend to bring in that evidence", the error was aggravated and the resultant injury, in the circumstances, was beyond recovery.

[4] Reputation is not what a character witness may know about defendant. Reputation is the estimation in which an individual is held; in other words, the character imputed to an individual rather than what is actually known of him either by the witness or others. By no rule of evidence would plaintiff have been permitted to "prove the particular things", referred to during the purported cross-examination.

In People v. Burke, 18 Cal.App. 72, at page 88, 122 P. 435, at page 442, appears the following: "Appellant complains bitterly of the conduct of the district attorney in his cross-examination of the character witnesses for the defense. Those witnesses testified to the good reputation of defendant for peace and quiet and also for chastity. On cross-examination they were asked if they had not heard that defendant had made a practice of committing abortions, and having improper intercourse with women, and of taking undue liberties with female patients. The court permitted these questions, but sustained an objection to the question asked of one witness if he had not heard of the defendant having been indicted by the grand jury of Lake county. No complaint is made of any question asked of the defendant himself. Under the authorities, the questions allowed by the court were properly permitted as affecting the weight of the testimony in relation to defendant's reputation. The district attorney did not claim anything as to the verity of the matters suggested or implied in his questions. The rule is that on cross-examination of character witnesses they may be asked as to specific reports concerning the trait of character involved, if they have a tendency to establish the bad reputation, although they may not be sufficient for that purpose."

There is a vast difference between inquiring about reports, rumors and the like, of a character witness and questions as to what the witness knows of defendant.

[5, 6] The argument that defendant's counsel "opened the gates" is unavailing. An error that is prejudicial is no less so because it results from a lack of knowledge on the part of either counsel or both. Legitimate cross-examination does not extend to matters improperly admitted on direct examination. Failure to object to improper questions on direct examination may not be taken advantage of on cross-examination to elicit immaterial or irrelevant testimony. The so-called "open the gates" argument is a popular fallacy. "Questions designed to elicit testimony which is irrelevant to any issue in the case on trial should be excluded by the judge, even though opposing counsel has been allowed, without objection, to introduce evidence upon the subject." 27 Cal.Jur. p. 74. "It is a settled rule that cross-examination as to matters irrelevant to the issue may and should be excluded—even though, in some cases, testimony relative thereto was elicited upon direct examination—and that a party may not, under the guise of cross-examination, introduce evidence that is not competent within the meaning of the established rules." 27 Cal.Jur. p. 106.

The Supreme Court of the United States recently observed: "We think that the trial judge should have stopped counsel's discourse without waiting for an objection. 'The United States Attorney is the representative not of an ordinary party to a controversy, but of a sovereignty whose obligation to govern impartially is as compelling as its obligation to govern at all; and whose interest, therefore, in a criminal prosecution is not that it shall win a case, but that justice shall be done. As such, he is in a peculiar and very definite sense the servant of the law, the twofold aim of which is that guilt shall not escape or innocence suffer. He may prosecute with earnestness and vigor—indeed, he should do so. But, while he may strike hard blows, he is not at liberty to strike foul ones. It is as much his duty to refrain from improper methods calculated to produce a wrongful conviction as it is to use every legitimate means to bring about a just one.'" Viereck v. United States, 318 U.S. 236, 63 S.Ct. 561, at page 566, 87 L. Ed. 734.

Respondent relies on People v. Perry, 144 Cal. 748, 78 P. 284, and People v. Mayes, 113 Cal. 618, 45 P. 860, 862. The Perry case relies on the Mayes case and the Mayes case contains the following: "Witnesses were also called on behalf of the defendant for the purpose of sustaining the testimony of other witnesses that the prosecution had attempted to impeach, and upon the cross-examination of these witnesses the prosecution was allowed to question them with reference to specific acts. While it is not permissible to give evidence of wrongful acts for the purpose of impeaching a witness, it is proper, upon cross-examination of a witness who has given testimony, either for sustaining or impeaching the credibility of another witness, to question him with reference to his knowledge of specific acts, and with reference to the specific acts themselves, for the purpose of overcoming the effect of his testimony upon the direct examination." No authority is cited to support the above doctrine nor can any be found. The quotation concedes the inadmissibility of evidence of wrongful acts for the purpose of impeaching a witness, but approves of questions on cross-examination on the same subject. The inconsistency is obvious; it permits indirectly what is conceded to be prohibited directly.

The judgment and the order denying the motion for a new trial are, and each of them is reversed; and the cause is remanded for a new trial.

YORK, P. J., and WHITE, J., concur.

On Petition for Rehearing

PER CURIAM.

The petition for a rehearing is denied. A correction in the opinion, however, is necessary. In the second paragraph thereof, the following sentence appears: "The witness also testified 'a doctor's kit and some instruments' were also found in the house." Said sentence is modified to read as follows: "The witness also testified 'a doctor's kit and some instruments' were also found."

It is urged in the petition for a rehearing that the evidence established the corpus delicti because, it is argued, it tends to show that the narcotic was in the possession of some one, which is all that the law requires.

The only evidence revealed by the record that may be regarded as tending to establish the corpus delicti is the following testimony of the witness Harman:

"Q. Will you describe those premises briefly? A. It is a residence. * * *

"Q. Did you make a search of or in and about the premises? A. Yes, we did.

"Q. What if anything did you find there, Mrs. Harman? A. We found a medical book and a doctor's kit and some instruments and I believe an appointment book."

The witness testified in substance that the narcotics were in the doctor's kit.

[7] The rule is accepted generally that prima facie evidence is sufficient to establish the corpus delicti, but evidence as casual, indefinite, uncertain and wholly lacking in particularities as the finding of something of, in or about the premises, falls far short of proving possession, even prima facie.

Cr. 3697.

District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California.

July 28, 1943.

1. Habeas corpus 🔑92(1)

On habeas corpus, scope of inquiry may extend to review of entire record in effort to ascertain whether court had jurisdiction and whether jurisdiction was exceeded.

2. Injunction 🔑230(3)

Where order enjoined defendant from withdrawing any fund of company from any bank except such as were reasonably necessary in ordinary and usual course of business, the burden was on plaintiff in contempt proceeding based on alleged violation of the order to prove what the money withdrawn from bank was used for.

3. Evidence 🔑386(1)

Oral statements made by judge at time injunction was granted and which were not incorporated in written order could not be considered in determining whether there had been contempt of court because of violation of injunction.

4. Contempt 🔑44

Jurisdiction of court in contempt cases depends on existence of evidence showing that an actual contempt of court has been committed.

5. Injunction 🔑230(3)

Where order enjoined defendant from withdrawing any funds of company from bank except such as were reasonably necessary in ordinary and usual course of business, evidence was insufficient to prove that withdrawals made by defendant were not reasonably necessary in ordinary and usual course of business and therefore court exceeded its jurisdiction in finding defendant guilty of contempt.

Habeas corpus proceeding by F. A. Clarke, also known as Frederic A. Clarke, against the sheriff of Los Angeles County to secure release from custody after commitment for contempt of court.

Order of commitment annulled and petitioner discharged from custody.

Marshall Stimson and Noel Edwards, both of Los Angeles, for petitioner.

Fred N. Howser, Dist. Atty., of Long Beach, and Jere J. Sullivan, Deputy Dist. Atty., of Los Angeles, for respondent.

YORK, Presiding Justice.

Petitioner applied for a writ of habeas corpus and was granted a hearing upon his averment that he was "imprisoned, detained, confined and restrained of his liberty by the Sheriff of Los Angeles County, State of California, in the County Jail * * * that said imprisonment, detention, confinement and restraint are illegal * * *."

The commitment of petitioner to a jail sentence of ninety-five days and the infliction of fines in the sum of $9,500 for contempt of court arose out of the civil action of Taylor v. Clarke which was initiated March 6, 1940, seeking declaratory relief and an accounting, the complaint therein alleging a partnership between the parties to the action in the Boncquet Laboratories. The answer of defendant Clarke (petitioner here) denied the partnership and alleged the existence of a lease by Taylor to Clarke whereby the latter had leased for a term of three years certain assets which had theretofore been purchased by Taylor from the Trustee in Bankruptcy of Boncquet Laboratories. Further, that from April 1, 1937 with full knowledge of Taylor, said defendant Clarke had carried on the business individually under the fictitious name of Boncquet Laboratories for his own individual benefit and profit and as sole owner thereof.

On April 24, 1940, upon hearing on an order to show cause and for appointment of a receiver and for a restraining order in said civil action, at which hearing Clarke and his attorneys were present, an injunction pendente lite issued enjoining and restraining the said Clarke "from withdrawing any funds of the business of the Boncquet Laboratories on deposit in any bank or banks, except such as are reasonably necessary in the ordinary and usual course of business, and from disposing of any of the assets of the business of the Boncquet Laboratories, either directly or indirectly, except such as is reasonably necessary in the ordinary and usual course of business, until the further order of this court." (Emphasis added.)

Thereafter, from May 1, 1940, to and including August 6, 1941, petitioner Clarke from time to time withdrew sums of money, aggregating the sum of $35,761.39, from the bank or banks where accounts were maintained by Boncquet Laboratories. Under date of June 11, 1941, L. N. Dechene subscribed to an affidavit setting forth facts constituting the alleged contempt, which facts he averred were ascertained by him wholly from certain books of account of the Boncquet Laboratories; and an order to show cause was issued thereon on June 11, 1941, against petitioner and his attorneys. On June 17, 1941, said L. N. Dechene filed an amended affidavit reciting more specifically the matters covered by the first affidavit and alleging additional facts (also gleaned by him from certain books of account) charging petitioner with violating the injunction order of April 25, 1940, i. e., the withdrawal of various sums of money from the bank, whereupon a second order to show cause based upon the amended affidavit was duly issued directed to petitioner. Thereafter, on July 23 and 24, 1941, the matter came on for hearing before the Honorable Ruben S. Schmidt, as Judge of the Superior Court of Los Angeles County, who found petitioner and his attorneys "not guilty" of contempt and ordered them discharged and the proceeding dismissed. This order was later annulled by the Supreme Court (Taylor v. Superior Court, 20 Cal.2d 244, 125 P.2d 1), and said orders to show cause in re contempt were then set for hearing before the Honorable Charles S. Burnell, as Judge of the Superior Court, who, on January 18, 1943, made his findings of fact and issued an order and decree adjudging petitioner guilty of nineteen separate contempts of court and committed petitioner to the custody of the Sheriff of Los Angeles County. Having served over fifty days of the sentence imposed upon him, petitioner seeks to procure his release from custody through the instant proceeding in habeas corpus.

The injunction pendente lite was directed against petitioner "his agents and attorneys, and counsellors" and the amended affidavit of L. N. Dechene specifically averred that certain sums of money withdrawn from the bank by petitioner were paid to and accepted by his attorneys. Both orders to show cause in re contempt issued June 11 and June 17, 1941, respectively, were directed to petitioner and his attorneys therein named. However, at the hearing on said orders to show cause before Judge Burnell, the matter was dismissed as to said attorneys, leaving petitioner "as the sole person against whom this proceeding is prosecuted."

The court found, as to each of the nineteen violations of the injunction pendente lite, that the amount specified therein as having been withdrawn from the bank "was for the personal use and benefit of the defendant, F. A. Clarke; that the withdrawal and use of said sum by said F. A. Clarke, from said account was a deliberate, intentional, and willful violation of the terms of the Restraining Order and Judgment made by the Hon. Emmet H. Wilson, on the 25th day of April, 1940 * * *; that the withdrawal and use of said sum by said F. A. Clarke, was not reasonably necessary in the ordinary and usual course of business of Boncquet Laboratories."

Further, that petitioner "withdrew the total sum of $35,761.39, from time to time, subsequent to the 25th day of April, 1940, as specifically set forth hereinabove in Findings No. V to No. XXIII, inclusive. That all of the withdrawals made by said defendant, F. A. Clarke, totalling the sum of $35,761.39, were for the personal use and benefit of said defendant, F. A. Clarke, and which sums of money were used by said F. A. Clarke, and were not reasonably necessary in the ordinary and usual course of business of Boncquet Laboratories. * * * that * * * the withdrawals * * * constitute nineteen separate and distinct, deliberate, intentional, and willful violations of the terms and provisions of the Restraining Order and Judgment * * *."

The judgment in re contempt ordered that as punishment for each of the nineteen counts, petitioner be imprisoned in the county jail for a period of five days and pay a fine of $500, and in the event of nonpayment of such fines, that he be imprisoned one day for each $2 in default, the sentences on the nineteen counts to run consecutively. It was also provided that in lieu of serving the said terms of imprisonment and paying the fines imposed, petitioner might purge himself of said contempts by returning the sum of $35,761.39 withdrawn by him and by depositing the same in a named bank to the credit of Boncquet Laboratories.

In his petition for writ of habeas corpus, petitioner avers that the total sentences imposed upon him by said judgment amount to an imprisonment of 95 days in the county jail and the payment of $9,500 in fines; and "in the event of his failure to pay said fines * * * (he) is to be imprisoned an additional day for each two dollars of said fines, being in all 4,750 days in addition to said 95 days, or a total of 4,845 days, being thirteen (13) years and one hundred (100) days."

At the hearing in re contempt before Judge Burnell, the main witness was L. N. Dechene, a public accountant, who made the affidavits upon which the contempt proceeding is founded, and who testified directly from the books of the Boncquet Laboratories respecting the items of withdrawals alleged to have been made in violation of the injunction pendente lite. The contemner Clarke produced no evidence at said hearing, but the affidavits which he made in response to the affidavits of L. N. Dechene are before this court in the instant proceeding.

In petitioner's affidavit dated June 13, 1941, in response to the order to show cause dated June 11, 1941, he alleged "that at no time since the 25th day of April, 1940, have there been and there are not now any funds of the business of the Boncquet Laboratories on deposit in any bank or banks, and that Boncquet Laboratories is not, and at no time since April 25, 1940, has been, an entity, and owns no property, money or assets, and conducts no business.

"That affiant further says that all monies or funds withdrawn by affiant from any bank or banks between the 25th day of April, 1940, and the 1st day of April, 1941, have been such as are reasonably necessary in the ordinary and usual course of business of affiant, to-wit: F. A. Clarke, doing business under the fictitious firm name and style of Boncquet Laboratories; that any assets disposed of by affiant, directly or indirectly, between the 25th day of April, 1940, and the 1st day of April, 1941, have been disposed of in the ordinary and usual course of business. That any and all attorneys' fees and costs and expenses of litigation paid out by affiant from the 25th day of April, 1940, have been paid out of affiant's usual and ordinary drawing account, or from funds derived from sources other than the business known and designated as F. A. Clarke, doing business under the fictitious firm name and style of Boncquet Laboratories; that all attorneys' fees and costs and expenses of litigation paid by affiant since the 25th day of April, 1940, have been reasonably necessary and have been paid in the ordinary and usual course of business."

In petitioner's affidavit dated June 21, 1941, made in opposition to the amended affidavit of L. N. Dechene, it was alleged among other things: "That for several months prior to the 25th day of April, 1940, affiant (Clarke) had been withdrawing from the profits of his said business which he was conducting under the fictitious firm name and style of Boncquet Laboratories, approximately One Thousand Dollars ($1,000.00) per month, for the personal and living expenses of himself and family; that since the 25th day of April, 1940, and to the 1st day of April, 1941, affiant has continued to draw from the profits of his said business approximately the same amount per month for said purposes. Affiant alleges that such withdrawals were 'reasonably necessary in the ordinary and usual course of business', and were not directly, or indirectly, in violation of, or contrary to, said injunction pendente lite; that affiant was devoting all of his time to said business, and without assistance of any other salesman consummated the large sales which occasioned the said profits. That during the year 1939 the gross sales of the business conducted by affiant under the fictitious name of Boncquet Laboratories were in excess of One Hundred Eight Thousand Dollars ($108,000.00), but that due to the time necessarily spent by affiant in connection with the litigation in the above entitled case (Taylor v. Superior Court), and the obstructions caused by said litigation and by plaintiff in connection therewith the gross sales of affiant's said business for the year 1940 amounted to approximately Seventy-eight Thousand Dollars ($78,000.00)."

Petitioner specifies in his brief twenty-three grounds which he contends show that his imprisonment is illegal because the court exceeded its jurisdiction in adjudging him guilty of contempt of court, and concludes with the following statement:

"Upon consideration of the entire record on behalf of petitioner * * * and the authorities cited in this brief it has been shown:

"(1) That the injunction was invalid;

"(2) That the bond did not constitute a legal obligation;

"(3) That the affidavits upon which the injunction was based did not state facts which showed that there had been a violation of the injunction by the petitioner;

"(4) That there was no evidence to support the findings of the court;

"(5) That the order and commitment of the Superior Court was one which the court had no jurisdiction to make * * * because it violated the rights of the petitioner under both the Constitution of the State of California and of the United States."

[1] It is first contended by petitioner, and conceded by respondent, that on habeas corpus the scope of the inquiry may extend to a review of the entire record in an effort to ascertain whether the court had jurisdiction and whether such jurisdiction was exceeded. This contention is supported by the cases of Brunton v. Superior Court, 20 Cal.2d 202, 124 P.2d 831, Bridges v. Superior Court, 14 Cal.2d 464, 94 P.2d 983, and Rose v. Superior Court, 44 Cal.App.2d 599, 112 P.2d 713. See, also, In re Lake, 65 Cal.App. 420, 224 P. 126.

In the Lake case, supra, page 423 of 65 Cal.App., page 127 of 224 P., a proceeding in habeas corpus to review a contempt alleged to have been committed in the immediate view and presence of the court, it was held: "The statute, section 1222, of the Code of Civil Procedure, declares that the judgment in cases of contempt is final and conclusive. Thus, one who has been adjudged guilty of contempt has but two remedies—habeas corpus and certiorari. The scope of the inquiry which the court can make upon either habeas corpus or certiorari is precisely the same. (Citing cases.) While neither writ is one of error, both extend to the entire record of the court below and to the evidence itself when necessary to determine jurisdiction. Hotaling v. Superior Court, [191 Cal. 501], 217 P. 73, 75, [29 A.L.R. 127]. This inquiry, of course, cannot go beyond the question of jurisdiction, and the review of the evidence is limited to the sole purpose of determining, first, whether jurisdiction existed; and, second, whether jurisdiction was exceeded. Thus, where the question is whether jurisdictional facts were or were not proved, the review extends, not only to the entire record, but to the evidence itself. (Citing cases.) * * * In reviewing this proceeding, the charge, the evidence, the findings and the judgment are all to be strictly construed in favor of the accused * * * and no intendments or presumptions can be indulged in aid of their sufficiency. * * *

"There is no deviation from the rule that, unless the affidavit charging constructive contempt 'contains a statement of facts which shows on its face that a contempt has been committed, the court is without jurisdiction to proceed in the matter, and any judgment of contempt thereon is void.' 5 Cal.Jur., pp. 938, 939. * * * The proceeding being one of a criminal nature, a conviction of the offense can be supported only on a showing that the acts charged come within the definition of the offense."

See, also, Wilde v. Superior Court, 53 Cal.App.2d 168, 127 P.2d 560; Ex parte Bell, 19 Cal.2d 488, 122 P.2d 22.

The question raised by petitioner with respect to the validity of the bond required to be posted by the injunction order is sufficiently answered by the decisions in Taylor v. Superior Court, 20 Cal.2d 244, 125 P.2d 1, and Yellen v. Fidelity & Casualty Co., 115 Cal.App. 434, 1 P.2d 1019.

Petitioner's main contention is that the injunction order of April 25, 1940, is void, because "the language of the order enjoining petitioner from withdrawing any funds 'except such as are reasonably necessary in the ordinary and usual course of business', is so vague and uncertain as to render it impossible for petitioner to know what he might or might not do."

[2] There is no doubt that the language used in the order is subject to different interpretations. It clearly prohibits petitioner from withdrawing funds—either dissipating or throwing away the funds of the company, but on the other hand, it permits him to withdraw such funds as are reasonably necessary in the ordinary and usual course of business. It would therefore appear that the burden was upon the plaintiff in the contempt proceeding to prove what the money withdrawn from the bank was used for.

Inasmuch as the order which forms the basis of the alleged contempt is qualified and authorizes expenditures reasonably necessary in the ordinary course of business, the question as to what expenditures come within the meaning of the order is left open. Honest opinion can differ as to what constitutes expenditures reasonably necessary in the ordinary course of business. Manifestly, something more than a difference of opinion is necessary to sustain a judgment in contempt.

The amended affidavit of Dechene, which superseded his first affidavit and is the only basis for the proceeding in re contempt, avers in the first twenty-three paragraphs thereof that petitioner "contrary to and in violation of the restraining order" withdrew sums of money then on deposit with certain banks under the name of F. A. Clarke, doing business as Boncquet Laboratories, and paid the same to his attorneys. These are averments, not of fact, but of mere conclusions of law. There is neither averment nor proof to be found in the record that such payments were not reasonably necessary in the ordinary and usual course of business.

There then follow averments XXIV to XXX, amounting to conclusions of law only, that petitioner "contrary to and in violation of the restraining order" withdrew from certain named banks, specified sums of money "for his own use and benefit", which funds were on deposit in said banks under the name of F. A. Clarke, doing business as Boncquet Laboratories.

Petitioner in his affidavit in response to the first order to show cause averred that all attorneys' fees paid by him since April 25, 1940, "have been reasonably necessary and have been paid in the ordinary and usual course of business." Moreover, in his affidavit in opposition to the amended affidavit of Dechene, petitioner admitted he had withdrawn during the period of April 25, 1940, to April 1, 1941, the sum of $1,000 per month for his own salary, and that such withdrawals were reasonably necessary in the ordinary and usual course of business, for the reason that he was devoting all of his time to the business and, without the assistance of any other salesman, consummated sales which resulted in gross sales of $78,000 for the company's product in the year 1940.

At the trial in re contempt, Dechene, the author of the hereinbefore mentioned affidavits, was the principal witness. He testified he was a public accountant and had made an audit of the books of the Boncquet Laboratories. In answer to the question: "I will ask you if your books show that any of that money (withdrawals) was used—what the money was used for?", said witness replied: "It only shows that it was withdrawals, that were charged to his account." Again, when asked, "Referring to the books of the Boncquet Laboratories, are all expenditures that were made by Mr. Clarke during that time reflected in the books of the Boncquet Laboratories; that were expended in the business?", the witness answered: "Yes. There are various expense accounts set up, where any money that was primarily for the business would be charged to the respective accounts.

"Q. By Mr. Fox: These sums of money which you have referred to—there is no record kept of these expenditures being placed to any particular item, or account, for the business? * * * A. In Mr. Clarke's drawing account—* * *

"Q. And according to the books as you interpret them that was his drawing account for the maintenance of himself, in the management of the business? A. Not for the management of the business. They cover the personal expense, income tax and any money he may expend in any way he sees fit, but none of the money has ever come back into the business. * * *

"Q. None of that money, so far as the books show, was used for the necessary running expenses of the business of the Boncquet Laboratories? A. The amounts I have recorded are all drawing account, F. A. Clarke, or in payment of the account of Hastings and Baker (attorneys)."

On cross-examination, said witness testified that the books of the Boncquet Laboratories were kept as an individual account, and not as a partnership account; that they did not reflect anywhere that they were a partnership account; that, according to the books, all the money that came into the business was kept in an individual or personal account, as a sole proprietorship; that all the books and all the records of the company state that they were records of F. A. Clarke, doing business as Boncquet Laboratories.

In answer to a question put to him by the Court, i.e., "You have stated generally the method of bookkeeping. Was that method used in this concern, in these books?, the witness stated: "It was used in this set of books, as a sole proprietorship. The withdrawals, as I explained the other day, subsequent to April 24th, 1940, were in the amount of $12,046.92, chargeable directly to Mr. Clarke. There was an item also in addition to that—there was charged against his Investment Account the amount of $3,471.03 which * * * would reflect the net investment at the end of the period."

Upon cross-examination the following occurred:

"By Mr. Salem. Q. Mr. Dechene, as far as these books are concerned, do they indicate that they are the books of F. A. Clarke, doing business as Boncquet Laboratories? A. That is an interpretation, that anyone is a sole proprietor. They may operate under a name, doing business as any fictitious name.

"Q. Do these books reflect F. A. Clarke doing business as Boncquet Laboratories? A. That is the way the books are set up. * * *

"Q. As a matter of fact, those withdrawals set forth as of May 1st, 1940, to and including August 6th, 1941, were made from books which were audited by or prepared by some one other than yourself? A. Yes.

"Q. You were merely taking what the books reflected? A. Yes.

"Q. As a matter of fact, these are all withdrawals by F. A. Clarke from funds belonging to the Boncquet Laboratories, by F. A. Clarke doing business as Boncquet Laboratories? Answer 'Yes' or 'No'. A. Yes."

As to the various sums of money averred by the amended affidavit as having been withdrawn by petitioner from the funds of the company, the following is a typical example of the testimony offered to prove such averment:

"Q. The item under date of May 24th, 1941, $415, according to the books is that a correct notation that that amount of money was paid to Eldon V. Soper, Baker and Hastings? A. According to the books of the Boncquet Laboratories, that is just the same as the item just mentioned previously. It is a cash item, drawn from a check in the amount of $615. $415 is charged to Accounts Payable and $200 is charged to F. A. Clarke, drawing account, tracing the $415 from the Accounts Payable into the detail ledger, then we find it is posted to the account of Eldon V. Soper, Hastings and Baker. * * *

"Q. Do the books themselves show who made the withdrawals which are charged on the books to F. A Clarke drawing account? A. I don't get that question, exactly. The books reflect that this money has been withdrawn, and charged to F. A. Clarke's personal withdrawals.

"Q. But they do not disclose, in and of themselves, who made the withdrawals, do they? A. I cannot say only what the record shows, that there are certain accounts charged to Mr. Clarke and apparently he got them, or they would not be charged to him."

[3] Respondents rely upon an averment in the amended affidavit of Mr. Dechene to the effect that at the time the injunction pendente lite was issued by Judge Wilson, he "informed Girard F. Baker that it would be improper for him or any other person to withdraw from the funds of Boncquet Laboratories, any sum whatsoever for and on account of attorneys' fees pending the trial of said cause (Taylor v. Superior Court), and ordered said attorney, Girard F. Baker, or any other person on his behalf, not to withdraw any funds on account of attorneys' fees pending the trial of said case." Any oral statements made by the judge at the time the injunction was granted and which are not incorporated in the written order are completely dehors the record and cannot be considered by this court.

[4] In the case of Wilde v. Superior Court, 53 Cal.App.2d 168, 178, 127 P.2d 560, 565, it is stated: "Jurisdiction of the court in contempt cases, like those in which reviews of awards of the Industrial Accident Commission are sought, depends on the existence of evidence showing that an actual contempt of court has been committed. In the absence of such evidence a court pronouncing a judgment of contempt lacks jurisdiction and its order should be annulled. In re Lake, supra [65 Cal.App. 420, 224 P. 126]; In re Chaus, supra [92 Cal.App. 384, 268 P. 422]; In re Cunha, 123 Cal.App. 625, 11 P.2d 902, 18 P.2d 979; In re Cutler, 1 Cal.App.2d 273, 36 P.2d 441; In re Roberts, 2 Cal.App. 2d 70, 37 P.2d 477; King v. Superior Court, 12 Cal.App.2d 501, 56 P.2d 268; In re Critchlow, 11 Cal.2d 751, 81 P.2d 966.

"The reasons for this rule in contempt cases are stated in King v. Superior Court, supra (12 Cal.App.2d 501, 56 P.2d 273), as follows:

" 'When jurisdiction to inquire and act depends upon the existence of certain facts, the absence of proof of such facts limits the power to that of inquiry only, and, if action is attempted it is in excess of jurisdiction. The same reasoning is applied to cases before the Industrial Accident Commission. * * *'

"As we have seen, neither the trial court nor this court can indulge in any presumptions against one charged with contempt. * * * There is a presumption 'that there was a good and sufficient consideration for a written contract' * * * and also, what has been characterized as one of the strongest presumptions 'That a person is innocent of crime or wrong'. Subd.1, § 1963, CodeCiv.Proc."

[5] A careful examination of the record in the instant proceeding discloses an absence of any substantial evidence tending to prove that the withdrawals made by petitioner were not "reasonably necessary in the ordinary and usual course of business" of the Boncquet Laboratories. Consequently, the trial court exceeded its jurisdiction when it found petitioner guilty of contempt.

For the foregoing reasons the order of commitment is annulled, and the petitioner is discharged from custody.

SAWAYA v. DeCOU et al.

Civ. 13998.

District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California.

Aug. 6, 1943.

1. Master and servant 🔑322

Though doctrine of "respondeat superior" does not ordinarily apply where injury results from negligence of independent contractor, such doctrine is applicable where property owner knowingly causes excavations to be made in or obstructions to be created on public street or sidewalk fronting his property, owner then owing duty to public to maintain sufficient warning signals thereon.

See Words and Phrases, Permanent Edition, for all other definitions of "Respondeat Superior".

2. Master and servant 🔑317

Where by statute or ordinance, owner is prohibited from excavating or obstructing public street without permit, he is liable for injuries resulting from failure of contractor to maintain proper warning signals, whether work was done with or without permit.

3. Master and servant 🔑322

Property owner who permitted or caused another to secure from city permit to excavate street for installation of sewer connections and who knew that work was to be done or was being done, could not escape liability for injuries sustained by third persons through independent contractor's negligent failure to maintain sufficient warning signals on ground that owner had no notice or knowledge of conditions of street.

4. Master and servant 🔑322

Whether property owner was liable for injury sustained by third person due to independent contractor's negligent failure to maintain sufficient warning signals on material excavated from and piled on city street under permit to excavate street for installation of sewer connections depended upon whether owner knowingly caused excavation and obstruction to be made or maintained in the street.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Peirson M. Hall, Judge.

Action by Amelia Sawaya, a minor, by her guardian ad litem, George A. Sawaya, against Bronson DeCou and others, for injuries sustained by plaintiff when automobile in which she was riding struck an obstruction in street fronting defendant's property. Elsie V. DeCou as executrix of the will of Bronson DeCou, deceased, was substituted as defendant in place of her deceased husband. From a judgment for plaintiff, and an order denying a motion for new trial, the substituted defendant alone appeals.

Appeal from order denying a new trial dismissed, and judgment affirmed.

A. J. O'Connor, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Franklin B. McCarthy, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

WHITE, Justice.

This action was commenced by Amelia Sawaya, a minor, by her guardian ad litem, George A. Sawaya, to recover damages for injuries sustained by her when the automobile in which she was riding struck a mound of excavated dirt and macadam on Cahuenga Boulevard, in the City of Los Angeles. By her complaint plaintiff alleged that for the purpose of making sewer connections between defendant DeCou's property and the city's main sewer line, "defendants excavated or caused to be excavated and dug, a large and deep hole in the middle of Cahuenga Boulevard and in the course of said digging and excavating threw up and piled upon the middle of said boulevard a large mound of dirt, rocks and macadam * * * the said dangerous condition of said street or boulevard was known by defendants Bronson DeCou and Homer Toberman on said date of March 29th, 1941"; that defendants negligently suffered said excavation and dirt to remain unguarded and unlighted and without proper signals on the street, and as a proximate consequence thereof plaintiff was injured. Joined as defendants with the executrix of the will of Bronson DeCou, owner of the property where the sewer connections were being made, were the building contractor, Homer Toberman, and the sewer contractor, Andrew Jayich. By his answer defendant DeCou denied that he excavated the street or piled the dirt thereon; denied negligence and the injuries to plaintiff, and alleged that Andrew Jayich was an independent sewer contractor who had agreed to make the connection according to plans and specifications approved by the Engineering Department of the City of Los Angeles, and that if Andrew Jayich was at all negligent, DeCou was not liable therefor. A jury trial was had and a verdict in favor of plaintiff for $500 was returned against Andrew Jayich and defendant executrix who was substituted as a defendant in the place and stead of her deceased husband. The jury found in favor of the contractor, Homer Toberman. Said executrix, Elsie DeCou, alone appeals from the judgment and from an order denying a motion for a new trial, assigning as error the giving of certain instructions by the trial court.

Briefly the facts are that on October 15, 1940, Bronson DeCou entered into a contract with Homer Toberman, a licensed building contractor for the erection of some units of a motel on the property of DeCou which had been purchased by him from C. E. Toberman Company, a corporation. The contractor, Homer Toberman, son of C. E. Toberman, had no official connection with the corporation of which the latter was president, but at times acted as a part-time employee thereof. The record discloses that application to the city of Los Angeles for a permit to excavate the public street for installation of the sewer connections was made through a letter written by C. E. Toberman, President of C. E. Toberman Company, under date of October 4, 1940. The required $56 fee for said permit was paid by C. E. Toberman and a bond was furnished by the C. E. Toberman Company. C. E. Toberman testified that Bronson DeCou reimbursed him for the $56. Homer Toberman picked up the permit from the office of the L. A. City Engineering Department and signed therefor as follows: "C. E. Toberman Company, by Homer Toberman".

On January 18, 1941, Andrew Jayich, a licensed sewer contractor, entered into a contract with C. E. Toberman Company to install the sewer under the above-mentioned permit and connect with the main sewer line that extended out in the center of Cahuenga Boulevard. Jayich testified that he had a contract with Mr. C. E. Toberman, and that "Mr. C. E. Toberman gave me a payroll every week, that I didn't have no money, and so when I take the job I told him I didn't want the job, and he says he will give me—he will help me pay as I go along, and that was that"; and that he didn't see Mr. DeCou until after the accident here in question. But defendant DeCou, by way of separate and affirmative defense, alleged: "That on or about November 6, 1940, said defendant obtained the approval of the Engineering Department of the City of Los Angeles to plans and specifications for a sewer in Cahuenga Boulevard; that thereafter said defendant accepted a bid from one Andrew Jayich, sewer contractor, to construct a sewer according to said plans and specifications for the sum of $640.00; that said Jayich thereupon constructed said sewer; that said Jayich is not an employee of defendant Bronson DeCou but at all times herein mentioned was an independent contractor and acted under and pursuant to the contract for sewer construction alleged in paragraph I of this separate and affirmative defense".

Homer Toberman testified, under section 2055 of the Code of Civil Procedure, that he was a licensed general building contractor, and that he was not an official or stockholder of C. E. Toberman Company, but only a part-time employee. That in October, 1940, he started building operations on Mr. DeCou's property, which work was completed some time in April, 1941. Homer Toberman also testified that he entered into a contract with the Advance Plumbing Company to install the plumbing and fixtures but that this work only extended to the property line and that the sewer was to be brought into the curb by others.

Upon this appeal it is not denied by appellant that the excavation and the mounds of dirt resultant therefrom were not signed or marked with signals or warning devices as required by the City of Los Angeles in granting the permit to excavate, nor is respondent's contention, that the obstructions on the highway were improperly and ineffectively lighted, challenged.

Appellant's main ground for reversal is the trial court's refusal to instruct the jury that unless the owner himself takes out the permit to excavate, he can not be held liable for negligent acts of his independent contractor, and that the duty to use ordinary care in so excavating is imposed upon the person to whom the permit is issued; that the mere fact of ownership does not render the defendant DeCou liable if he employs an independent contractor and does not have the full and unqualified right to control and direct said independent contractor in the construction of the sewer; or if defendant DeCou employed the general contractor as an independent contractor, he, the defendant owner, would not be liable for acts of negligence of said general contractor, or if said general contractor employed a subcontractor, the negligence of said sub-contractor could not be imputed to said owner; or that negligence on the part of the independent contractor could not be imputed to said owner; that defendant DeCou was not bound to anticipate negligence on the part of the contractors; that there was no evidence that either Andrew Jayich and/or Homer Toberman was an agent, servant or employee of Bronson DeCou.

[1, 2] In these contentions appellant can not be sustained. The case of Robbins v. Hercules Gasoline Co., 80 Cal.App. 271, 251 P. 697, 698 (hearing denied by the Supreme Court), presents a factual situation quite similar to the one existing in the case at bar. In the cited case, speaking of the application of the doctrine of respondeat superior, the court said: "Generally speaking, the rule does not apply where injury results from the negligent acts of an independent contractor, but it is a well-known exception to this rule that where the owner of property knowingly causes excavations to be made in or obstructions to be erected on the public street or sidewalk fronting his property, he owes a duty to the public to maintain sufficient warning signals thereon and cannot pass this duty on to another. Thus, where by statute or ordinance an owner is prohibited from excavating or obstructing a public street without permit, he is liable for injuries resulting from the failure of his contractor to maintain proper warning signals whether the work was done with or without permit—in the first instance, on the theory that through the permit he has assumed the duty of the municipality to maintain the street in a safe condition, and in the second instance, on the theory that, having acted in violation of law, he has created a nuisance per se. Colgrove v. Smith, 102 Cal. 220, 224, 36 P. 411, 27 L.R.A. 590 * * *." (Emphasis added.)

The latter case is authority for the following: "It is commonly stated — and, in a large class of cases, correctly — that the principle of respondeat superior does not apply where the negligent or wrongful act is that of an independent contractor, or of his servant or employé, unless the superior has been guilty of negligence in contracting with an unfit person. * * * But there are exceptions to the general doctrine, and this case, we think, is one of them. The board of trustees of the city was charged by the law with the care and maintenance of the streets in a safe and proper condition for the use of the public. Appellants could not lawfully dig trenches and lay water pipes without express authority from the city. If they had undertaken to do so, and had contracted with another to do the work, they would not, by such contract, have relieved themselves from liability to the city for the trespass, nor to individuals who might have sustained special injury. Nor does the fact that they obtained from the city a franchise or permission to dig up the street and lay their pipes relieve them from more than the unlawful character of the work. They stand in a contract relation to the public, represented by the city authorities, to do the work in the manner required by the ordinance, and cannot relieve themselves of the duty imposed by that contract by contracting with another to do the work. These trenches could not be dug in the street without danger to the public. If done without authority, a nuisance would necessarily be created; and, if not done in the manner required by the ordinance, the departure creates a nuisance." (Emphasis added.) To the same effect see Luce v. Holloway, 156 Cal. 162, 103 P. 886.

Appellant urges that no evidence was adduced at the trial to prove that defendant DeCou had any notice or knowledge of the condition of the street. However, by his answer defendant DeCou alleged that he "accepted a bid" from the contractor Jayich for the installation of the sewer connection, and there is creditable evidence that he was aware of the impending excavation of the street as indicated by his reimbursement of Mr. C. E. Toberman for the $56 expended for the permit authorizing such excavation.

[3] Appellant places great reliance upon the case of Wise v. Maxwell Hardware Company, 94 Cal.App. 765, 271 P. 918, and particularly upon that portion of the decision on pages 768 and 919, respectively, wherein the court stated: "There can be no question that an abutting property owner is not ordinarily liable for injuries resulting from obstructions created by an independent contractor". But this language is immediately followed by this statement: "Where, however, he knows of the dangerous condition, or as a careful, prudent man should have known of it, the rule is otherwise." (Emphasis ours.) As we have heretofore pointed out, the record contains sufficient evidence to justify a finding by the jury that while defendant DeCou may have caused or permitted another to secure the permit from the municipal authorities, he had knowledge that the work was to be done or was being done and could not, therefore, relieve himself of liability for injuries sustained through the negligence of the independent contractor who obtained the permit.

[4] The instructions given by the court were in accordance with and practically contained the identical language used in Robbins v. Hercules Gasoline Co., supra. Considered as a whole the instructions correctly advised the jury that while ordinarily the rule is that an owner is not liable for the negligent acts of an independent contractor, such rule has no application in cases like this where the owner of property knowingly causes excavations to be made in or obstructions to be erected or maintained on the public streets fronting his property. In such cases the duty he owes to the public to maintain sufficient warning signals can not be shifted to another. The jury was properly instructed that it was for them to determine whether the owner DeCou knowingly caused the excavation and obstructions to be made or maintained in the street before such owner could be held liable. As heretofore pointed out the record herein sustains the jury's affirmative finding upon that issue.

The attempted appeal from the order denying a new trial is dismissed. Finding no error in the record, the judgment must be affirmed. It is so ordered.

59 Cal.App.2d 783

CRUMRINE v. DIZDAR.

Civ. 13961.

District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 3, California.

July 23, 1943.

1. Executors and administrators 🔑535

If persons in whose interest surety's liability is sought to be enforced did not know of fraud in obtaining administrator's bond, and if administrator's liability has been fixed by decree, defenses available in action on bond are that the bond was not made, or that decree ordering administrator to deliver property for which he was accountable was obeyed, or that decree was not made, or that decree, if made, was obtained by fraud.

2. Executors and administrators 🔑535

A surety on administrator's bond who has undertaken to pay any balance adjudged to be due by administrator to the estate, is bound by the judgment unless he can show the judgment was obtained by fraud.

3. Executors and administrators 🔑537(10)

In action on administrator's bond, instructions that if surety could not read and without negligence signed administrator's bond through fraud of administrator or cosurety, surety was not liable were erroneous.

4. Executors and administrators ⚿537(5)

An action against surety on administrator's bond was not barred by limitation where period of limitation for commencing action was at least four years from time former administrator died and action was commenced within two years after his death.

5. Executors and administrators ⚿537(5)

An administrator or surety asserting that action on administrator's bond is barred by laches or equitable estoppel must show an unreasonable and unexplained delay, and mere delay short of full period of limitation will not defeat such action.

6. Executors and administrators ⚿537(5)

A succeeding administrator's action against surety on former administrator's bond was not barred by "laches" because action was commenced some 13 months after succeeding administrator's appointment, in view of record including showing that decree settling former administrator's account was made some three months before commencement of the action.

See Words and Phrases, Permanent Edition, for all other definitions of "Laches".

Appeal from Superior Court, Ventura County; Ernest D. Wagner, Judge.

Action by C. Leroy Crumrine, as administrator of the estate of Charles Trotter, deceased, against Hasan Dizdar to recover on an administrator's bond on which defendant was a cosurety. From a judgment for defendant and from an order denying a new trial, plaintiff appeals.

Judgment reversed and appeal from order dismissed.

Arthur H. Blanchard, of Santa Paula, and Burton B. Crane, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Albert A. Kidder, Jr., of Ojai, and James C. Hollingsworth, of Ventura, for respondent

PARKER WOOD, Justice.

Frank C. Arnold was appointed administrator of the estate of Charles Trotter upon condition that he furnish a $1,000 bond. Arnold presented a bond in that amount to the court, signed by himself as principal, and by William T. Fulton and defendant as sureties, which bond was approved by the court. Letters of administration were issued to Arnold on March 11, 1926. Arnold died on December 31, 1939, and at that time the administration proceedings in the Trotter estate had not been completed and no account had been rendered.

The public administrator was appointed administrator of Arnold's estate, and he rendered an account of Arnold's administration of the Trotter estate showing that Arnold was indebted to the Trotter estate in the sum of $1,285.45. The court in settling the account of Arnold as administrator adjudged there was a balance of $1,285.45 due from Arnold to the Trotter estate, and that said balance "was not on hand" by Arnold at the time of his death.

Plaintiff, who succeeded Arnold as administrator of the Trotter estate, brought this action against defendant, as surety, to recover the amount of the bond. Fulton, the other surety, died in 1936.

In his answer defendant denied generally the allegations of the complaint, and alleged fraud on the part of his cosurety and Arnold in obtaining defendant's signature as a surety. As further defenses, he alleged: (1) Laches, in that plaintiff was appointed administrator on June 19, 1940, and did not commence this action until July 24, 1941; in that plaintiff was a nephew of Trotter and should have known of the defaults of Arnold as they occurred; and in that plaintiff did not file any claim against the estates of either Arnold or Fulton, and by his failure to do so has deprived defendant of the right of contribution and is barred from invoking the aid of equity. (2) The action was barred by the statute of limitations. (3) The action was premature in that the Arnold estate had not been closed and no demand had been made upon the administrator of Arnold's estate. (4) Defendant did not make the bond. (5) Failure of consideration. (6) Arnold was granted extensions of time by plaintiff and by those whom plaintiff represents.

Defendant testified in substance as follows: He was born in Jugoslavia, came to the United States in 1906, attended night school 1½ years, could read about 15 words out of each 100, and became a citizen in 1912. Preceding 1920 he was a railroad laborer, a truck driver, and a cement worker. Since 1920 he has owned and operated a cafe in Camarillo, and has built and sold houses. At the time he signed the bond he owned said cafe, the water system in Camarillo, an old church building and a few homes. On the day he signed the bond, Arnold (the principal) and Fulton (the cosurety) came to his cafe and Fulton, in Arnold's presence, told defendant that a relative of Arnold had died leaving an old house in Fillmore which Arnold had an opportunity to sell for $1,700, and the court was going to appoint Arnold to sell it. Fulton then asked defendant if he "wanted to go with him" and "sign the bill" for Arnold, and said "Frank [Arnold] is all right," that it would be settled up "in 6 or 7 months." Defendant had worked with Arnold for several years. Defendant often went to Fulton for advice, and relied upon his statements. After defendant signed the bond he, Arnold and Fulton went to a notary public, whom defendant had known 6 or 7 years, and Fulton and defendant again signed the bond before the notary. No one read the bond to defendant.

A bookkeeper, called by defendant, testified he had known defendant 20 years, and had been employed by him 3 or 4 years; and that defendant could read some printing but no "written" matter. A justice of the peace, called by defendant, testified he had known defendant 26 years; that defendant could not read, and that he (the witness) often read and explained documents to defendant.

The evidence presented by plaintiff consisted of plaintiff's testimony concerning his appointment as administrator of the Trotter estate; the testimony of defendant under the provisions of section 2055 of the Code of Civil Procedure; and the decree showing the indebtedness of Arnold, the bond, and other documents showing the essential probate proceedings.

Judgment, based upon a verdict, was in favor of defendant. Plaintiff appeals from the judgment and the order denying a new trial. Plaintiff contends among other things, that fraud practiced by a cosurety or an administrator upon a surety whereby the surety was induced to sign the administrator's bond does not constitute a defense to an action upon the bond brought in behalf of the heirs, and therefore certain instructions of the court were prejudicially erroneous.

One of the instructions given at defendant's request was: "You are instructed that where there is fraud or misrepresentation by one person likely to cause and that does cause another person, without negligence on his part, to believe that he is assenting to a transaction entirely different from that which would be created if there was no fraud, misrepresentation or mistake as to the facts, then I instruct you that there has been no assent or meeting of the minds required by law, and if you further believe from all the facts and circumstances in this case that the said defendant Hasan Dizdar signed said bond or contract by reason of fraud or misrepresentation which was likely to cause and did cause him to sign the same, and that there was no negligence on his part in signing said bond or contract, and that in so signing it, he believed that he was signing a bond or contract entirely different from that which would have been signed if there had been no fraud, misrepresentation or mistake as to the facts, then I instruct you that your verdict must be in favor of the defendant, Hasan Dizdar, and against the plaintiff, C. LeRoy Crumrine, as Administrator of the Estate of Charles Trotter, Deceased."

Another instruction given at defendant's request was to the effect that if the jury believed defendant did not have sufficient education to read the bond, and that the terms thereof were misrepresented to defendant and the misrepresentation was relied upon by him its verdict must be in favor of defendant.
